THE British Association for the Advancement of Science has laboured with considerable zeal and success in the various sections of scientific study during its sojourn at Bath. It is impossible in a small compass to convey even a general idea of the addresses delivered by the eminent lecturers. A passing notice of those discussions to which circumstances lend a peculiar interest must suffice. In the Section of Zoology, Dr. Gray spoke at length on acclimatisation. 'Certain French philosophers,' said he, 'had lately taken up a notion that it was desirable to pervert the true purpose of the horse by cultivating him for food instead of work, and a society of hippophagi had been instituted with this view. Whenever an attempt had been made to fatten horses for food, it had been found that the meat could not be produced at so low a rate as that for which far better mutton and beef could be bought. In attempting to introduce new domestic animals into some of our colonies, it would be desirable not to confine attention to European breeds, but to enquire whether the domestic races of Asia and Africa were not better adapted for the purpose. For instance, on the west coast of Africa, the horse, ass, ox, sheep, goat, and even dog had greatly degenerated. There the horse and ass were short-lived, the flesh of the ox and sheep was bad, and the goat tasteless and stringy. The pig alone bore the change with equanimity. It is, we believe, the remark of Gibbon that the pig and man are the only two animals capable equally of enduring the colds of the Arctic regions and the heats of the torrid zone. In the Statistical Department Professor Levi read a paper on foreigners in England and other countries. 'In 1861 there were in England 84,000 foreigners, or 0·41 per cent. on the whole population of 20,000,000. In France 506,000 foreigners, or 1·35 per cent. on the whole population of 37,000,000. In the States of North America, 4,000,000 foreigners, or about 15 per cent. on a population of 27,000,000.' This, however, is an estimate admitting of modification. There are but few foreigners in the Southern and Border States. Deducting, then, 7,000,000 from the aggregate of the population, we should find that nearly one-fifth of the population of the Northern States owes a foreign allegiance. 'In Spain there were,' said the Professor, '35,000 foreigners, or 0·22 per cent. on a population of 16,000,000. In New York the proportion of foreigners to natives was nearly 2 to 1.' It is difficult to believe that the Professor is correct in his estimate of the number of foreigners in England. There are, probably, at least 70,000 Germans in London alone. There is also a large foreign element in the seamen resident from time to time in our ports. We can only account for the state of the quoted return on the assumption that foreigners have such a love for their adopted country as to claim the title of native-born children of her. In Mechanical Science Mr. Fairbairn read a paper on the Atlantic cable, in which he gave a detail of the experiments made by the scientific committee appointed by the Atlantic Telegraph Company to test the mechanical qualities of the cable about to be laid between Ireland and Trinity Bay. The experiments showed that the more the fibres of wire were brought into a state of tension the greater became its strength; that gutta percha as an insulator was more durable than india-rubber; and that the new cable will, when laid, bear a strain of four times its own weight. In the same Section Admiral Sir E. Belcher explained and recommended the adoption of the torpedo as used in the navy of the Confederate States. On the following day Captain Burton read in the Geographical Section an able paper on the kingdom of Dahomey, and in great measure exonerated the King and his Ministers from the horrible charges of bloodshed brought against them. In three years only sixty-five persons were put to death. During Captain Burton's own visit, only forty men, and perhaps an equal number of women, were beheaded. The men were all criminals and war captives. No innocent man was ever killed. The King presided over the executions, and the Prime Minister officiated. Besides these violent deaths, it was usual to inform the late King of all important news by despatching a messenger to him. The King forgave some persons at Captain Burton's request, but the rescued individuals never had the grace to thank their liberator. He had never but once seen an unwilling victim. Duality was a ruling principle. There were two kings in one, two courts, masculine and feminine; of the Amazons two-thirds were maidens. They of course wore male attire. In the Economic Science Section there was an able discussion on the uniformity of weights and measures, in which Dr. Farr, the Astronomer-Royal, Mr. W. Ewart, M.P., the Master of the Mint, and Professor Miller took part. In the course of it Sir J. Bowring mentioned that 'at the recent Postal Congress at Paris, at which sixteen Governments were represented, it was resolved that the metric system should be universally adopted. In China the decimal system universally prevailed, and no boy of seven years ever made a mistake. He had heard savages say that the decimal and metric system must have come from God.' Captain Maury said that he was prepared to endorse the statement of an eminent American statesman who, in reporting to Congress on the subject, said that the adoption of such a system would confer as great a boon on mankind as the introduction of steam. The Confederate Government had appointed a commission to collect information on this question, and of that commission he had the honour to be a member.

On Monday evening Dr. Livingstone gave a most able narrative of his African expeditions, his plan, history, and failure of his own mission, and that of Bishop Mackenzie. Speaking of the west coast, he described a terrible pathos the sea, when by lawful commerce might be introduced to aid missionary effort, Dr. Livingstone observed the decided influence of that which was known as Lord Palmerston's policy. There he found piracy abolished, the slave trade gone, lawful commerce at two and three millions sterling in ivory and gold dust, twenty missions and schools for 12,000 pupils, life and property secure on the coast, and comparative peace in the interior. Then he went down the Zambesi to the east coast, but there neither traders nor missionaries were established; there was a small business in slaves, ivory, and gold dust, just as on the west coast before Lord Palmerston's policy was in operation. Dr. Livingstone's object was to supplement the action of our cruisers by opening up a trade. That was the object of the Zambesi expedition in which Dr. Kirk, Mr. Livingstone, and others joined. Dr. Livingstone then gave an admirable explanation of the geography of the country explored, describing the voyage up one hundred miles of the Zambesi to the affluent of the Zambesi called the Shire, running a valley 200 miles long and 20 broad and bounded by mountains. There elephants abounded, herds of 500 being visible at one time. The population was very large, and lined the banks armed with poisoned arrows. With them the steamer was left at Murchison's Cataract, and thence Dr. Kirk and Dr. Livingstone went on foot to Lake Shirwa in a NNE. direction, a lake teeming with fish, hippopotami, and leeches. There dwelt the Manganja, of the lowest class of humanity, cultivating, however, maize, beans, melons, cucumbers, cassava, castor oil, hemp, tobacco, and cotton. The wretches lived in constant dread of slave-hunters and witchcraft. The chiefs invariably declared that only criminals were sold for slaves, and Dr. Livingstone is clearly of opinion that the statement is true. After the goodwill of those people had been gained, Bishop Mackenzie arrived. His mission promised the highest success. He had the confidence of the natives, and he adopted the true method of educating a number of boys. In fact, he followed the plan of English ragged schools; for, as Dr. Livingstone most candidly confesses, 'the bodily wants of the people must be attended to as the basis of all efforts at their civilisation.' This mission was annihilated by the depredations of the Ajawa tribes instigated by the African Portuguese. The natives fled by whole villages in panic before the slave-hunters, and perished by starvation. Of the cotton Dr. Livingstone observed that it was short in the staple, strong, and like wool in the hand—as good as Upland American. There were other varieties, one of which was of the quality usually supposed to belong exclusively to South America. A tree of it was eight inches in diameter, or like an ordinary apple-tree. All these did not require replanting oftener than once in three years.

CAPTAIN SPEKE, the explorer of the Nile, has shot himself accidentally. From the evidence taken before the coroner, it appeared that Captain Speke was out shooting partridges in the neighbourhood of Box, in Wiltshire, in company with his cousin Mr. George Fuller. The latter gentleman, being at the time at a considerable distance from the deceased, heard the report of a gun, and at the same moment saw his friend fall to the ground. In about fifteen minutes Captain Speke died. The accident occurred while the deceased was climbing over a loose stone wall. The news arrived at Bath shortly before the meeting of Section E of the British Association. The general company of visitors had, however, assembled to hear a discussion between Captain Speke and Captain Burton on the sources of the Nile. Sir Roderick Murchison, on taking the chair, announced to the meeting the lamentable death of his friend, and, after some few words worthy of the occasion, moved the following resolution:—'That the geographers and ethnologists of the British Association having heard with profound regret of the fatal accident which has befallen Captain Speke, and by which they have suddenly lost so eminent an associate, resolve that their most heartfelt condolence be offered to his relatives on his being cut off in so awful a manner in the fulness of his strength and vigour.'

MR. W. E. BAXTER, M.P. for Montrose, in addressing his constituents a few days since on domestic and foreign affairs, spoke at some length on the American war. One quotation from the oration of this gentleman we cannot forbear making, because the utterance of the sentiments expressed therein coincides in point of time with the declaration of a greater Federal and Abolitionist than even Mr. Baxter. The latter politician says of the Northern States: 'Slavery had poisoned the vitals of the State, and now they are undergoing the chastening. But three years of hard fighting and adversity have raised the Northern people to the true source and origin of the evil; the anti-slavery party have been in the ascendant, and the feeling throughout the North has changed. Mr. Jefferson Davis and his friends went to war to perpetuate and extend the institution of negro slavery; but God makes the wrath of man to praise him, and every step is likely not only to prove the death-knell of the domestic institution, but to annihilate that plantation system, the cry of which I believe had gone up to heaven, and to destroy the influence of that slave-owing aristocracy who, to use the words of one of their own number, "hates everything free, from free schools upwards." Let us wait patiently and reverently, for a struggle so terrible cannot be without a use and a purpose, and by-and-by, perhaps, we shall hear "the still small voice."' Within forty-eight hours from the utterance of this tirade of Black-Republican abuse, the China arrived with the text of a speech delivered at Auburn by Mr. William Seward, Secretary of State to the Cabinet of Washington, the champion of Federal and Abolitionist policy. The words of a greater than even the Solomon of the borough of Montrose are these: 'When the insurgents shall have disbanded their armies, and laid down their arms, the war will instantly cease, and all the war measures then existing, including those which regard slaves, will cease also; and all the rights, constitutional, political, and social, as well questions of property as persons, which shall then be existing between individuals and States and the Federal Government, will be precisely as they were before the civil war began, or who they grew out of it, and, by force of the Constitution, pass over to the adjustment of courts of law, and to the ballot of the nation.' What is left for Mr. Baxter but to exclaim, 'Is Seward also among the Prophets?' We are content to ask whether this is not 'the still small voice' for which Mr. Baxter has waited so patiently and reverently.

The London Gazette, of September 15, announces that the Right Hon. Sir Andrew Buchanan, K.C.B., ambassador to the King of Prussia, has been appointed ambassador to the Emperor of Russia, and that the Right Hon. Lord Napier, K.T., ambassador to the Emperor of Russia, has been appointed ambassador to the King of Prussia.

THE foundation-stone of the New Liverpool Exchange was laid on Saturday last by Mr. C. S. Parker, the chairman of the New Exchange Company. Mr. T. H. Wyatt is the architect. The site has cost 200,000*l.*, and the building will cost 150,000*l.* When completed the edifice will be the finest of the kind in Europe.

THE results of the principal event of the race meeting at Doncaster were recorded in our columns last week. It only remains to glance at a few races of minor importance. On the first day of the meeting the celebrated Champagne Stakes, a sweepstake of 50*l.* each for two-year-olds, which has so often brought into notice a Derby winner, and vies in celebrity with the July Stakes at Newmarket, attracted ten animals to the post. Gardevisure, a filly of considerable pretension and of good antecedents, was made the favourite at 7 to 4. Sir Joseph Hawley's Bedminster, Count Batthyany's Puritan, and the French colt the Doge, all found supporters. The winner, however, turned up in Zambesi, a colt by Sauntcrer out of the dam of the speedy Living tone. Mr. Merry, the owner of Zambesi, had so poor an opinion of his chance as not to have backed him for a shilling. Yet it must be remembered that this colt ran admirably at Ascot in June last, and our columns bore special testimony to his excellence. On the final day of the meeting three races of interest were contested. The Town Plate, a handicap of trifling importance, was principally remarkable from being won by Sir J. Hawley's Washington, a colt by the American horse Charleston; a sire of peculiar style, and at least worthy of note as differing vastly in shape from English horses. Ely, by Kingston out of the Bloomer, added another leaf to his already abundant chaplet by winning in his own grand style the Doncaster Stakes, beating the vaunted but indifferent Coast Guard in a canter by eight lengths. The most pleasing race, however, was that for the Doncaster Cup, a prize that has probably been won by more really splendid horses than any other offered by the turf. It was in this race that Voltigeur overthrew the Flying Dutchman, a horse who, having won the July and Champagne Stakes, the Derby, and St. Leger, had never previously known defeat. For this race, too, in later times, Brown Duchess, the best of the progeny of the Flying Dutchman, ran a dead heat with the great Derby winner Kettledrum. The candidates this year for honours were Lord Glasgow's General Peel, Lord Glasgow's Rapid Rhone, Mr. Launde's Miner, and Baron Rothschild's Hippolyta. As may be supposed, the General, in the absence of Blair Athol, was made the favourite at the odds of 5 to 4. To the great delight of his noble owner the General won, Hippolyta being second, and the Miner third. The victory of General Peel was received by the Yorkshiremen with terrific applause.

FRANZ MÜLLER arrived in the Etna at Liverpool on Friday last, and in London on Saturday afternoon. He was at once conveyed to the Bow Street station, where the charge was entered. He appeared before the magistrate on Monday, and was remanded for a week. During the whole voyage Müller conducted himself with great propriety. His demeanour was singularly tranquil. He read the 'Pickwick Papers' and 'David Copperfield' with much zest. He appears to be much touched by the exertions of the German Protection Society in his defence.

CANADA.

A Convention to effect a union between the British provinces met at Charlottetown on September 1. All the members of the Canadian Government were authorised to attend the Convention. The delegates from Nova Scotia were the Hon. Messrs. Tupper, Henry, Archibald, and M'Cully; from New Brunswick, Messrs. Tilley, Johnson, Steeres, Gray, and Chandler; from Canada, Messrs. Cartier, Brown, Galt, M'Gee, Sangerin, Campbell, and M'Donald; from Prince Edward's Island, Messrs. Gray, Pope, Palmer, M'Donald, and Coles. The Convention was organised by the appointment of Colonel Gray, of Prince Edward's Island, chairman, and Messrs. Tupper and Tilley, secretaries. At noon on the first day of the Convention the Canadian Government steamer Queen Victoria arrived at Charlottetown, having on board the Hon. Messrs. Cartier, Brown, M'Donald, Galt, M'Dougall, Campbell, M'Gee, and Sangerin, their purpose being to invite the consideration of the Convention to the possibility of a more extensive union.

The Convention was summoned to consider a union of the three maritime provinces; but the proposal of the Canadian Government was that the whole of British North America, from Halifax to the Rocky Mountains, should be united in one Federal Government, and under one legislature. The Canadian deputation had no official standing in the Convention, Canada having no interest in the special question for which the Convention was summoned. The Canadian deputies were, however, soon after their arrival, invited to meet the Convention and present their views. There have accordingly been several meetings, and it is understood that the whole subject of the larger confederation has been fully discussed. The meetings, however, have all been held with closed doors, and the proceedings have not transpired.

According to the latest advices from New York, it is reported that the Conference has decided that the union of the British North American provinces would be satisfactory, provided that the terms of alliance could be arranged.

NEW ZEALAND.

Another action has been fought in New Zealand. Encouraged by the victory at Gate Pah, the natives sent a challenge to Colonel Green, the officer in command of the forces at Tauranga. The language of the defiance was as follows:—'Now, hear what we have to say. We have been waiting for you to come and attack us for a whole month, but you have not come, and now we are coming to you; we give you warning, therefore, that you may expect to see us within the month, and not to let any of your soldiers out, for our young men will certainly shoot them. We give you warning, that you may not say it is murder, for it won't be murder. We shall treat your wounded and prisoners well, and shall expect you to do the same.' Apart from the proof already afforded by deeds of chivalrous courage and noble humanity, the language of this document stamps the native tribes as men to be honoured as friends rather than killed as foes. On receipt of the challenge Colonel Green assembled his forces, amounting to 1,500 men, and advanced to attack the native position. After a sharp skirmish, the 43rd and 68th Regiments with the Waikato militia carried the rifle-pits at the point of the bayonet. Over 200 Maories were killed, and a great number were wounded. The 43rd Regiment lost a corporal and five men killed, two captains, a sergeant, and 12 men wounded. The 68th lost 3 privates killed, 2 captains, 1 lieutenant, 1 ensign, 2 sergeants, 2 corporals, and 17 privates wounded. The prospect of a peace seems to be as distant as ever.

THE CONTINENT.

FRANCE.

The France announces in a pretentious manner that the Emperor is meditating important combinations connected with the practice of the Constitution. The principal subject of the Emperor's deliberations is said to be the management of the Chambers. Speaking Ministers have failed both to withstand the assaults of the Opposition or to satisfy the Ministers of State, whose acts of administration it was their duty to defend. The France is well pleased with the existing order of things, but is prepared to admire whatever the lofty wisdom and liberal mind of the Emperor may ordain.

It is affirmed that the Minister of Finance is contemplating certain reforms of a liberal tendency in the system of custom houses on the French and Spanish frontiers.

The Emperor received the Duke of Cambridge on Friday last at the Tuileries. The Empress is staying at Schwalbach.

Prince Napoleon and the Princess Marie Clotilde returned to Paris by Havre on Thursday, September 15. Their Highnesses have since left Paris for Switzerland.

Prince Lucien Murat was at Tunis on September 10, accompanied by the Princess Anna Murat. They intended to visit Carthage and to continue their journey along the coasts of the Mediterranean, with the final object of reaching Jerusalem.

By a decree of the Emperor, a chair of political economy has been established in the Faculty of Law at Paris.

Great activity is visible at Toulon in the embarcation of troops for Algeria. The steamships Labrador, Gomer, Tarn, and Sèvre are all fitted as transports, and are in readiness to convey the forces designed for service. Rear-Admiral Lacapelle has sailed for Algeria in command of the steam-corvette Tanger. Marshal MacMahon has also gone to assume the command.

M. Maréchal, holding the rank of Adjutant-Commandant in the French army, has been promoted to the grade of Commander of the Legion of Honour. The gallant officer is of the ripe age of 101 years. It must not, however, be supposed that even the venerable M. Maréchal is the father of the army of France. That honourable position is claimed by Colonel Dubois-Fresney, who attained the age of 106 years on the 2nd of August last.

The town of Autun has acquitted itself in a manner highly agreeable to the friends of progress and of the Imperial dynasty. There the several societies of agriculture, horticulture, and pisciculture have united with the ancient Eduen Society, which, to use the words of the orator of the occasion, traces up the greatness of the men of the past to stimulate the rising generation, in a grand commemorative banquet. The Prefect of the Saone-et-Loire was in the chair, supported by the Archbishop of Smyrna, the Bishop of La Rochelle, and the chief notabilities of the department. After dinner M. Schneider, the Vice-President of the Corps Législatif, proposed the health of the Emperor in a speech replete with eloquence. In his eyes that assembly was but a picture of the tranquillity and harmony that reigned throughout France. Religion, civil administration, labour, its conditions and rewards, commerce, arts, and sciences, all were represented even as in France herself. To the Emperor, the author of liberty and order, those results were due.

If all French sportsmen were content to follow the example of the individual who last week figured in our columns as the successful destroyer, by a skilful ground shot, of thirteen partridges out of a covey of fourteen, the reader might indulge in a smile at the quaint method of sport, but would at least have no cause to weep. Unfortunately September in France has been signalised by acts of awkward mischief accompanied by more terrible results than the murder of thirteen birds. Thus, a M. Ferment, imagining that he was cleverly arresting the flight of a roebuck, kills a poor woodcutter. Again, at Remilly, a gentleman receives the whole charge of his neighbour's gun full in the face. The accident is not fatal, but the victim only escapes with the loss of an eye and horrid injuries to the cheek and head. On the banks of the Moselle, father and son take shelter from the rain, and enter the kitchen of the family château. The gun held by the father explodes, and the son aged twenty-five years lies dead at the feet of a parent and of a sister. Indeed, a Parisian paper confesses that the provincial journals abound with stories of accidents caused by firearms.

Love plays sad havoc even with creatures in whom a romantic turn could scarcely be suspected. What trade can be less sentimental than that of a grocer, what place more prosaic than a by-street in a large town? Yet even over these obstacles imagination may triumph. A patrol was exploring on its rounds a lane in Paris about the hour of one in the morning, when the sounds of a guitar accompanied by an air of soft melancholy struck upon the wondering ears of the soldiery. Serenades were not familiar to the city guards, and a search was at once made in the direction of the musician of the night. Wonder grew into amazement when the spectacle of a young man, with no other garment than his guitar, presented itself. To arrest, clothe, and conduct the serenader to the guardhouse was the work of a few minutes. The poor devotee of music and cold nights proved to be a young grocer, with whose senses love, disappointment, and jealousy had played sad havoc. It is to be hoped that the care of the physicians to whose charge he was committed, will restore him to his right mind and his unromantic groceries.

DENMARK AND GERMANY.

The Peace Conference at Vienna has not made much progress towards a settlement, and the armistice is to be prolonged. Denmark does not interpose any obstacle, but the two German Powers are at variance. Prussia, having snubbed the Diet, wishes to snub Austria, but the latter has no idea of consigning the lead to her rival.

A correspondence has been published that shows that Earl Russell cannot patiently endure a flagrant insult added to a flagrant injustice. On August 9 M. Bismarck wrote a despatch, of which a copy was to be left with the British Foreign Secretary, in which he calls upon the noble Earl to give the German Powers credit for their 'moderation and placability.' M. Bismarck says they did not wish to dismember the Danish monarchy, but only to bring about a separation of parts of it; and he adds: 'The Danish monarchy is not imperilled in its existence: not a single condition of its existence is damaged; it has received no wounds which cannot be healed.' To this Earl Russell replies that Her Majesty's Government would have preferred not to discuss the terms of peace, but as M. Bismarck challenges it, Her Majesty's Government declares that the war was neither just nor necessary, and that they lament that the success of the German arms should be used to dismember the Danish monarchy. The Prussians are angry with Earl Russell for writing this despatch, yet surely they must know that the war against Denmark was neither just nor necessary, and that Denmark has been dismembered.

DENMARK.

Denmark has thrown off her mourning garments, and in festive mood has welcomed to the home of her girlhood the Princess of Wales. That the Prince and Princess of Wales and their baby would receive an ovation no one doubted, but there is a cordiality about the reception that is exceedingly touching. National affliction is forgotten for a moment, and the people do not visit the sins of Earl Russell on the innocent head of the Prince of Wales. Nor is this visit devoid of political significance. King Christian declared in the presence of the Prince of Wales that His Royal Highness had deeply sympathised with the sufferings of Denmark, and this declaration will not fail to produce an effect in England and on the Continent. It is refreshing, after the party equivocation of the past session, to hear upon authority that the Prince of Wales cordially sympathises with the popular sentiment in favour of Denmark.

PRUSSIA.

The Crown Princess gave birth to a son on the 15th inst. Her Royal Highness and the infant Prince are doing well.

RUSSIA.

The Grand Khan of Bokhara seems to entertain peculiar notions on the rights of hospitality. Four Italian gentlemen visited his dominions, for reasons best known to themselves. The Prime Minister of the Khan did the strangers the honour of asking them to dinner, and imprisoned his guests immediately on their appearance at the festive board. The wretched men were stripped of everything, and all their effects were sold, a sure sign of approaching decapitation. However, the Czar of Russia intervened, and at his request, after thirteen months of captivity, the Italians were set at liberty. These gentlemen finally made their way to St. Petersburg, and were received by a large concourse of people interested in their fate. Prince Gortschakoff even entertained them, more hospitably, it may be believed, than his compeer in the service of the Grand Khan. However, the Emir has written to the Czar to say that for the future he intends to decapitate all strangers who are caught in his dominions, without respect of persons. Poor Dr. Wolff must turn uneasily in his grave at such an announcement.

POLAND.

The Czar seems to some extent willing to make amends to unfortunate Poland for the sufferings endured by her. An Imperial rescript has been issued creating a university at Warsaw, and establishing schools of various grades and a free school for women. In these schools the Poles will preserve their own language, and for other nationalities special schools are to be organised, in which the idioms of the respective nationalities will be used. The penal code is modified, and corporal punishment abolished.

The Pope has addressed an encyclical letter to the Polish bishops. In it the conduct of the Russian Government in the persecution of the Poles and of the Catholic church is pronounced to be worthy of condemnation in the sight of heaven and earth; at the same time the revolution is made subject to censure on the ground that Catholics owe obedience to the civil authority. In conclusion His Holiness threatens the persecutors with Divine justice, 'which,' says he, 'will soon appear, for the time of mercy is short, and the powerful are powerfully chastised.'

The Emperor of Russia has arrived at Schwalbach, and has visited the Empress of the French.

ITALY.

Where there is much smoke there is generally some fire, and it cannot be without reason that the French and Italian newspapers teem with reports, more or less trustworthy, of the terms of the new Convention between the Governments of France and Italy, negotiated between the Marquis de Pepoli and M. Drouyn de Lhuys. The general agreement, if we except the silence of some journals and the ambiguous denial of others, points to the following stipulations. After the lapse of two years from the date of the treaty, the occupation of Rome by the French troops is to cease. In the meantime the Italian Government engages to watch the frontier which divides the kingdom of Italy from the Roman States, so that no army either of regular troops or of volunteers can enter the territory of the Holy See to disturb its tranquillity. The Italian Government is to take upon itself five-sixths of the Roman debt. There are also articles for the regulation of what concerns the necessities of Catholic worship, vacant bishoprics, &c. It is further affirmed that the Pontifical Government, to some extent, lends its sanction to the treaty. The report has set men speculating wildly on the question whether Italy is one whit nearer to the real possession of Rome than before. A more immediate discussion has however arisen on the probable change of the capital of Italy from Turin to Florence, and it is fully expected that the King will announce such a determination from the throne to the Chambers on their assembling on the 11th of October next. The session will probably be short, a dissolution will follow, and the new Parliament will meet in April, 1865.

SPAIN.

The following is the list of the new Spanish Ministry:—President of the Council without Portfolio, Marshal Narvaez; Minister of Foreign Affairs, Señor Llorente; Minister of War, Señor Cordova; Minister of Justice, Señor Lorenzo Arrazola; Minister of Marine, Señor Armera; Minister of Interior, Señor Gonzalez Bravo; Minister of Finance, Señor Manuel Barzanollana; Minister of Public Works, Señor Galiano; Minister of Public Worship, Señor Seijas Lozano.

A circular of the Minister of the Interior has been addressed to the Civil Governors recommending them to treat impartially all political parties, and at the same time to exercise severity in the maintenance of law and order.

COCHIN-CHINA.

Considerable uncertainty seems to exist with regard to the state of affairs in Cochin-China. That M. Aubaret has negotiated a treaty is certain. Whether the terms will be approved by the authorities at Paris, or the whole transaction be repudiated, is yet matter of speculation. The Government organs remark on the spirit of opposition which jumps at a conclusion condemnatory of the Administration before the possibility of enquiry. Their silence on the true state of things indicates considerable trouble in the official mind, and a difficulty in putting a good face on the unsatisfactory results of French policy.

THE ARGENTINE REPUBLIC.

The Argentine Republic appears to have taken a leaf out of the book of the executive at Washington. Letters from Buenos Ayres affirm that the Terrible had arrived from Marseilles with seventy Italians on board destined for the service of the Argentine Republic, and furnished with passports delivered by the consular authorities. These seventy were to be followed by 500 more recruits already enlisted by agents sent expressly to Europe. It is affirmed that these unfortunate men, enticed by vain promises and lying proclamations, were likely to find themselves in a deplorable situation. It was, however, believed that the Italian Government had taken steps in the matter.

MEXICO.

By the terms of the Convention made at Miramar between the Emperor of Mexico and the French Government, an annual sum of 25,000,000 francs was to be paid into the hands of the paymaster of the French army in Mexico, at the rate of 2,083,333 francs a month. The first instalment, due on July 31, has been paid in gold at Mexico. The pay of the Mexican army would also, from July 1, fall on the Mexican Government. An additional sum, amounting to 1,742,000 francs, had been paid into the French exchequer to reimburse certain advances made during the month of July.

PROSPECT OF MR. LINCOLN'S REELECTION. — The New York Herald says: 'The reelection of Lincoln is regarded as not impossible, and therefore the prospect is regarded as gloomy enough, and one promising only more long years of war, and we have tasted enough of that to know what it means.'

THE PEACE MISSION TO RICHMOND.

THE New York papers copy from the Richmond papers the following circular addressed by Secretary Benjamin to the foreign agents of the Confederate Government:—

Department of State: Richmond, August 25, 1864.

Sir,—Numerous publications which have recently appeared in the journals of the United States, on the subject of informal overtures for peace between the two federations of States now at war on this continent, render it desirable that you should be fully advised of the views and policy of this Government on a matter of such paramount importance. It is likewise proper that you should be accurately informed of what has occurred on the several occasions mentioned in the published statements.

You have heretofore been furnished with copies of the manifesto issued by the Congress of the Confederate States with the approval of the President, on the 14th of June last, and have doubtless acted in conformity with the resolution which requested that copies of this manifesto should be laid before foreign Governments. 'The principal sentiments and purposes by which these States have been and are still actuated,' are set forth in that paper with all the authority due to the solemn declaration of the Legislative and Executive Departments of this Government, and with a clearness which leaves no room for comment or explanation. In a few sentences it is pointed out that all we ask is immunity from interference with our internal peace and prosperity, 'and to be left in the undisturbed enjoyment of those inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, which our common ancestors declared to be the equal heritage of all parties to the social compact. Let them forbear aggressions upon us, and the war is at an end. If there be questions which require adjustment by negotiation, we have ever been willing, and are still willing, to enter into communication with our adversaries in a spirit of equity and manly frankness.' The manifesto closed with the declaration that 'we commit our cause to the enlightened judgment of the world, to the sober reflections of our adversaries themselves, and to the solemn and righteous arbitration of Heaven.'

Within a very few weeks after the publication of this manifesto, it seemed to have met with a response from President Lincoln. In the early part of last month a letter was received by General Lee from Lieutenant-General Grant, in the following words:—

'Headquarters, Armies of the United States,
City Point, Va., July 8, 1864.

'General R. E. Lee, commanding Confederate forces near Petersburg, Virginia.

'General,—I would request that Colonel James F. Jaques, 73rd Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and J. R. Gilmore, Esq., be allowed to meet Colonel Robert Ould, Commissioner for the Exchange of Prisoners, at such place between the lines of the two armies as you may designate. The object of the meeting is legitimate with the duties of Colonel Ould as Commissioner.

'If not consistent for you to grant the request here asked, I would beg that this be referred to President Davis for his action.

'Requesting as early an answer to this communication as you may find it convenient to make, I subscribe myself, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

'U. S. GRANT, Lieutenant-General U. S. A.'

On the reference of this letter to the President he authorised Colonel Ould to meet the persons named in General Grant's letter; and Colonel Ould, after seeing them, returned to Richmond and reported to the President, in the presence of the Secretary of War and myself, that Messrs. Jaques and Gilmore had not said anything to him about his duties as Commissioner for exchange of prisoners, but that they asked permission to come to Richmond to see the President; that they came with the knowledge and approval of President Lincoln, and under his pass; that they were informal messengers sent with a view of paving the way for a meeting of formal commissioners authorised to negotiate for peace, and desired to communicate to President Davis the views of Mr. Lincoln, and to obtain the President's views in return, so as to arrange for a meeting of commissioners. Colonel Ould stated that he had told them repeatedly that it was useless to come to Richmond to talk of peace on any terms other than the recognised independence of the Confederacy, to which they said they were aware of that, and that they were nevertheless confident that their interview would result in peace. The President, on this report of Colonel Ould, determined to permit them to come to Richmond under his charge.

On the evening of July 16, Colonel Ould conducted these gentlemen to an hotel in Richmond, where a room was provided for them, in which they were to remain under surveillance during their stay here, and the next morning I received the following letter:—

'Spottswood Hotel, Richmond, Va., July 17, 1864.

'Hon. J. P. Benjamin, Secretary of State, Confederate States of America.

'Dear Sir,—The undersigned, James F. Jaques, of Illinois, and James R. Gilmore, of Massachusetts, most respectfully solicit an interview with President Davis. They visit Richmond as private citizens, and have no official character or authority; but they are fully possessed of the views of the United States Government relative to an adjustment of the differences now existing between North and South, and have little doubt that a free interchange of views between President Davis and themselves would open the way to such official negotiations as would ultimate in restoring peace to the two sections of our distracted country.

'They therefore ask an interview with the President, and, awaiting your reply, are, most truly and respectfully, your obedient servants,

'JAS. F. JAQUES,
'JAS. R. GILMORE.'

The word 'official' is underscored, and the word 'peace' doubly underscored, in the original.

After perusing the letter, I invited Colonel Ould to conduct the writers to my office, and on their arrival stated to them that they must be conscious they could not be admitted to an interview with the President without informing me more fully of the object of their mission, and satisfying me that they came by request of Mr. Lincoln. Mr. Gilmore replied that they came unofficially, but with the knowledge and at the desire of Mr. Lincoln; that they thought the war had gone far enough; that it could never end except by some sort of agreement; that the agreement might as well be made now as after still further bloodshed; that they knew by the recent address of the Confederate Congress that we were willing to make peace; that they admitted that proposals ought to come from the North, and that they were prepared to make these proposals by Mr. Lincoln's authority; that it was necessary to have a sort of informal understanding in advance of regular negotiations, for if commissioners were appointed without some such understanding, they would meet, quarrel, and separate, leaving the parties more bitter against each other than before; that they knew Mr. Lincoln's views, and would state them if pressed by the President to do so, and desired to learn his in return.

I again insisted on some evidence that they came from Mr Lincoln, and in order to satisfy me Mr. Gilmore referred to the fact that permission for their coming through our lines had been asked officially by General Grant in a letter to General Lee, and that General Grant in that letter had asked that this request should be referred to President Davis. Mr. Gilmore then showed me a card, written and signed by Mr. Lincoln, requesting General Grant to aid Mr. Gilmore and friend in passing through his lines into the Confederacy. Colonel Jaques then said his name was not put on the card for the reason that it was earnestly desired that their visit should be kept secret, that he had come into the Confederacy a year ago, and had visited Petersburg on a similar errand; and that it was feared, if his name should become known, that some of those who had formerly met in Petersburg would conjecture the purpose for which he now came. He said that the terms of peace which they would offer to the President would be honourable to the Confederacy; that they did not desire that the Confederacy should accept any other terms, but would be glad to have my promise, as they gave theirs, that their visit should be kept a profound secret if it failed to result in peace; that it would not be just that either party should seek any advantage by divulging the fact of their overture for peace if unsuccessful. I assented to this request, and then rising said: 'Do I understand you to state distinctly that you came as messengers from Mr. Lincoln for the purpose of agreeing with the President as to the proper mode of inaugurating a formal negotiation for peace, charged by Mr. Lincoln with authority for stating his own views and receiving those of President Davis?' Both answered in the affirmative, and I then said that the President would see them at my office the same evening, at 9 P.M.; that at least I presumed he would, but if he objected after hearing my report they should be informed. They were then recommitted to the charge of Colonel Ould, with the understanding that they were to be conducted to my office at the appointed hour, unless otherwise ordered.

This interview, connected with the report previously made by Colonel Ould, left on my mind the decided impression that Mr. Lincoln was averse to sending formal commissioners to open negotiations, lest he might be thereby deemed to have recognised the independence of the Confederacy, and that he was anxious to learn whether the conditions on which alone he would be willing to take such a step would be yielded by the Confederacy; that with this view he had placed his messengers in a condition to satisfy us that they really came from him, without committing himself to anything in the event of a disagreement as to such conditions as he considered to be indispensable. On informing the President thereof of my conclusion he determined that no question or form of etiquette should be an obstacle of his receiving any overtures that promised, however remotely, to result in putting an end to the carnage which marked the continuance of hostilities.

The President came to my office at nine o'clock in the evening, and Colonel Ould came a few moments later, with Messrs. Jaques and Gilmore. The President said to them that he had heard from me that they came as messengers of peace from Mr. Lincoln; that as such they were welcome; that the Confederacy had never concealed its desire for peace; and that he was ready to hear what they had to offer on the subject.

Mr. Gilmore then addressed the President, and in a few minutes had conveyed the information that those two gentlemen had come to Richmond impressed with the idea that this Government would accept a peace on the basis of a reconstruction of the Union, the abolition of slavery, and the grant of an amnesty to the people of the State as repentant criminals. In order to accomplish the abolition of slavery, it was proposed that there should be a general vote of all the people of both confederations, and the majority of the vote thus taken was to determine that as all other disputed questions. These were stated to be Mr. Lincoln's views. The President answered that as these proposals had been prefaced by the remark that the people of the North were a majority, and that a majority ought to govern, the offer was in effect a proposal that the Confederate States should surrender at discretion, admit that they had been wrong from the beginning of the contest, submit to the mercy of their enemies, and avow themselves to be in need of pardon for crimes; that extermination was preferable to such dishonour.

He stated that if they were themselves so unacquainted with the form of their own government as to make such propositions, Mr. Lincoln ought to have known, when giving them his views, that it was out of the power of the Confederate Government to act on the subject of the domestic institutions of the several States, each State having exclusive jurisdiction on that point, still less to commit the decision of such a question to the vote of a foreign people; that the separation of the States was an accomplished fact; that he had no authority to receive proposals for negotiation except by virtue of his office as President of an independent Confederacy, and on this basis alone must proposals be made to him.

At one period of the conversation Mr. Gilmore made use of some language referring to these States as 'rebels' while rendering an account of Mr. Lincoln's views, and apologised for the word. The President desired him to proceed, that no offence was taken, and that he wished Mr. Lincoln's language to be repeated to him as exactly as possible. Some further conversation took place, substantially to the same effect as the foregoing, when the President rose to indicate that the interview was at an end. The two gentlemen were then recommitted to the charge of Colonel Ould, and left Richmond the next day.

The account of the visit of Messrs. Gilmore and Jaques to Richmond has been rendered necessary by publications made by one or both of them since their return to the United States, notwithstanding the agreement that their visit was to be kept secret. They have, perhaps, concluded that, as their promise of secrecy was made at their request, it was permissible to disregard it. We had no reason for desiring to conceal what occurred, and have, therefore, no complaint to make of the publicity given to the fact of the visit. The extreme inaccuracy of Mr. Gilmore's narrative will be apparent to you from the foregoing statement.

You have no doubt seen in the Northern papers an account of another conference on the subject of peace, which took place in Canada, at about the same date, between Messrs. C. C. Clay and S. P. Holcombe, Confederate citizens of the highest character and position, and Mr. Horace Greeley, of New York, acting with authority of President Lincoln. It is deemed not improper to inform you that Messrs. Clay and Holcombe, although engaging in an earnest degree the confidence and esteem of the President, were strictly accurate in their statement that they were without any authority from this Government to treat with that of the United States on any subject whatever. We had no knowledge of their conference with Mr. Greeley, nor of their proposed visit to Washington till we saw the newspaper publications. A significant confirmation of the truth of the statement of Messrs. Gilmore and Jaques that they came as messengers to us in Mr. Lincoln is to be found in the fact that the views of Mr. Lincoln, as stated by them to the President, are in exact conformity with the offensive paper addressed to 'whom it may concern,' which was sent by Mr. Lincoln to Messrs. Clay and Holcombe by the hands of his private secretary, Mr. Hay, and which was properly regarded by those gentlemen as an insult: that Mr. Lincoln was unwilling that this war should cease while in his power to continue hostilities.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. P. BENJAMIN, Secretary of State.

FEDERAL ATROCITIES.—The Houston Daily Telegraph reports a speech delivered by Governor Morehead of Kentucky, from which we take the following:—'It was impossible for him in this presence, surrounded as he was by the matrons and daughters of Texas, to enter into details. This monster, it is true, was cashiered by a court martial of Federal officers, but he was immediately promoted by Lincoln to a Brigadier-General. He would not stop to portray the wanton devastation and ruin which marked the footsteps of the Federal army wherever it had gone. The smoking ruins of cities, villages, and towns, the indiscriminate seizure of private property, the destruction of libraries, pictures, and furniture, the deprivation of food of innocent women and children and old men, have become so common as to cease to excite surprise. In the remarkable letter of General Sherman, published to the world, while admitting that these things are contrary to all the laws of civilised warfare in Europe, he avows that these laws are not applicable to such a war as this, and commends this vandalism to his subordinates. He said that he need scarcely refer to Butler; he had earned an immortality of infamy. Farragut, upon the surrender of the city of New Orleans, had promised that life, liberty, and property should be sacredly protected. How that was done he need not say. The cold-blooded murder of Mumford, the inhuman imprisonment of a lady who happened to smile while the funeral of a Federal officer was passing, the sending to prison the most respectable citizens, some of them to wear a ball and chain, and to be placed at hard work; the wholesale robbery of whatever he could, on any pretence, no matter how frivolous, lay his hands upon, and a thousand minor acts of surpassing meanness and turpitude which have been detailed in private letters, is the answer to the promise of Farragut, and the commentary upon Federal good faith. He asked where in the annals of human butchery such a scene has been represented as the bloody plain of Palmyra, Missouri. A man by the name of Allsman, a Union man, was missing, whereupon General M'Neill, pretending to believe that he had been abducted by Southern sympathisers and murdered, issued an order that unless he was returned within a designated period, ten men to be selected by him should be shot in retaliation. They did not know where he was, and could not return him. The ten men were shot, and Allsman afterwards returned, having voluntarily absented himself. On the morning appointed for the shooting of these ten men, the wife of one of them called upon Captain Strachan, one of M'Neill's officers, with six little children, and implored the inhuman wretch to release her husband from the sentence. He at first refused, but finally told her if she would give him $500 and submit to another condition which he imposed, he would release him. The money was raised and paid, a Mr. Revely, of Palmyra, paying $300 of it, and Strachan now stands indicted for the most horrid of crimes in connection with this affair; yet this man, by the destruction of the elective franchise, with this indictment pending, has been elected a member of Mr. Lincoln's Missouri legislature. Another woman applied for the pardon of her husband, and was told if she would find a substitute he should be released. She naturally supposed that the condition was an impossible one, but a young man stepped forward and said he had no ties of wife and children to bind him to the world, and offered to take his place—he was accepted and shot. Another case was that of a man with a wife and one child, a boy of 12 or 14 years of age—the mother was lying on a sick bed and unable to go and intercede for her doomed husband. The boy went to M'Neill and begged, entreated, and implored him to spare the life of his father, in the simplicity of his nature telling him what a kind and good father he was and how much he loved him—that it would kill his mother, and at this thought he burst into tears, and said "I know, General, when you think on these things you will not kill my father." The obdurate murderer refused to pardon him, but permitted the heart-broken boy to ride with his father to the place of execution; and through the streets of Palmyra that boy was seen on the cart, containing a coffin, clinging with convulsive agony to that father who was seated on it. At the place of execution he had to be torn by ruffian hands from his father's embrace. On the return of that cart with the dead body of the father, the boy was seated on the coffin, with his head hanging down, but with dry eyes—the agony was too great for tears. He bent his silent steps to the bedside of his sick mother to tell the dreadful tale.'

AN ENGLISH DESERTER.—A non-commissioned officer in the garrison of Kingston, Canada West, received last month a letter dated from the camp before Petersburg, written by a deserter who, signing himself anonymously 'A Gunner of the Royal Artillery,' is well known. The writer says: 'I am sorry that I was such a fool as to be persuaded to come over here, where you are driven about worse than niggers. Please to tell my comrades not to be guided by them crimps, for they tell you that you'll get $800, but it is no such thing: all you get is $100, and that they will rob you of if you don't look out. I will tell you who brought me over; . . . If you go and search their house you will find some of my clothes there. Them men ought to be severely punished for I tell you it is nothing better than trading with a lot of cattle. There are some more that are trying to get away, and they say they will get them away in spite of you. Please tell them if they know when they are well off they will stop where they are, unless they want to be treated worse than slaves. Please to put this in the papers, so as no other soldier shall be duped. Please tell them not to believe their —— lies, for it is all falsity; what they want is to sell them as slaves. They ought to be found out and punished. I would freely do four years to be back again. Please let my comrades see this.'—The Times.

SECRETARY SEWARD ON THE OBJECTS OF THE WAR.

MR. SEWARD delivered an address at Auburn on the occasion of rejoicings at the occupation of Atlanta by the Federals. Of course he took a sanguine view of the military situation, and abused the Democrats for their party spirit and disloyalty. Respecting the Presidential election and the objects of the war he spoke as follows:—

First, I beg you to remember that the present is not a common or customary Presidential election. It occurs in the midst of civil war, arising out of a disputed succession to the executive power. Disputed successions are the most frequent causes of civil wars, not only in republics, but even in monarchies. A dispute about the succession of the President periodically begets an abortive or a real revolution, in each of the Spanish and American Republics. So the disputed succession of the Spanish throne begot that memorable Thirty Years' War which convulsed all Europe. A dispute whether Juarez was the lawful President brought on the present civil war, with the consequence of French intervention, in Mexico. A dispute whether the present King of Denmark, who succeeded to the throne last winter, is lawful heir to the Duchies of Slesvig and Holstein, brought about the civil war in that country, which, through German intervention, has just now ended with the dismemberment of the Danish kingdom. It is remarkable also that civil wars produced by disputed successions invariably begin with resistance, by some one or more of the States or provinces which constitute the kingdom, empire, or republic, which is disturbed. It was so in the United States of Mexico; it was so in the United States of Colombia; and the case was the same in the United States of Venezuela. Now it is certain that in 1860 we elected Abraham Lincoln, lawfully and constitutionally, to be President of the whole United States of America. Seven of the States immediately thereon rushed into disunion, and summoning eight more to their alliance, they set up a revolutionary Government. They levied war against us to effect a separation and establish a distinct sovereignty and independence. We accepted the war in defence of the Union.

It is clear, therefore, that we are fighting to make Abraham Lincoln President of the whole United States, under the election of 1860, to continue until March 4, 1865. In voting for a President of the United States, can we wisely or safely vote out the identical person whom, with force and arms, we are fighting into the Presidency? (No, no.) You justly say no. It would be nothing less than to give up the very object of the war at the ballot-box. The moral strength which makes our loyal position impregnable would pass from us; and when that moral strength has passed away material forces are no longer effective, or even available. By such a proceeding we shall have agreed with the enemy, and shall have given him the victory. But in that agreement the Constitution and the Union will have perished, because when it shall have once been proved that a minority can, by force or circumvention, defeat the full accession of a constitutionally chosen President, no President thereafter, though elected by ever so large a majority, can hope to exercise the executive powers unopposed throughout the whole country. One of two things must follow that fatal error. Either a contest between your newly-elected compromise President and the same usurper, in which the usurper must prevail, or else a combination between them through which the usurper or his successor, subverting your Constitution and substituting his own, will become President, King, or Emperor of the United States, without foreign aid if he can, with foreign intervention if necessary.—(That's so.) To be sure it is so; nothing is more certain than that either the United States and their constitutional President, or the so-called Confederate States, and their usurping President, must rule within the limits of this Republic. I therefore regard the pending Presidential election as involving the question whether hereafter we shall have a Constitution and a country left us. How shall we vote then to save our country from this fearful danger? (Vote Lincoln in again.) You have hit it exactly, my friend. We must vote Lincoln in again, and fight him in at the same time. If we do this the rebellion will perish, and leave no root. If we do otherwise, we have only the alternative of acquiescence in a perpetual usurpation, or of entering on an endless succession of civil and social wars. Upon these grounds, entirely irrespective of platform and candidate, I consider the recommendations of the Constitution at Chicago as tending to subvert the Republic. (It's so, that's a fact.) It will seem a hard thing when I imply that a party like the Democratic party can either meditate or blindly adopt measures to overthrow the Republic. All experience, however, shows that it is by the malice or madness of great parties that free States have been brought down to destruction. You often hear alarms that a party in power is subverting the State, and it sometimes happens so. But nine times out of ten, it is a party out of power that in its impatience or ambition overthrows a republic. . . They say I am always too sanguine of the success of national candidates and of the national arms. But it seems to me that the veriest croaker in all our loyal camp will take new courage and become heroic when he sees that the last hope of the rebellion hangs upon the ratification of this abominable and detestable compact by the American people. . . And what a time is this to proclaim such a policy, conceived in treachery, and brought forth with shameless effrontery! A cessation of hostilities on the heel of decisive naval and land battles, at the very moment that the rebellion, without a single fort in its possession on the coast, or on either of the great rivers or lakes, is crumbling to the earth, and at the same time a dozen new ships of war are going to complete the investment by sea, and three hundred thousand volunteers are rushing to the lines, to complete the work of restoration and pacification.

The chief complaint against the President is that he will not accept peace on the basis of the integrity of the Union, without having also the abandonment of slavery. When and where have the insurgents offered him peace on the basis of the integrity of the Union? Nobody has offered it. The rebels never will offer it. They are determined and pledged to rule this Republic or ruin it. I told you here a year ago that practically slavery was no longer in question—that it was perishing under the operation of the war. That assertion has been confirmed. The Union men in all the slave States that we have delivered are even more anxious than we are to abolish slavery. Witness Western Virginia, Maryland, Missouri, Louisiana, Tennessee, and Arkansas. Jefferson Davis tells you, in effect, the same thing. He says that it is not slavery, but independence and sovereignty, for which he is contending. There is good reason for this. A hundred dollars in gold is only a year's purchase of the labour of the working man in every part of the United States. At less than half that price you could buy all the slaves in the country. Nevertheless, our opponents want a distinct exposition of the President's views on the ultimate solution of the slavery question. Why do they want it? For the same reason that the Pharisees and Sadducees wanted an authoritative resolution of the questions of casuistry which arose in their day. One of those sects believed in a kingdom to come, and the other denied the resurrection of the dead. Nevertheless, they walked together in loving accord in search of instruction concerning the spirit-world. 'Master,' said they, 'there was a man of our nation who married a wife and died, leaving six brothers. Those brothers successively married the widowed woman, and afterwards died. And last of all the woman died also. In the resurrection which of the seven shall have this woman to wife.' Now what was it to them whether one or all should have the woman to wife in heaven? It could be nothing to the Sadducees in any case. What was it to any human being on this side of the grave? What was it to any human being in heaven except the woman and her seven husbands? Absolutely nothing. Yet they would have an answer. And they received one. The answer was that while in this mortal state men and women shall never cease to marry and to die, there will be in the resurrection neither death nor marrying nor giving in marriage. Although altogether unauthorised to speak for the President upon hypothetical questions, I think I can give an answer upon the subject of slavery at the present day—an answer which will be explicit, and I hope not altogether unsatisfactory. While the rebels continue to wage war against the Government of the United States, the military measures affecting slavery, which have been adopted from necessity, to bring the war to a speedy and successful end, will be continued, except so far as practical experience shall show that they can be modified advantageously, with a view to the same end. When the insurgents shall have disbanded their armies, and laid down their arms, the war will instantly cease, and all the war measures then existing, including those which affect slavery, will cease also, and all the moral, economical, and political questions, as well questions affecting slavery as others, which shall then be existing between individuals and States and the Federal Government, whether they arose before the civil war began, or whether they grew out of it, will, by force of the Constitution, pass over to the arbitrament of courts of law, and to the councils of legislation.

THE SHERIDAN RAID.

A correspondent of the New York Daily News writes:—

'There is one feature in the recent retreat of Sheridan down the Valley of Virginia from Strasburg, which, though universally known in this section, has not yet been made public. I refer to the wanton destruction of all the wheat, hay, and forage, for many miles in the track of the retreating army. A few miles beyond Winchester the order was given to put the torch to all the combustible material of this character from mountain to mountain throughout the valley, and it was done. Large stocks of wheat, which had just been secured, after great toil and expense; barns filled with the same precious cereal; hay which the innocent husbandman had ricked to keep alive his stock this winter, all alike were given to the consuming flames. This cruel order affected thousands of women and children, old men and non-combatants, who have nothing else to depend upon for sustenance, for the fire embraced a greater portion of three counties—Frederick, Clarke, and Jefferson—a distance of thirty-five miles in length and fifteen or twenty in breadth. The destruction extended particularly around Winchester, Berryville, and Charlestown.'

The New York Daily News of September 2 thus comments on Sheridan's atrocities:—'The Blue Ridge on one side, and the range known as the North Mountain on the other, bound the Valley of Virginia. Twenty miles across the intervening country is a flat of land teeming with riches, and almost every foot divided into fields. Sheridan, in his late retreat from Strasburg, seeing its fields waving with corn, covered with hay-stacks, dotted with wheat ricks, set the whole on fire, until from the mountain on one side to that on the other, that lovely valley has been reduced to a grim and blackened desert! The granaries that had received some of the early harvest he committed to the flames; and now from Winchester to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad there does not remain of this year's crop a day's food for man or beast. Early's army of invasion has already marched from Strasburg to the Potomac. Timour the Tartar could not have presented his soldiers with a sight worse than that which shocked their senses and aroused their passions as they came along. Their burning homes along the Mississippi, in far-off Louisiana, and down where the ferocity of Black Republicanism was represented so well by General Hunter, had not made their advance one of desolation when they passed last year through the fairest valley of Pennsylvania. Their honourable forbearance then has, however, not stayed the hand of the destroyer of their homes and fields; and they now pass again northwardly, seeing for thirty miles on the ir way a hideous desolation that may well goad them at the very moment of their crossing of the Potomac into a spirit of wild revenge. Chambersburg has been offered up already as an expiation for some of the crimes of Hunter. Where shall the hand of the destroying angel fall in terrible punishment for that of Sheridan? On him be the responsibility of the cruel blow that is this moment suspended over the homesteads of a thousand men of Pennsylvania; and when that blow shall have been dealt by men outraged to madness, let the victims recollect who will have been the real author of their misfortunes. Curses loud, deep, and righteous, will, we fear, be heaped before long, by thousands of ruined families in the Valley of the Wyoming, on the head of General Sheridan.'

CONFEDERATE OFFICIAL REPORTS.

THE following is General Hood's account of the surrender of Atlanta:—

Headquarters, September 3, 1864.

On the evening of August 30 the enemy made a lodgement across Flint River, near Jonesborough. We attacked them there on the evening of the 31st with two corps, but failed to dislodge them. This made it necessary to abandon Atlanta, which was done on the night of September 1. Our loss on the evening of the 31st was small. On the evening of September 1, General Hardee's Corps, in position at Jonesborough, was assaulted by a superior force of the enemy, and, being outflanked, was compelled to withdraw during the night, with the loss of eight guns. The enemy's prisoners report their loss very severe.

(Signed) J. P. HOOD, General.

Headquarters 3rd Corps, August 31, 1864.

Colonel,—I have the honour to report the correct list of results in the fight of the 25th at Reams' Station. We captured 12 stands of colours, 9 pieces of artillery, 10 caissons, 2,150 prisoners, 3,100 stand of small arms, and 32 horses. My own loss in cavalry, artillery, and infantry, is 720 men killed, wounded, and missing.

Very respectfully,
A. P. HILL, Lieutenant-General.

To Colonel W. H. Taylor, A.A.G.

Headquarters Army of Northern Virginia,
August 26, 1864.

Hon. J. A. Seddon, Secretary of War:

General A. P. Hill attacked the enemy in his entrenchments at Reams' Station yesterday evening, and at the second assault carried his entire line.

Cooke's and McRae's North Carolina brigades, under General Heth, and Lane's North Carolina brigade of Wilcox's division, under General Connor, with Pegram's artillery, composed the assaulting column.

One line of breastworks was carried by the cavalry under General Hampton with great gallantry, who contributed largely to the success of the day.

Seven stands of colours, 2,000 prisoners, and 9 pieces of artillery are in our possession.

The loss of the enemy in killed and wounded is reported to be heavy; ours relatively small.

Our profound gratitude is due to the Giver of all victory, and our thanks to the brave men and officers engaged.

R. E. LEE.

HOW SOUTHERN RAILROADS ARE REPAIRED.

(From the Richmond Enquirer.)

IN regard to the ability of our railroad authorities to repair the ravages of Yankee raiders, we have facts within our knowledge which prove that the most extensive injuries yet inflicted have been soon repaired, in some cases before the routed force of the raiders could have rested from their fatigue. The raid of Sheridan upon the Danville Road was—if we mistake not—repaired within four or five days. The repairs on the Central Road were completed with equal celerity.

The most extensive injuries and the most thorough repairs, however, upon any railroad in Virginia, have been those upon the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad. There have been several demonstrations for the destruction of this important thoroughfare. In the raid of May, 1864, twenty-three bridges were burned among them that across New River. It was 60 feet high and 800 feet long, and the water from 5 to 12 feet in depth over the foundations. There was not a stick of timber cut for this bridge at the time of its destruction, and yet the materials were provided and the work executed in nineteen days from the first blow struck. The raid of Hunter took place in the middle of June. The work of destruction was thoroughly organised. Brigades tore up the track; mechanics, detailed and provided with tools for the purpose, piled, burnt, and destroyed the cross-ties and rail with as much system as had been employed in the construction of the road. They destroyed every bridge from Lynchburg to Salem, a distance of sixty miles, and rendered it necessary to replace from 15,000 to 20,000 cross-ties. The rails had been heated, bent, and twisted, and were straightened and replaced. The timber for these bridges and cross-ties, as well as for woodsheds and water-tanks, and other necessary structures, were growing in the woods when the raid occurred. The enemy had destroyed about 4,000 lineal feet of bridging. One of these bridges was nearly 800 feet long and about 60 feet high. The whole of these repairs, except the principal bridge, were effected in nineteen days, and the road in running order from Lynchburg to Bristol within less than sixty days from the day of its destruction.

Thus was the sixth raid made upon the road within the year repaired before Hunter could fly, with his routed rogues, beyond the reach of our brave soldiers. The cost of the whole repairs to this road may have been half a million of Confederate money. What has been the cost of the raid which occasioned it? It cannot be computed in money; but we know that Hunter lost from four to six thousand men, from four to five thousand horses, with several pieces of artillery, a large number of small arms, and military stores of great value. Long before Hunter had recovered from the defeat and demoralisation of his army, the road was repaired and performing its great work of supplying the defenders of the country and conducting the intercourse of the country. This is a most important demonstration, both to the Yankees and ourselves. It teaches both that the resources and constructive ability of the Southern men have been underrated. It proves that we can build, repair, and run our railroads without the aid of Yankee enterprise.

THE FLORIDA.—A private letter to a New York firm, dated Pernambuco, July 29, says: 'The Confederate States steamer Florida has been off the port of Bahia for three days, and an officer was on shore in disguise purchasing provisions. She reports that off Maccio they captured and burned the large American ship Nicholas Mills, or some such name, with $72,000 in specie on board.' It is supposed in New York that the name of the captured ship is the Nicholas Biddle, instead of the Nicholas Mills. The Biddle was due in Brazilian waters about the time indicated.

A NORTHERN ACCOUNT OF SHERMAN'S MOVEMENT.

(From the Philadelphia Age, September 5.)

It has been about ten days since General Sherman began a movement, much of which is still involved in mystery. One corps of his army, under General Slocum, was left in the trenches in front of Atlanta. The remainder was gradually withdrawn, formed in a long column on the south bank of the Chattahoochee, and slowly marched down the river. Parallel to the river, and about eight miles south of it, is the Montgomery Railroad. East Point is eight miles south-west of Atlanta, Red Oak 20 miles, and Fairburn 25 miles south-west. At East Point the Macon Railroad begins. It runs south to Jonesborough, and then south-east. Jonesborough is 20 miles from Atlanta. But very little intelligence of Sherman's movement was transmitted north, for during almost all the time since it began Wheeler had the railroad and telegraph to Nashville cut, and there was no communication. Sherman marched his column down the river, until the rear reached Sandtown, ten miles west of Atlanta. He then swung the head of it round toward the east until it struck the Montgomery Railroad at Fairburn. From Fairburn a raiding party was sent across the country to Jonesborough, on the Macon Railroad. The road was cut, but no very large force of the enemy found. On August 28, General Hood telegraphed to Richmond that Sherman's line extended from Sandtown to Fairburn, thus being south-west of the city, and Hood at once began moving his army to meet the Federal advance. Sherman's southern flank marched unopposed up the Montgomery Railroad, from Fairburn toward Atlanta, until it reached Red Oak, 20 miles from the city. Here the Confederates met the troops, and they halted. Sherman's southern flank was then marched south-east from Sandtown toward East Point, eight miles from Atlanta. On Tuesday last, August 30, Sherman's line extended from Red Oak north-east along the railroad toward East Point, and his northern flank was pressing toward East Point from the direction of Sandtown. Hood, finding the enemy south-west of him, at once abandoned Atlanta, and gave Sherman battle. A contest began on Tuesday afternoon along the Montgomery Railroad, from Red Oak to East Point, a distance of 12 miles. Slocum, who had been left with one corps in front of Atlanta, began to feel the enemy in front of him. He found the city abandoned, and on Friday morning entered it. He at once announced the evacuation of the town, and by a strange coincidence Wheeler was off the railroad to Nashville just long enough to allow of the despatch being sent. Scarcely had it gone when Wheeler again cut the telegraph, and a veil once more hid Sherman's operations. Slocum, having the enemy between him and Sherman's main body, could not tell what was going on at East Point. He knew a battle was being fought, for he heard the cannon, but that was all. Up to Sunday morning this was all the intelligence sent us. This morning, however, we have later intelligence. Last evening the telegraph was reopened, and a despatch from Sherman himself received. The enemy on Tuesday had not fought him very desperately, but gradually retreated across the country towards Jonesborough. Sherman followed them. He brought his entire army south of the Montgomery Railroad, and by Thursday had arrived within a mile of Jonesborough. Here he found the enemy intrenched. They sent out a reconnaissance, which was soon repulsed, and Sherman made his arrangements for an attack. The Confederates by this time had retreated from Atlanta, and were drawn up in line on the Macon Railroad. Their southern flank was at Jonesborough; their northern flank at Rough and Ready, a village thirteen miles from Atlanta. In front of their position Flint River flowed, and the hills on its eastern side were intrenched. It was this position which Sherman attacked on Thursday afternoon. He carried the Confederate works at Jonesborough, capturing ten cannon and 1,000 prisoners. Hood blew up his works in evacuating Atlanta, and destroyed some trains loaded with ammunition. The spoils secured by Slocum were fourteen cannon and the ruins of the destroyed trains. When the works at Jonesborough were carried Hood abandoned his line on the Flint River, and by a hasty march to the south-west moved the portion of his army which had been north of Jonesborough to the east of the place. He then retreated with all his forces to Lovejoy's, six miles south-west of Jonesborough, on the railroad. Here he took a new position. Sherman writes to Stanton 'his army needs rest,' and does not seem to intend an attack upon the new Confederate position.

SHELLING ATLANTA AT NIGHT.—A correspondent of the Columbus Times, writing from Atlanta on August 26, says: 'On Wednesday night a large 42-pound shell entered the Presbyterian Church in Marietta Street, and, after passing through the pulpit, exploded in the basement, or Sunday-school room. Several families living in the vicinity having taken refuge there were more or less stunned and injured by the explosion, and one man had his right arm taken off. The scene in the room was frightful; it was after midnight, and all the inmates were sleeping peacefully, perfectly confident of security. Mothers caught up their children hurriedly and rushed frantically into the streets screaming, though without any definite purpose in view, save that of escaping for the time from the scene which had struck such terror into their souls; and there, out upon the open streets, they stood crouching, with their little families clinging around them, and knowing not where to fly for safety. Assistance came at last, however, and the panic-stricken women and children were huddled off into the bomb-proofs of kind neighbours in more secure localities, and the wounded properly cared for.'

DESERTIONS FROM THE FEDERAL ARMY.—A New York paper, the New Nation, says: 'There are now more than 200,000 deserters. You may listen to the conversation of the men in the New York and Pennsylvania regiments principally; you will hear the soldiers carry contempt of morality and law so far as to boast of having sold themselves from 15 to 18 times; of having deserted each time, and received a fresh bounty. We meet men every day in New York who, engaged for three years, have not been six months under the flag; out of 40 persons engaged in New York, in a certain circle of workmen, we heard a few days ago that from 30 to 37 had deserted, and from 3 to 10 only were under the flag. The same soldier is paid eight or ten times over, so that in paying 100,000 men we have really 10,000. If we add that, in many cases, each of these men figures under his different names of engagement in the effective, and receives his rations, &c., we shall see what disorder may exist.' The Detroit Advertiser says: 'One of the first questions asked of the substitute brokers by half the candidates for substitutes is, "Will you help me to get away?" Upon receiving a promise to aid him to desert, the man consents to be enlisted.'

FEDERAL RECRUITING IN EUROPE.

WHEN rogues fall out, honest men come by their own. Mr. Isidor Sigismund, who was formerly in the United States army, and who, after passing a year in Europe, has returned to the United States, has given a long account, published in the Boston Courier, of the way in which the Federal armies are recruited. Mr. Sigismund does not object to the enlistment of foreigners, but he is only annoyed, professedly at the recruits being cheated out of their bounty, but really because he did not get a fair share of the plunder. He says:—

When about to return to the States I formed the acquaintance of a Mr. Julian Allen, a Pole, from New York. He informed me that his mission to Europe was for the purpose of assisting emigrants to the United States, as he said labourers of all sorts were greatly wanted here, and he would assist those that wished to emigrate to do so. He then desired me to go with an expedition that was then fitting out at Antwerp, Belgium, and see those men to the port of Boston. A steamship (British) was ready to take 426 men, a great deal of which seemed mysterious to me - rather puzzled me. Making enquiries, Mr. Allen informed me that some of those men intended to enlist in the United States army on their arrival here, in consequence of which he wished the whole affair to be kept a secret, the steamer being chartered for the purpose, and would take no other passengers. Accordingly I was introduced to the men, and they were informed that I would be placed over them, to see them safely here. Another man, a Servian, by name of Radislavowitz, was to act as their 'lieutenant,' and I was requested by Mr. Allen, since many intended to enlist, to drill them on board the steamer on our passage, in order to teach them the command in the English language. They all signed a contract (which but few could read), purporting to be that they bind themselves to take employment on their arrival in the States. We then left Antwerp on July 6. Captain Farmer (an Englishman) commanded the ship Bellona. . . On July 20 we arrived opposite Deer Island. On the passage I drilled them regularly, most of them doing it for a pastime.

On our arrival opposite Fort Warren, several gentlemen came on board, the pilot being previously instructed under no consideration to permit any one to board the ship except the parties concerned, nor should the men have any communication with any one. A squad of police came also on board, and the men were all landed on Deer Island. The steamer immediately steamed off to New York. On our arrival at Deer Island the truth began to dawn upon us. The men were all placed under a strict vigilance of police, and were informed that they would be mustered into the United States army; that the contracts they had signed before their departure were to that effect, and on any one demurring, force would be used. An enticement of $100 on their being sworn in was also held out to them, and further promises when at Galloupe's Island. Some of the men desired to communicate with their friends in the city, but that they were not allowed to do (their friends being kept in ignorance of their arrival). Their 'lieutenant,' who knew the fact that the men not wishing to be mustered in could not be compelled to do so, and who might have communicated the same to them, was not allowed to stay with the men, but kept in the 'House of Correction' over night, and next day sent to the city and run off to New York. This man, who worked very hard in getting the men together and in bringing them here, was promised that he would be well rewarded. He received on stepping into the cars for New York the sum of $20. . . . . All the men (with the exception of 24, who were rejected by the surgeon) were then mustered in, $100 paid them, and sent to Galloupe's Island. Some of the men complained to me that furloughs were promised them to come to the city, but none of the promises were kept. No further bounty (but the $100 they received) was given them, and after a short time they were sent off to Fortress Monroe, and from there they will be sent to the 'front,' none of their friends knowing anything about it. . . . The facts I am now going to state I vouch the truth of, and am ready to prove them to any one desiring me to do so. The batch in the steamship Bellona was the second one brought to this city, and consisted of 426 men. The cost of bringing them from the places they started amounts to about $60,000 (in currency), not quite $150 per man. Add $100 paid to each man when mustered in, and which covers all bounty, &c., that makes $250 per man, or $100,000 for 400 men. I don't think that any of those men have been sold for less than $900 each; that leaves a balance of $650 per man net profit. I, who have worked harder than any of those interested here, in bringing the men here, and subsequently in seeing them off, received the magnificent sum of $100 to liquidate all claims; and had I not been compelled by the necessity of my expenses while working for those men, I would not have accepted the money. The net profits they have made are as follows:—The whole expense of these 400 men, pay included, amounted to (at $250 each) $100,000. The receipts for them, at $900 each, make $460,000; that leaves them $360,000.

I have, a few days since, seen a letter from one of the men, before leaving Galloupe's Island, which some one had published in the New York Democrat (a German paper), bitterly complaining of the treatment they received; that none of the promises made to them have been kept. Another batch arrived yesterday (Tuesday) morning, in the ship Garland, Captain Behrens, with 255 men. She left Antwerp July 18. The men were all landed before sunrise yesterday morning on Deer Island, where they are strongly guarded. The captain of the Garland informs me that the men, after having left Antwerp and learned the true object of their going to Boston, gave him a good deal of trouble, until he was compelled to offer to land them on the coast of England, but the men being unable to speak the English language, and perfectly destitute of all means, held a consultation, and at last decided to proceed with the ship and stand their lot. The vessel has not come into dock. Another ship is soon expected.

KIDNAPPED NEGROES.—The New York World of September 7 says: 'If the United States takes them (negroes) as property, by what law of war or of nations can it transmute them into men? Can it say, "I take this as property—I hold it as a human being"? If they are men, they come clearly within the condition of criminals when found in arms against their Government.'

THE LOSSES IN HANCOCK'S CORPS.—Hancock's corps has suffered terrible losses since the 20th. These losses, and those suffered at Deep Bottom before the 20th, have reduced Hancock's splendid corps to eight thousand men. This seems incredible, as the corps really was a corps d'armée once of forty thousand men; but it is literally true.—Baltimore Correspondent of the New York World, August 29.

REPUBLICAN PROPHECIES.

(From the New York World, Sept. 7.)

Let a man count up the false prophecies of the Republican leaders—false not from intention, but from ignorance—and see how many they are and to what they have led.

Seventy-five thousand men: Over two millions.

Rebellion starved out in three months: Rampant in 1864.

Backbone broken at every success: Not yet.

Every new levy sure to extinguish the rebellion: Draft ordered for 5th of September.

Paper as good as gold: Gold 240.

The people richer for the war: Prices advanced three hundred per cent.

Every campaign to be the last: But one.

Respect for law: The breach of it in every State in the Union.

Belief in the Union as unbroken: The manufacture of bogus States.

Freedom of the slave: Apprenticing him through military orders, and crimping him for the ranks.

Love of the negro: Letting him rot in heaps.

Love of progress and humanity: Waging war against women and children, and houses and barns, and agricultural implements.

THE CROPS AND THE ARMIES OF THE SOUTH.—The Richmond Examiner of the 1st inst. says:—'The crops of 1864, which are to supply subsistence for the next twelve months, are unusually good. Certain localities have suffered from drought, but this evil has been partial only. As a general rule, the crops of 1864 are better than those of 1863, and promise abundant bread for another year. There has, in fact, never been any lack of quantity. The difficulty was in distribution. But our railroads have held out wonderfully well. Their own officers have been surprised at the facility with which they have been able to keep them up. We are better prepared to maintain our railroad system at this hour than we were eighteen months ago. Every month increases our capacity to improve and maintain these essential public works. Necessity has proved in this matter the mother of invention. The people have found that they could live luxuriously upon a quantity of supplies which they would have considered four years ago approximate to starvation; and great manufacturing enterprises have been improvised without trouble, which everybody in the South thought beyond our capacity to accomplish, even in the time of peace. Nor are our armies so nearly destroyed as the enemy persuades himself. That of Northern Virginia is stronger now than when Grant began the battles in the Wilderness. We have lost few in killed and the wounded are nearly all recovered and returned to their places. In general the army grows stronger rather than weaker; for the boys attaining to the military age outnumber the killed and the discharged old men. The progress of active operations thins our ranks, but a lull of the strife recuperates the disabled and restores the strength of the ranks. The Confederacy is immeasurably stronger on this 1st day of September, 1864, than it was on the 1st of May, 1862 or 1863. It can place as many men in the field, and each man is a veteran, when before he was a raw recruit. The Yankees may as well dismiss their pleasing visions of Southern exhaustion. It was this very mistake which lured them into the war; and the same delusion has been the cause of all their disappointments. If they determine to carry on the war they must brace themselves like men to the real fact that they will have to encounter great armies, well supplied, thoroughly armed, and brave as any that ever trod a field of battle. The cowardly idea that the rebellion is exhausted, and that their further operations will be feebly resisted, will bring them to grief. The South has fought Lincoln for one term successfully. If they can reelect him, she can fight him another term still more successfully. There is no thought of submission nor any fear of collapse here; and the North would meet in the fall of 1868 the same spirit which they encountered at the outset of the struggle at Bull Run.'

THE DRAFT IN NEW JERSEY.—The Newark Advertiser states that the time for men to report who were drafted in the Fifth District of New Jersey expired on August 24, at which date 1,087 had failed to make their appearance. Of the entire number only 15 entered the army as principals, 3 entered the navy, 412 paid commutation, and 512 furnished substitutes. The following is the official statement:—

THE ELECTORAL VOTE.—The New York World says: 'Including the State of West Virginia, the number of votes to be cast in the Electoral college is two hundred and thirty-one, of which one hundred and sixteen are necessary for an election.'

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of THE INDEX, 13 Bouverie Street, E.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

Advertisements should be sent and Money Orders made payable to J. B. HOPKINS, INDEX Office.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1864.

The Fall of Atlanta.

For the first time during the present campaign, it is our duty to chronicle a reverse—the fall of Atlanta. The truth of the report, which there was some reason to doubt last week, is now confirmed; and the Federal Government declares that the object of SHERMAN'S expedition has been attained. By the North, and the partisans of the North in this country, this triumph has been hailed with as much jubilation as if it were decisive of the issue of the war. In the South, the loss of Atlanta is regarded simply as one of the inevitable sacrifices of the struggle, and the tone of the press is: 'Nothing is changed; there is only one city the less to defend.' The truth is, the progress of the war had long ago made the possession of Atlanta by the Federals a matter of fictitious rather than of real value. The occupation of Atlanta by the Federals at the present moment signifies nothing beyond their success in reaching a point which was the alleged object of this campaign, and in penetrating another 120 miles into the Confederacy. If three months ago SHERMAN could have entered Atlanta, after destroying the south-western army of the Confederacy, and found there the abundant stores and the vast machinery which made it of importance, the gain would have been material to the North. As it is, he has entered a comparatively deserted town. He finds it, as BUTLER found Orleans, inhabited solely by old men, women, and children. He will be encamped there in a hostile community, and he will have to fight fresh battles for every twenty miles he may wish to travel, east, west, or south. What Resaca, and Marietta, and Atlanta have been, Macon and Augusta, and almost every town in the Cotton States, will prove. What SHERMAN'S position really is, is very clearly shown by the fact that, although flushed with victory at Jonesborough, he yet dared not assail the entrenchments at Lovejoy Station, thirty miles south of Atlanta, on the Macon line, and that at this moment HOOD is within that distance—striking distance—of Atlanta, with an army which is augmented daily by the Georgian population, whilst, by the confession of the Northern papers, railroad communication between Nashville, SHERMAN'S base of communication, and Atlanta is for the time completely intercepted. So far as the Federals are concerned, we take it that the campaign in Georgia is at an end. SHERMAN will have enough to do during the autumn months to maintain his position, to keep his communications open, and to insure the regularity of his supplies. Experience has shown him that no small force can operate successfully in Georgia twenty miles away from his main army. If he is enabled quietly to go into winter quarters at Atlanta, this is about as much as he can expect. Whether such a result is worth all the frenzy of Mr. LINCOLN'S Cabinet and the New York press, we very much doubt. At the same time, considerable credit is due to General SHERMAN and his army. Probably his army outnumbered by two to one the Southern force opposed to him. But the latter had a succession of strong positions to fall back upon. It was commanded by an officer of great repute, General JOSEPH JOHNSTON, and subsequently by one of the most dashing leaders of the Confederacy, General HOOD. It was composed of magnificent fighting material. It fought bravely, on more than one occasion defeating very heavy odds, and it has now evacuated Atlanta not beaten in the field, and daring the invader to attack. That, in the teeth of such an army so led, SHERMAN should have marched his troops, numerically superior as they were, some 150 miles, fighting every foot of the way, now attacking almost impregnable positions, now making the most fatiguing flank marches, is creditable both to the commander and to his soldiers, and says much for the tenacity and energy of the general, for the pluck and endurance of the ranks, and for the whole organisation of the expeditionary force.

Atlanta was won by a flank movement. SHERMAN found the defences of the town too strong for assault. He essayed an investment, but failed. He then adopted the tactics which had won him Dalton and Marietta. He moved the bulk of his army by a circuitous route upon HOOD'S communications. Leaving an entire corps north of Atlanta protecting the bridges of the Chattahoochie, he marched with the remaining corps some miles to the west; then suddenly turning east he struck at the Macon Railroad. HOOD was aware of his movement and took measures to frustrate it. But SHERMAN'S line was too long for him. Compelled to hold Atlanta with a respectable force, he could make no impression on the Federals in the open field, and he was gradually forced back on the Macon line. At Jonesborough Station HARDEE'S corps had thrown up earthworks, and a determined stand was made. But here again SHERMAN'S numbers prevailed. He outflanked his gallant adversary, and compelled him to retire from the field with the loss of eight guns. SHERMAN claims 1,000 prisoners, and admits the loss of 1,500 men. We have yet to receive the Confederate account. The loss of Jonesborough Station gave the Federals possession of the Macon Railroad; and HOOD, who had for weeks been dependent for supplies on that line, was compelled to evacuate Atlanta. This he did unmolested and in perfect order, the bulk of his stores having been already transferred to Macon. At first there was some doubt as to the direction in which he retired; but the retreat of SHERMAN from Lovejoy Station left the road to the south perfectly open, so that HOOD, with his entire army, has regained his communications with Macon, and the Federal army will have to fight for any further advance with at least as much pertinacity and vigour as it has displayed in its march from Chattanooga to Atlanta. As to the strategic advantages of Atlanta, they are admirable for an army acting on the defensive, but comparatively slight to the invader. There is but one line of communication between SHERMAN'S army and the North, whilst the Federal occupation of Atlanta does not in the least prevent communication between Richmond and Georgia. The fall of Atlanta, we repeat, is a misfortune for the South; but it is not an irretrievable disaster, and the best proof of this is, that General JOHNSTON was prepared to evacuate the city two months ago, and to throw it into the hands of the Federals as a matter of policy. SHERMAN, however, has gained his prize. It remains to be seen what he will do with it.

From other quarters the war news is meagre and not very reliable. There is an unmistakable electioneering twang about it. Even GRANT sinks for the nonce into the mere canvasser, and fights vigorously for LINCOLN with his pen. We warn our readers, therefore, to be on their guard against the war rumours that are sure to abound for the next month. Mobile may have fallen, but we cannot believe the report on the strength of a deserter's story published in the New York World. Mr. STANTON would never have allowed the World to anticipate him in the issue of such good news; nor is there the slightest foundation for the report in any antecedent news from Mobile. At the latest date a vigorous defence was expected. GRANGER'S force was a small one. Only a very small portion of FARRAGUT'S flotilla could come within shelling distance of the city. There had been time to reinforce the garrison, and there was any amount of labour for the construction of earthworks. Under these circumstances we attach very little importance to the rumoured fall of Mobile. In Virginia things are tolerably quiet, but a battle appears to be imminent. Whether SHERIDAN in the Shenandoah Valley, or WARREN on the Weldon Railroad, will be the first to feel the Confederate onslaught, is not clear.

Mr. Seward at Auburn.

THE cynic who would expose to pity or derision the follies of the human race would be unable to find a more apt theme than the motives which have induced nations to wage war. Men have fought for plunder, for what ATTILA called the 'gaudium pugnæ,' for the hegemony of a body of free States, for the lust of empire, whether raging in a warlike people or an ambitious monarch, for family advancement, even for the dower of a youthful princess or the inheritance of a child in its cradle. Within the last hundred years the advance of civilisation has been so great that nations have gone to war for an idea, to propagate a revolutionary code of ethics, or to promote the doctrine of 'nationalities.' So strange, indeed, have been the freaks of mankind as to compel adhesion to the teaching of Bishop BUTLER, that 'nothing but the principle that whole communities are liable to insanity equally at least with private persons can account for the major part of those transactions of which we read in history.'

But of all the difficult questions which have exercised the curious spirit of men on both sides of the Atlantic none is so insoluble as that of the cause of the American war. The Tribune, with the host of GREELEYS and BEECHERS, GOLDWIN SMITHS and BAXTERS, has summoned the North to material, and the nations of Europe to moral, aid in the sacred work of emancipation. Monstrous as are the calumnies heaped by this school on the Southern people, and outrageous as the means may be by which the desired end is sought, it is idle to deny that among a crowd of professional fanatics may be found men in whom there is a deep and honest conviction of the moral excellence of Black-Republicanism. In this country such sympathy as exists for the Northern Government professedly rests on this foundation; and though the removal of the prop would not change the sentiments, it would certainly annihilate the position, of the English Abolitionists.

The great bulk, however, of the Northern people who entered heart and soul into the war, were impelled by the cry or the idea of the Union. On these two forces the whole momentum of the war depended. There could be no other power sufficient to drive the masses into supreme efforts for the accomplishment of the proposed task. If men fought for neither of these causes, then they fought for sensation or pastime. It was emancipation, or the Union, or nothing at all.

Now what has Mr. SEWARD, who has done more than any man to fuse the Republican and Abolitionist factions, declared on this very point? He says in express words that on the conclusion of the war the questions affecting slavery will abide the terms of the Constitution. He holds out no hope of legislation on the subject, he desires no change. As it was before the war, so, according to Mr. SEWARD, it shall be after the war. The condition of the slave shall be as it stands defined by the laws of each State, and the Abolitionist may repent at leisure of his fond delusion. Nor, again, does Mr. SEWARD admit that the war is for the Union. On this point his statement is clear enough. 'Nothing,' says he, 'is more certain than that either the United States and their constitutional President, or the so-called Confederate States and their usurping President, must rule within the limits of this Republic.' No matter what may be the issue of the struggle in point of warlike success, there will be but one Government, and that Government will reign either at Richmond or Washington. The alternative is simple. The old Union is impossible, says Mr. SEWARD, for Union has become Empire, and to fight for impossibilities is absurd. The new Union—that is, one Government and one President—must be the result whichever side wins. It is DAVIS against LINCOLN, and Mr. SEWARD is, of course, for LINCOLN.

Now the issue has been narrowed to this point, not merely negatively, but in positive language. Mr SEWARD proclaims to the world that he is fighting a war of succession, and he even compares the situation to the war of the Spanish succession. Of all men, however, Americans have most readily endorsed the dictum of HALLAM. 'Sceptres,' says that high authority, 'were committed and governments were instituted for public protection and public happiness, not certainly for the benefit of rulers. No prejudice has less in its favour, and none has been more fatal to the peace of mankind, than that which regards a nation of subjects as a family's private inheritance.' Loyalty to a throne and its heir has ever been held as the most venial of human weaknesses. No other sentiment has been an equal incentive to virtue and devotion. It is the sublimity of audacity to invoke the spirit that fought and died for the STUARTS and the CAPETS to perform the like office for the succession of ABRAHAM LINCOLN. This is the platform on which Mr. SEWARD appeals to his country. He abandons at a blow emancipation and union, and reverently yields to the dogma l'état c'est moi.

Consistency is, however, not to be despised, and long ago the peculiar doctrine of succession had been announced. On a former occasion Mr. SEWARD gravely argued, by a perverse process of political arithmetic, that LINCOLN had been elected to reign for four years over thirty-four States; and that, as he had but twenty-one States under his sceptre for the term, it followed that he must be re-elected President to enjoy a reign over the remaining number. By what skill he would get rid of the excess of eight States in the event of re-election, it is not necessary to enquire. The solution of that difficulty will not be insuperable, for excess of power is already sufficiently familiar to the potentate of Washington.

That the Government will not hesitate to use every means at its disposal to insure the election of Mr. LINCOLN in November is plainly confessed. 'In voting for a President,' says Mr. SEWARD, 'can we wisely or safely vote out the identical person whom with force and arms we are fighting into the Presidency? It would be nothing less than to give up the very object of the war at the ballot-box. By such a proceeding we shall have agreed with the enemy and given him the victory.' There is logic in this. If the war is for LINCOLN and for LINCOLN alone, it must of course cease when LINCOLN ceases to reign. But that is a contingency to be avoided at all hazards. By brute force has it been sought to fight LINCOLN into the Presidency, and by brute force will it be sought to keep him there. The war, on the confession of the Government, is not waged for any cause that can commend itself to Democrat, Republican, or Abolitionist. It is a mere personal question. Mr. SEWARD avows that the election is a sequel to the war to be fought on the same principles and by the same method. The object of the war will not be given up at the ballot-box, for the struggle at the one will be fought, if need be, with the weapon used for the other—namely, the power of the sword.

The Growing Power of the West.

IT cannot have escaped the notice of the least reflecting observer of American affairs that the ensuing Presidential election in the United States will indicate a very marked transfer of electoral power from the older States to those which have suddenly grown up in the West. The star of empire takes the same invariable direction which Bishop BERKELEY gave it, more than a century ago, in his oft-quoted lines. The scheming politicians and pestilent agitators of New York and New England have seen, with unspeakable annoyance, the control of public affairs passing from their hands. They will be able no longer to dictate to the rest of the Union in the arbitrary spirit of the numerical majority, for the numerical majority has changed its quarters from the banks of the Merrimac and the Hudson to those of the Wabash and the Mississippi. A very few figures from the record will serve to show how decidedly the West has grown in electoral power by the recent reapportionment of representation. Maine had eight votes in 1860, and in 1864 will have but 7. Massachusetts also loses one, falling from 13 to 12 votes; New York drops from 35 to 33; Pennsylvania loses one, Ohio loses two, and Kentucky loses one. Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Texas, Tennessee, and Virginia, will not be heard of in the Electoral College. The vote of California will be increased from 4 to 5 votes; Illinois will advance from 11 to 16 votes; Iowa, which had 4 votes in 1860, will now have 8; Wisconsin will have 8 votes instead of 5; Michigan increases 2 votes; and Kansas, with her 3 votes, will be added to the College.

Thus, it will be seen that the growth of political power in the West has been coincident with its decline in the North and East, and the movement has been against the supremacy of New England by the combination of forces. How potential she has been hitherto in the Federal Administration is seen in the protective tariffs she has forced upon the South, and in the triumph of the last Presidential election, when a sectional candidate was, for the first time, successful in obtaining the first executive office in the Union.

This inevitable shifting of power from one section of the Union to the other with the tides of population was one of the greatest dangers that threatened the peace of the Southern States under the old régime, and went very far to justify the act of secession in respect of the exact time taken for its accomplishment. The reapportionments of the several States to determine their respective representations in the Federal Congress, were decennial. The ten years had rolled round for another count, whereby the seceding States would certainly have lost in strength, immensely as compared with the rising West, considerably as compared with the North and East, while against all combined they would have been powerless indeed. And this, too, with a reckless Republican party in power, all the muniments of their constitutional liberties contemned, and the very pretence of equality of rights under the Federal compact abandoned! Well indeed might they have determined that the time for separation had arrived, and that to wait upon another decade would be the very height of madness.

What effect the altered relations of East and West, as regards electoral power, will have upon the contest now going on for the Presidency of the United States, time must determine. Two months more and we shall see. The remarkable spectacle is just now presented of New England supporting a Western man, and the great West supporting a citizen of New York, as their candidates respectively. But the candidates are of no importance in the working out of the difficult problem. We deem it as certain as any future political event can be, that ultimately, perhaps at no distant period, the decadence of New England and the aggrandisement of the West will divide these two sections of the already dismembered Union into States or federations hopelessly antagonistic, just as their material interests conflict with each other. It is only a question of time.

Lord Stanley upon Ireland.

LORD STANLEY'S character as a speaker is rather unique. He is popular, though he has fewer of the arts of the demagogue than almost any other English political orator. He is heard with great interest, and men go far to hear him, though he is by no means to be called eloquent. He is impressive, though he has a painful voice and a bad delivery. He is thoroughly well-informed, without any pretensions to profundity; he never says anything new, but he generally contrives to put a subject in the clearest point of view, and to leave his audience better acquainted even with their own affairs than they were before; and, without being original, without even propounding a new doctrine or finding a remedy hitherto unthought of for a perplexing evil, his speeches are generally, to thoughtful men especially, suggestive. At the Agricultural Festival of Tipperary, he was hardly in his place. He was not at liberty to be dry, and he was bound not to be censorious; while the subject on which he had to speak — the future of Ireland — required that some sharp censures should be addressed to those who are mainly answerable for the present, and his own style of oratory is certainly rather solid and didactic than lively or entertaining. But he managed to be true to his character. His speech does not tell us how the grievances of Ireland may be redressed, or her condition improved; but it affords matter for much comment bearing on that question, and, both in what is said and what is omitted, suggests considerations that throw some light on the worst perplexity of British politics.

Ireland is the trouble and the reproach of English government. She is the only disloyal and the only unhappy part of the Empire—that is to say, the only possession of the Imperial Crown in which the mass of the people are not enthusiastically attached to the Crown and the Constitution, and the only one in which prosperity is not great, general, and rapidly advancing. To find the cause of her exceptional condition, and to suggest a remedy, is the hardest problem offered to the consideration of British statesmen; but while this problem remains unsolved, British policy must be pronounced not wholly successful, and the fame of our much-vaunted constitutional system is stained by the disgrace of one lamentable failure.

Lord STANLEY does not solve the problem; he does not make the attempt. But his speech is pervaded by the recollection of it, and contains hints that show him to have given it much thoughtful and rational consideration. In the first place he dismisses without a word the favourite follies of Irish grievance-mongers. He does not deign to notice the absurd theory of those who would make the National Church responsible for the national troubles, for famine and depopulation, for landlord-murder and popular lawlessness. Poverty is the curse of Ireland, and the Church has nothing to do with poverty. Her revenues are extracted from the rents of the landlords, not from the profits of the farmer or the wages of the labourer. Economists, the most hostile to the system of tithes, have been forced to admit, and have most conclusively established, that tithes are a tax on rent. If the Church of Ireland were abolished to-morrow, or if she had never been, the rich would be somewhat richer, but the poor would not be one whit less poor. Nay, they would be poorer; for the income of the clergy, which is spent in Ireland, would be added to that of the landlords, which is chiefly spent abroad. Nor does Lord STANLEY waste a word on tenant-right—the proposal to give the tenant a vested interest in the land. He knows that one of the chief difficulties in the way of that agricultural reform of which Ireland is so sorely in need is the obstinacy of the tenantry, and the sort of Lynch-law tenant-right which has been enforced by organised assassination. The landlords desire to improve; the tenantry resist improvement, however manifest it be that they, as well as landlord and labourers, would profit thereby. To increase the power of these men over the soil would be to aggravate the existing evil, and enhance the distress of the agricultural population. It would render utterly impossible the abolition of the cottier system—the possession of the soil by labouring families without capital and without intelligence—in which abolition lies the best hope of Ireland. The two favourite propositions of the Irish agitator, therefore, are by the statesman, addressing an Irish audience, set aside with silent contempt.

Lord STANLEY speaks of one of the strongest symptoms of Irish distress—the constant flow of emigration, the human current that perpetually sets westward across the Atlantic—in a sober and statesmanlike tone. There are some who openly avow their belief that the expatriation of the Irish is not only a blessing to England, but the best chance of establishing in Ireland a prosperous, contented, and loyal community. Lord STANLEY is not one of these; he is far too practical and clearheaded a statesman. In the first place, the prosperity of Ireland, to the ears and conscience of this generation at least, must mean the prosperity of the Irish nation, not of a Scotch and English population imported to supply the place of the exiled Irish. In the second place, the Irish element in our population is one that we cannot spare. It is our best military element. We do not mean to say that the Irish fight better than the English; we do not think that they fight quite so well. We think that an English army would prove victorious in a campaign over an Irish army of equal force: in fact, it may almost be said that the experiment has been tried in America, so largely Irish in race is the Federal army, so purely English the Confederate. But the Irish love fighting, and the English do not. The military trade is uncongenial to the Saxon and delightful to the Celt; and in so far as our national strength depends on the maintenance of a standing army, it requires the presence of an abundant Irish population. The depopulation of Ireland cannot but weaken us in that point in which we are already weakest; and on that account it is to be regretted, even if it were not a proof of unhappiness at home, such as ought not to exist under a government sincerely seeking the nation's good and properly adapted to the national character.

Lord STANLEY considers the emigration, in its present phase and extent, temporary and artificial. It is the result of the American war, and with that war it will disappear. Besides the withdrawal of the demand for 'food for powder,' peace will send back half a million of men to their homes, and disclose a vast void caused by the frightful waste of the last four years in the national wages fund. The supply of labour will be increased, and the demand reduced. No doubt there is truth in this view. But it must be recollected that there are counteracting influences which peace will bring to bear. If peace should bring back good government in the Northern States, the natural resources of the country will speedily replace its wasted capital. There is the void in the population, caused by the unexampled slaughter of a gigantic conflict, to be filled; there are the vast lands of the Western States still craving for cultivation. Let the improvement of Ireland be as rapid and the recovery of America as slow as can rationally be conceived, still it will be fifty years before wages in money reach the same level in the two countries—longer still before those money wages will buy as ample food, as good clothing and shelter, in the Old World as in the New.

There will, therefore, for years to come be strong inducements to tempt the flower of the Irish peasantry across the Atlantic. And we must remember that there are influences at work in Ireland, to foster and encourage emigration to the United States, which are not equally operative anywhere else. The Irishman clings to the soil; he wishes to work on his own farm; he is delighted to own it. In America he can have, or speedily earn, a larger farm than he can cultivate, and build a better cabin than he has at home. He will marry early; natural temperament, habit, and religious teaching alike encourage this tendency—and America is the only country in which early marriages are not imprudent and children are a source of wealth. He shrinks less from change and from adventure than do the ignorant and poor of other races; and he has less change to encounter in emigration. It is almost to another Ireland that he goes; for one-third of the Irish race are said to be settled in America. Finally, the Irish already in America are zealous to bring their friends over, and contribute liberally to the expense of doing so; while those English, Scotch, and Germans who would willingly emigrate are often detained by want of funds. We regret to have to add that the sentimental checks which operate to discourage emigration elsewhere—the love of country, countrymen, and home, of the national religion, the national laws and government—fail to act upon the Irishman. His country is hardly his, towards its government he has no affection, towards half his countrymen he feels an angry ill-will, towards the national faith a bitter resentment. His home is too poor, too wretched, to have a hold on his heart. In every way emigration is made easy to him. Much will be needed to make it harder; and at present we are hardly even moving in the right direction.

Some emigration from Ireland, no doubt, there always must be. For the Irish, as Lord STANLEY said, are a prolific race; they multiply so fast that the laws of production will not allow the national wealth, in an old country, to keep pace with their increase. As their condition is improved and the death-rate lessened, their increase will be still greater, and emigration will probably be always required as an outlet. But it should be our care, if it be possible, that emigration shall not go beyond this—that America shall not be so attractive, and Ireland so repulsive, that all the best, most enterprising, most vigorous of our fellow-subjects, should choose the former. It is always the tendency of emigration to draft off the flower of the peasant youth; and this tendency can only be counteracted by such prosperity at home as affords these a fair choice, a prospect at home sufficient to compensate for the more brilliant hopes offered at the price of expatriation. Only if this can be achieved for Ireland can Irish emigration be reduced to the level at which it is no more than an outlet for the natural overflow of the population. We have this degree of prosperity in England; why not in Ireland?

It is not the climate, though that is wet. It is not the Church, though that is unpopular. It is not the absentee landlords, though their absence is a social and economical mischief of no common order. It is not the law of landed tenure; that is our own. It is not the Union; that is the one salvation of Ireland. It is not any of these things that stand in the way of Irish prosperity, and prevent the one thing necessary to that—the presence of a capital adequate to and increasing faster than the wants of the people.

Why is that capital wanting? Grant that Ireland has been too poor, too misgoverned, or too thriftless to create it for herself as England has done; why can she not borrow it? Close by her side, under the same government, lies the richest country on earth—a land overflowing with capital—a land which supplies half the world with means to employ labour and talent to direct it—a land which will furnish money to any amount on reasonable security and with adequate prospects of profit. Why does not English capital flow in to fertilise Ireland, to develope her resources, to utilise her labour, to bring her agriculture to the English level, to make a Lancashire of that county and a Kent of this? We have ample means to do all this; and, seeing how good is the soil of Ireland—how promising a field for agricultural improvement on a grand scale she affords—there can be little doubt that even agriculture in Ireland would yield an ample return to capital. Why, then, does English capital go to Peru, to Mexico, to Australia, to India, but not to Ireland? Lord STANLEY supplies the reason. 'When life and property shall be as safe in Tipperary as in Middlesex,' then English capital will be as largely employed in one country as in the other.

Irish lawlessness accounts for Irish poverty, and its concomitants of emigration, starvation, disaffection, and rioting. No doubt past misgovernment has something to do with this lawlessness, and something is attributable to the folly of bestowing a Saxon constitution on a Celtic race. But at present the fate of Ireland is clearly in Irish hands; and obedience to law is all that is needed to make Ireland rich. Why do not Englishmen set up manufactories in Ireland? Because when manufactures were attempted in Ireland, the labourers exacted terms so unfair, and enforced their demands by violence so outrageous, that they drove trade away to safer quarters, and because the same temper is still terribly apparent. Why do not English farmers settle in Tipperary, where landlords would rejoice to have them, and where their presence would greatly improve the condition of the people? Because if four or five half-starved cottiers were deprived of the land they misuse in order to make a farm fit for an English farmer, on which they would earn more as labourers than they do now as tenants, the landlord or agent would be shot from behind a hedge, the farmer and his family would probably be murdered, their ricks and buildings would be burnt, and there would be no possibility of bringing to justice assassins known to every Irish labourer in the parish. Capitalists will not venture upon risks like these. They prefer a safe 8 per cent. at home to 12 per cent. with a fair chance of being ruined by incendiaries or murdered by Ribbon men. Until Ireland has a government strong enough to put down things like these, and to make life and property safe, improvement is impossible. A land which lacks law must inevitably lack capital; a people who insist on murdering all improving landlords and farmers ought not to wonder if they come to want bread.

Lord STANLEY thinks that we are near the end of this condition of things. If so, Ireland is approaching the beginning of her redemption. Benefits are ready to pour in upon her as soon as she ceases to shoot her benefactors. Meanwhile we can hardly help asking whether, with Tipperary before our eyes, novelists need have gone to Ballarat and Bendigo to be scandalised by the spectacle of unpunished murder and dominant rowdyism; and whether the Lynch-law, which is the reaction of respectability against rowdyism, is very much worse than that undisputed reign of rowdyism over respectability which has so long prevailed throughout a large part of Ireland.

Counterfeit Confederates.

IT is a fact which all the world has remarked, that while the Governments of Europe have declined to recognise the political existence of the Confederate States, the sympathies of the people have been, almost from the beginning, with the compatriots of JEFFERSON DAVIS against the Northern mob which seeks to enslave them. Earl RUSSELL and Mr. BRIGHT have not been able to repress the generous admiration which has sprung up, with a sort of natural spontaneity, in the breasts of Englishmen, for the devotion, the courage, the endurance of eight millions of men and women, in the struggle for life, and, what they hold still dearer, liberty. Nor have the more intelligent classes of Continental Europe failed to show their appreciation of the heroic qualities and lofty virtues which have been displayed so brilliantly by the Confederates. Accordingly, when citizens of the South, either as exiles from their homes or in the special service of their country, have visited Great Britain or the Continent since the beginning of the war, they have been received with a consideration and friendly interest unprecedented in the annals of modern society. They have met the warm grasp of the hand; they have heard everywhere a hearty 'God bless you' from the lips of strangers; they have been cordially welcomed beneath hospitable roofs, and admitted to the inner circle of Christian families.

As a result of this personal good-will, it might naturally have been expected that impostors would rise up, seeking to profit by the favourable disposition of the English and Continental public; and so it has happened, until the abuse has become intolerable, and we can no longer remain silent upon a subject affecting so seriously the character of the Southern people before the world. The class of adventurers calling themselves Confederates, and endeavouring, in one way or another, to 'do' a confiding and sympathetic community, has grown so large that we might well believe a very populous and very shabby Bohemia to be one of the Confederate States, and these itinerants to have come abroad as its representatives. Male and female have they been created. They come with missions. Your 'special commissioner' is a favourite rôle with them. They impudently assert their right to speak for the Government, and not unfrequently refer to letters of the most satisfactory kind which have unfortunately been lost in running the blockade. They have fought in ever so many battles, and can tell you more moving stories of imminent dangers and hair-breadth 'scapes than the Moor beguiled the languid hours of the gentle Desdemona withal. Indeed, the number of officers of the original 'Stonewall Brigade' who have turned up in distress during the last three years in Great Britain and her colonies, would, if accurately ascertained, very far exceed the whole rank and file of that glorious command when JACKSON first led it into the field.

Now we are the more constrained to warn the European and colonial friends of the Confederate States against these impostors of both sexes, because in many cases they do not come from the Confederacy at all, and because there is really no reason why the most unsuspecting and liberal person should be imposed upon by them. No small proportion of them are Yankee spies, in the pay of the Washington Government, who adopt the uniform of the Confederate officer, not so much to procure money as to report unguarded conversations to headquarters—as men have been said to don the livery of heaven in the service of the devil. Others there may be who are, indeed, Southern by birth, but who 'left their country for their country's good' before the breaking out of hostilities, or have since run away from the duties and perils of the campaign. And then we have Jeremy Diddler, Esq., Cosmopolite, ready to assume any citizenship, and to practise his profession under any domino that will contribute to his chances of success.

It is true that these chances of success in the case of a clever impostor are greatly enhanced by the difficulties of communication with the Confederacy, and the small opportunity that is afforded for testing the truth of his representations. In other days, when a French barber from the Rue St. Honoré flourished in the United States as a descendant of the MONTMORENCIS, and wanted to marry some charming young heiress, the parents had at least the chance of sending to France for information anent the tonsorial pretender; whereas the Confederate cheat may tell any story he pleases without having before his eyes the fear of exposure. But just here we give a word of warning, in repeating what we have said above, that there is no reason why any one should be deceived. In respect of the special commissioners, confidential agents, and what not, of the Confederate Government in Europe, they are almost an imaginary class. The number of persons honoured by commissions is extremely limited—it will hardly reach a score—and the confidential agents, when any are sent, are perfectly well known to them, as they themselves are known to all the world. So much for the diplomatic pretender of either sex, who talks darkly and mysteriously of mighty interests intrusted to his (or her) keeping. As for the mendicity class, the wounded and destitute, there are regularly organised committees to whom the application of any deserving person for relief will not be made in vain.

In the remarks we have submitted upon this question of Confederate imposture, we have spoken with the greater plainness, because we are painfully sensible of the fact that the character of a noble people is at stake—a people whose interests and whose honour are very dear to us, and are in some measure in our keeping. We rejoice to know that hitherto the Confederate refugee in England has worthily sustained the moral and social elevation of the Southern States, and that the name of Confederate has been a passport to the confidence and respect of the best people of England and the Continent. History records that when the old French noblesse were driven from their homes by the Republican fury of the Revolution, they accepted their melancholy change of fortune with a most becoming philosophy, and, wanderers over the face of the earth as they were, that they did not disdain to teach and sew, to hear boys and girls misconstrue FENELON or bend over intricate embroidery by the dim light of a single candle, rather than degrade the high name and fame of their order by beggary. The old French émigré, proud, polite, penniless, living up three pair of stairs, and wearing a little bit of red riband, perhaps, upon the breast of a coat that would have been contemptuously rejected by the old-clo' man, has been the object of respectful sympathy in two hemispheres. On the other hand, the very name of Pole or even of Hungarian, despite the sorrowful traditions and long sufferings of their compatriots, has come to suggest a ragged lout of a fellow, quite able to work but much preferring by reason of laziness to beg, for whom, bearing though he may the wrongs of his country upon his dirty shoulders, one cannot have the least particle of respect—and this only because Poland and Hungary have been misrepresented by impostors in like manner as we fear the Confederate States may be. We would not have the character of the Confederate, which we know to be sans reproche, as all mankind knows it to be sans peur, degraded in the eyes of Europe, as it must be if these Confederate counterfeits, of whom we have felt it our duty to speak without reserve, are not stamped with reprobation, as a false coin is nailed to the counter. It will be only the legitimate result of circumstances, in obedience to well-ascertained social laws as certain in their operation as those which govern the physical or moral world, unless we can put these impostors under the ban, if the name of Confederate, instead of being the guarantee of gentle breeding and the passport to good society in foreign countries, shall become a hissing and a byword to all the nations of the earth.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN FRANCE.

FROM A CONFEDERATE CORRESPONDENT.

PARIS: September 20.

FOR some time past the American question has occupied the same position in the French press which a year since was occupied by the Polish question, and a few months since by that of Denmark. During the past week the Liberal Opposition journals have, more than others, busied themselves with matters relative to the Confederacy, and it would seem that the whole four of them had resolved upon attacking it at one and the same moment. The shot directed against us by these journals has not proceeded from their small artillery, but from pieces of the heaviest calibre. Certainly they have each fired but one shot at us, but that has been a shot of no small weight. That fired by the Siècle has a diameter of two columns, that by the Opinion Nationale one of three columns, that by the Temps also one of three columns, and that by the Journal des Débats a diameter of no less than four columns.

Let us examine these four bulky articles; for each of them interprets in a faithful manner the reasoning by which each of the four shades of French Liberal Opposition justifies its estrangement from the Southern cause.

In the Journal des Débats, a literary journal of aristocratic principles, the political point of view predominates; the Opinion Nationale, a revolutionary journal, bases its reasons on liberal considerations; the Temps, a dogmatic and philosophical journal, advances moral argumentation; the Siècle, a short-sighted journal, whose sources of information are limited, by means of political doctrines which it states with sufficient clearness, is disposed to admit each of the reasons given above, apparently undecided to which of them it shall attach itself.

The Siècle resumes its consideration of the American question with remarks on the interview of Colonel Jaques with President Davis. Unable to contest the declaration made by the Confederate President that the question of slavery has nothing whatever to do with the present war, it nevertheless maintains that Mr. Davis has not rightly conveyed the sentiments of the Southern populations, and that he has merely expressed a personal opinion in the matter. According to the Siècle, the true solution of the American question would be effected by an appeal to the two peoples which compose the two sections, and Mr. Davis, in objecting to this mode of procedure, recommended to him by the Federal negotiators, has altogether relieved the North of its responsibility.

The Opinion Nationale is indignant at the proposition of an appeal to the people made by the Siècle; not that it is opposed to the exercise of popular sovereignty, but because it is unwilling to acknowledge any right on the part of the Rebels to express themselves in their own cause. It is particularly indignant at the term 'two peoples' employed by the Siècle. The North and the South, it exclaims, do not consist of two peoples, they form but one people, and slavery alone divides them! Let us here chronicle a few of the arguments put forth by the Opinion; it is right that the Southerners, at this critical period of their history, should be informed of the treatment they receive at the hands of the French Liberal party.

Suppress slavery, and this grand phantom of independence disappears. Independence without slavery would simply be an effect without a cause; it would not meet any requirement, whether political, moral, industrial, or commercial. The secessionist leaders take good care not to abandon their 'domestic institution,' and the Siècle views in far too serious a light the statement made by a Northern romancer, who attributes such amazing generosity to Mr. Jefferson Davis.

The courage displayed by the slave-dealers, the talent possessed by some of their generals, the heaps of ruins which they have accumulated, the ocean of blood which they have caused to be spilt, the long duration of the war—these cannot justify their culpable rebellion, nor furnish in their favour circumstances of an extenuating character. To-day, as in 1861, they are in rebellion against their fellow-countrymen, against their legitimate Government, against humanity. To absolve them would be a bad example; to call them, in a brotherly manner, to vote (if voting were possible), to acknowledge their right to be their own judges, would be a bad precedent.

In what way, then, does the Opinion propose to terminate the war? By war, by brute force, by submission, by the crushing and annihilation of the Rebels!

The two articles above mentioned have not been allowed to remain without a reply. The Pays remarks that the Siècle and the Opinion are, in the main, of the same way of thinking, since if the North and the South voted on the question of the Union, the North having four votes against a single vote of the South, it would still be by force that the question must be solved. The France demands on what grounds the proceedings of Russia towards the Poles have been condemned by the Liberal journals, since the same treatment exercised towards the Confederates is approved of by these journals.

The article from the Temps is published in the form of a letter from New York, but there is reason to believe that the correspondent by whom it was written resides in Paris. It is so well known that the Paris journals have no correspondents residing abroad, that when, by chance, they happen to have one, he is careful not to omit his signature. This pretended letter from New York is nothing but a philosophical thesis, whose object is to show that slavery, whatever may be said concerning it, is the real ground of debate between the North and the South. One notices in this article the steady, argumentative paces of the Temps; no sweeping declarations like those made in the Opinion, every assertion has the pretension of being based on reason; and although this pretension is not well founded, still the moderate and plausible form of this article is calculated to lead many into error.

I now come to the most important of the four articles of which I have spoken, to that of the Journal des Débats. It appears that I was misinformed relative to the changes which have taken place in the staff of writers connected with this paper, for the article to which I refer bears the signature of M. Prévost-Paradol, whose retirement from that journal had been announced. The abilities of this writer are well known to you; he is one of the most brilliant and most trustworthy contributors to French journalism. The contests with the Imperial Government which have made him its unhappy and persecuted victim have tended greatly to the increase of his reputation, and to an overestimate of his talents, which possess greater brilliancy than depth. It may, however, be said that he is an elegant, clear, and methodical writer, although the bases of his arguments are at all times somewhat feeble. But however this may be, he is perhaps the most authoritative representative of the Liberal party in the French press. His opinion is therefore worthy of great consideration, since it shows with great exactness the policy of that party with regard to the South.

The grounds of M. Prévost-Paradol's argument for 'ardently desiring the submission of the South,' are, in the first place, that separation would not be productive of peace, but would rather tend to the prolongation of war; and secondly, that French interests demand the maintenance of the Union. Let us see how M. Prévost-Paradol establishes these two propositions.

Separation would tend to the prolongation of the war, first, because neither of the countries possesses natural frontiers. Second, because the New State, 'inevitably become the sport of foreign intrigues and the fulcrum of English influence in the New World, would be the more intolerable, the more jealous, and the more formidable of the neighbours.' Third, because 'the world has never yet furnished an example of a slave State enjoying security so long as it is exposed to injury from the rivalry of its neighbour.' Fourthly, because 'the principle of separation being once admitted, why should not the West separate itself from the North? Why should not California create another republic?' In short, 'there is no Utopia in the world which can be compared to the vision of the North and the South living together in peace.'

Now I would candidly ask all reflecting minds, Is there to be found in the whole world anything which can be compared to this vision of imaginary dangers which so greatly terrify the Journal des Débats? Has France or Belgium any natural frontiers? Nevertheless, do they not live in peace? The United States, a slave country, have they not lived on good terms hitherto with their neighbours Canada and Mexico, who have no slaves? Why should the Southern Confederation become the fulcrum of English influence? M. Prévost-Paradol does not say, and most assuredly no one will ever guess. Moreover, what danger is to be feared in the event of a future separation of California and of the West? M. Prévost-Paradol is silent on this point also. Why should not these States, which form an empire equal in extent to that of France, enjoy the right of governing themselves in their own way? How can it be shown that humanity, progress, and civilisation would profit by their perpetual union with the States of New England? This is what the brilliant but superficial writer omits to state—he does not even allow it to be suspected.

After having established the preceding arguments in the way you have seen, M. Prévost-Paradol undertakes to establish the second proposition in the same manner. The abdication of the North, says he, would be a misfortune for France. The English regard it with a satisfaction which one can easily understand, since the dissolution of the United States would be the completion of their own greatness; but that such a desire as this should be expressed by French lips is altogether inexplicable. Why so? Because it would be a discouraging sight for France, which is devoted to equality, and to the discovery of means for the conciliation of liberty with democracy, to witness the overthrow by civil wars of the greatest and hitherto most successful attempt by a Democratic community to enjoy freedom in conformity with the laws, and still more because, owing to the principle of the freedom of the waters and that of the balance of the maritime powers, the lowering of the Federal flag would be profitable to England and fatal to France.

Is it possible on any subject whatever to hold ideas more radically false than the foregoing? What! because the South and the North should form two republics in the place of one, 'the most successful attempt ever made in Democracy would be completely overthrown?'

What shall we say of M. Prévost-Paradol's views with regard to the interest which France has in witnessing the submission of the Southern Confederacy, when a political writer closes his eyes to the fact that the reconstruction of the Union would be the worst of all the dangers that threaten France and England? One must abandon all hope of changing his notions, and give up all endeavour to understand him.

General M'Clellan's candidature for the Presidency has been variously regarded by the Parisian press. The France maintains that it is to a coalition of all the parties hostile to the Government that he owes his election, which is the presage of an early peace. The Temps confesses that there is no room for misconception, and that, notwithstanding M'Clellan is a member of the war party, his election will let loose such a current of pacific ideas as will oblige the Government of the Union to make peace at any cost. This sound view is not shared by the Patrie. I am surprised at this, inasmuch as the article devoted by this journal to a discussion of the Chicago programme is remarkable in more than one respect. M. Aucaigne, the writer of this article, remarks that the question of slavery is an element of so small account in the war that the Democrats have not even mentioned it in their programme, and the Republicans, by the mouth of Mr. Seward, have just made an explicit declaration of the fact. M. Dréolle, the chief editor of the Patrie, had already, on the preceding day, directed attention to this important avowal of Mr. Seward. The Opinion maintains that General M'Clellan owes his nomination solely to the fact that he is a pro-slavery man. Mark the words—pro-slavery man! The Opinion sticks to its text!

CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

MANCHESTER: September 21, 1864.

IT was not the other day at Brighton that Professor Fawcett for the first time made what may be called a 'Federal' bid for exchanging his chair at the University for a Radical seat in Parliament. The learned gentleman performed the same interesting operation in our Free-Trade Hall upwards of a year ago, and it would appear that the interval had been insufficient to enable him to discover the logical vice that was fatal to his then offer of service. The Manchester Guardian has the following forcible and judicious remarks upon that portion of the Professor's recent speech in which he again refers to Lancashire:—

Another of the learned gentleman's illustrations is far better chosen, but so marred in the handling that its merits can only be recognised with difficulty. It is undoubtedly true that those who maintain that the franchise may be carried a good step lower with safety and advantage derive a powerful argument from the exemplary conduct of the operatives of Lancashire during the season of suffering from which they are emerging. But it is a pity that demeanour so sensible and upright should be made almost ridiculous by being imputed to feelings which have no place of any consequence in the minds of the working classes of this district, and which would do no credit to their intelligence. They preferred to perish rather than possibly put an obstacle in the way of the holy crusade in which the Northern States of America had their warmest sympathies! We invite Professor Fawcett to come down to Lancashire and study for himself the true nature of the popular opinion respecting which he evidently allows himself to be misled by interested persons. The fantastical course of reasoning which he ascribes to the cotton operatives does infinitely less credit than is due to their knowledge and shrewdness, and that in more ways than one. It conveys, in the first place, the implication that they have supposed that a war undertaken by England for the independence of the South would really expedite the supply of Southern cotton, or that it would in any way better their material lot on a balance of the relief and the pressure which it would bring in its train. It is, to a great extent, because they have not believed that this would be the case, that they have been so silent. But, in the next place, Professor Fawcett's theory of their motives does them the great injustice of supposing them so ignorant and gullible as to believe that the interests of humanity and freedom are involved in urging the horrible slaughter in America to the last extremity. Were he well informed upon the subject, he would know that nothing can be further from their thoughts than to console themselves for the failure of their occupation with sympathetic interest in the pretended motives of the maritime blockade by which they suffer; nor is more difficulty met with at any day in finding a public meeting to memorialise in favour of recognising the Southern Confederacy than in getting one, under the management of practised agitators, to pronounce for a diametrically opposite conclusion.

The Southern Independence Association has issued the following placard, copies of which have been put up in conspicuous places in this city, and in every town and village in the manufacturing districts:—

NORTHERN HYPOCRISY ON SLAVERY.

Fellow men! Read the following news brought over by the China:—

'On Saturday evening, September 3, 1864, Secretary Seward made a speech at Auburn, New York, in which he stated that "Slavery is no longer an issue of the war, and will not be interfered with after peace is restored."'

Can any of you any longer sympathise with such hypocrisy, or believe that the North is fighting to put down slavery? The mask is thrown off, and President Lincoln is prepared to sacrifice the negro for the sake of reelection. We only ask you to remember this if any more appeals are made to you to support the North.

THE EXECUTIVE of the Southern Independence Association.

26 Market Street, Manchester.

The Guardian thus exposes the political drift of Mr. Seward's more fully reported remarks upon the same sickening subject:—

The meaning of all this is perfectly clear. The best card which the Democratic party have to play in the coming election is the intense popularity of the idea that the war is undertaken for the fanciful, absurd, and revolting cause, as it is regarded, of the liberty of the negro. Apprehensive of the force of this weapon, and eager to bid against the nominees of the Chicago Convention for the pro-slavery sympathies existing in the Northern States, the Federal Secretary of State hastens to declare that the measures which have been adopted against slavery by the Lincoln Administration are resorted to merely for the purpose of the war, and will cease to have effect as soon as the Southerners can be induced to lay down their arms and return to the Union.

Of course. The Guardian may well add it never doubted that was the true state of the case. Such, in fact, has been the constant tenor of Federal manifestoes intended for use at home all the time that a very different policy has been professed for Europe. Who, therefore, but willing dupes, such as it is John Bright's mission to mislead, will continue to be deluded by the hypocritical pretext that the Federal Government has any the smallest interest in effecting, or even forwarding, by force of arms the 'emancipation'—heaven help him!—of the slave?

I have had occasion more than once to observe with much gratification the manly and high-toned part which the Unitarian clergy in Lancashire have taken in discussing the American war. Another minister of that Church, the Rev. John Page Hopps, has recently volunteered to give a course of lectures on Southern Independence. The reverend gentleman thus 'apologises' for the course he has been 'moved' to adopt:—

I have been one of those who thought the less English people said about the sad strife in America the better. I have never been able to see that we had much to do with discussing in public the right on the one hand to secede and the obligation on the other to coerce. It has all along been my opinion that we ought to wait for some sign of a change in the excited minds of the people of America before we undertook to discuss their affairs. But I think that time has now come; and, believing as I do that a real anxiety for the return of peace prevails in America, I think we should help to strengthen that desire till it is realised, by spreading abroad in this country such a knowledge of the whole question as shall lead the English people to sympathise with the movement to bring about peace in the only way now possible—I mean by the peaceable independence of the South.

It is my earnest belief that peace can be only indefinitely postponed—that the movement for peace can only be thwarted—by any flinching from this solution of the question. Sooner or later it must come; and it seems to me that the hour has arrived when every lover of freedom and friend of peace should give strength and clearness to the message we shall send from England.'

The reverend gentleman has already delivered a lecture in Oldham, and it will scarcely be news to say that he carried the meeting entirely with him. This evening he will address the constituents of the President of the Board of Trade, and no doubt will meet with the same success. He will also visit Rochdale, Stockport, Preston, and other towns, for the purpose of delivering lectures upon the same subject. Mr. T. B. Kershaw is also entering upon another series of lecturing engagements, and a requisition, I believe, is about to be presented to Mr. George Dawson, M.P., of Birmingham, soliciting him to deliver a lecture at our Free-Trade Hall upon the 'Life and Character of Stonewall Jackson.' Unless Mr. Dawson has grown greatly too materialistic for his subject, this ought to be the theme for him.

LETTER FROM RICHMOND.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

RICHMOND: August 18, 1864.

FIGHTING AT PETERSBURG — CONFEDERATE GENERALS — THE EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS — THE FIGHT IN MOBILE BAY — THE PEACE QUESTION.

THERE has been but little change in the military status since the date of my last letter. In front of Petersburg nothing whatever has occurred worthy of note. The skirmish lines of the respective armies have become quite pacific, and the Federal batteries have ceased, except at considerable intervals, to shell the town. But the same quiet has not prevailed on the north side of the James. On the 13th, a considerable cavalry force was embarked on transports at City Point, and started down the river, on their way, it was then supposed, to Washington; whereupon General Lee despatched Hampton by land in the direction of Culpepper. But the Federal cavalry did not proceed to Washington—they did not even go to Fortress Monroe; they landed on the north bank of the James, not far below City Point, moved cautiously up the river, and formed a junction with the infantry forces already there and others that were about that time pushed across the river under cover of darkness. The object of this combined movement was to take the Confederate left wing (the force on the north side of the James) by surprise, force it back within the fortifications, take the works at Chafin's Bluff in reverse, and advance their lines some miles nearer to Richmond. Accordingly reconnaissances were made on the 14th and 15th, and on the morning of the 16th a determined assault was made, the negroes being put in the forefront of the army. The assault was repulsed, and the enemy driven back with considerable loss.

General Lee had discovered the trick of his adversary, and recalled Hampton in time to be present at the affair here spoken of. Nevertheless, the Federal lines overlapped the Confederate some distance, owing to the superior numbers of the enemy, and this made it necessary for the Confederates to weaken their line by stretching it out to a corresponding length. The Federal commander took advantage of this necessity, and at noon on the 16th he massed his troops (the second and tenth corps) against a single point, made a resolute charge, and broke through Wright's brigade of Mahone's division. Lane's North Carolina brigade, which was on the left of Wright's, assisted by a part of Benning's and G. T. Anderson's Georgia brigades, were brought up at double quick and hurled with great violence against the enemy, who had poured through the gap like water rushing through a crevasse in the artificial banks of the Mississippi, and drove them back under cover of the captured breastworks. After a short pause, during which a rapid fire was kept up by both sides, the Confederates, raising their well-known war shout, renewed the charge, and in a few minutes succeeded in beating the foe from his covert and re-establishing their former line. They took between six and seven hundred prisoners, two stands of colours, and a considerable number of small arms.

On the 17th (yesterday) Gary's and Chambliss's cavalry brigades, supported by Gregg's Texans, assaulted the enemy's extreme right and drove it back through White Oak Swamp, capturing a considerable number of prisoners, horses, and other military property.

It may be claimed, therefore, that this last move by Grant upon the military chess-board—a move made, doubtless, with the hope of assisting Mr. Lincoln in his Presidential aspirations rather than with any expectation of success in a military point of view—has not only been unsuccessful, but, like his mining operations in front of Petersburg, disastrous. His losses have also been considerable, being three or four times as heavy as those of the Confederates. The latter have to mourn, however, the fall of Brigadier-General Chambliss, of Virginia, commanding a brigade of cavalry, and Brigadier-General Victor J. B. Girardy, of Georgia, temporarily commanding Wright's brigade of infantry. General Girardy was a very young man, of great promise, who, at the instance of General Lee, had just been promoted, for gallant conduct in the field, from the rank of captain in the Adjutant-General's department to that of brigadier-general of infantry. He is the second young officer of very rare merit from Georgia who has fallen in this bloody campaign; the other being Colonel Edwin Willis, who fell on the Pamunkey. Both of them were known throughout the army, and great confidence was felt that they would attain to high positions if their lives were spared. Two years ago Stonewall Jackson recommended Colonel (then Captain) Willis for a brigadier's commission, and he had just been placed in command of a brigade, though he had not received his commission, when he was killed by a grapeshot. Jackson formed his judgment of men more rapidly, if not more correctly, than General Lee does. He cared very little for the age of a man, so he had capacity, energy, and ambition. General Lee is more cautious in the selection of officers, preferring a man of some age and experience, and of approved conduct in the presence of the enemy. It was not until the battles of Spottsylvania that he gave his consent to promote Brigadier-General Gordon, also of Georgia, a young officer of large brain and of remarkable military aptitude. Mahone of Virginia, and Kershaw of South Carolina, both of whom have won their major-general's commissions this summer, are two other instances of cautious if not tardy promotion. General Lee's rule may be the safer of the two, and yet Jackson is not known to have ever erred in his estimate of officers who had served under him.

Among the Yankee killed is reported Brigadier-General Ferrero, formerly an Italian dancing-master in New York, and commander of the negro brigade. The negroes suffered much more heavily here, as they did at Petersburg on the 30th ult., than did their white associates. Of the 2,200 blacks who joined in the charge at Petersburg after the explosion of the mine, we are informed only 900 ever returned.

It may be stated in this connection that the hitch in the matter of the exchange of prisoners, consequent in part upon the preposterous claims set up for some of their negro troops by the Federal Government, has at last been removed, and it is believed that the exchange will be resumed in the course of a few weeks. It is thought that the Confederacy now has the advantage in the number of prisoners; and this fact, like the stone whose virtue the old man was disposed to try upon the boy in his apple tree, may have had some effect in bringing Mr. Lincoln down from his Abolition stilts. Should the exchange be resumed, it is understood that it will be conducted on the principle of man for man and officer for officer, and that any surplus which either side may have will not be paroled as heretofore, but held for future exchange. It is not probable that the Confederate authorities will make any objection to including in the exchange such free blacks, residents in the North anterior to the war, as may have fallen into their hands; but it is very certain that they will not give up those negroes now in their hands who were seduced or forced from their Southern homes by the emissaries or military power of the North and afterwards required to enter the ranks of the Federal army.

We have nothing of interest from the Valley of the Shenandoah. At our last advices, Early was at Strasburg, while Sheridan, who has succeeded to the command of the Federal forces in Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Northern Virginia, was advancing slowly up the valley with a considerable force of veteran troops. It is not improbable that Early desires to draw him on up the valley as far as possible, when he will fall on and effectually dispose of him.

At Atlanta there has been but little change within the last week. Sherman sent out two small raiding parties a few days ago, one of which tore up a few yards of the track of the Atlanta and La Grange railway, but they were quickly and easily dispersed. He has shown some disposition to extend his right wing round to East Point, the place where the railway just named unites with the Macon and Western Railway, but thus far his success has not been of a character to encourage him. For the last few days he has been unusually quiet, owing perhaps to the operations of the Confederate cavalry against his communications. Wheeler, Hood's chief of cavalry, was sent to Sherman's rear some days ago, and we have a report that he struck the railway between Atlanta and Chattanooga at Ackworth, but with what result we are not informed. Wheeler is a capable and enterprising officer, and it is not probable that he will return without having done the enemy much mischief.

The unauthorised and unnecessary surrender of Fort Gaines, one of the outer works of Mobile Bay, still remains a mystery. The report that Colonel Anderson, the officer in command, married a Northern woman, and that he is a cousin to Major Anderson, the Federal commander of Fort Sumter at the opening of the war, does not furnish a satisfactory solution; for, if he had been so inclined, he has had it in his power any time these four years to go over to the enemy. And yet it must be said that his surrender of the fort and its garrison was wholly unnecessary, and was made in disregard of the most positive orders from his superior officer to 'hold on to your fort.' It is not improbable that the evacuation and destruction of Fort Powell, a far inferior work, though done in perfectly good faith, was not absolutely unavoidable. The conduct of the little Confederate flotilla, on the other hand, was exceedingly gallant. When his three cotton-clad companions had been taken, disabled, or driven off, the heroic Buchanan, standing outside the iron shield of the Tennessee, as in the fight of the Merrimac, continued single-handed the unequal contest. Like a lion at bay, he stood his ground, even compelling his enemies to fly when he made a dash at them. Gathering around him in a circle, they continued to draw closer and closer to him, first one pouring a broadside into him and then another, first one trying to run him down and then another, until at length the old lion of the sea, severely wounded and unable to stand himself, his men exhausted and smothering, was compelled to do what he had never done before, and what with anything like an equal chance he would not have done then—lower his flag to the enemies of his country. One can appreciate the feeling which prompted the remark, when he hauled down his flag, that he would have gone to the bottom of the gulf with pleasure if he could only have grappled the Hartford, Farragut's flagship, for ten minutes first.

The water does not seem to be auspicious to Confederate arms. In nearly all their engagements with the enemy upon the water, including the famous duel between the Alabama and the Kearsage, they have been compelled to yield to the North. In the great naval battle of Hampton Roads alone were they victorious. Even where they have occupied works near the water, they have frequently found it necessary to submit to a surrender—a treacherous surrender sometimes, it is true. The general explanation of these frequent disappointments is obvious enough. The people of the South are an agricultural and not a mechanical people. They have but few foundries, few ship-yards and ship-builders, and but few mines in successful operation from which to obtain suitable metal for heavy machinery. In this respect their enemies have an advantage over them quite equal to their superiority in numbers. Their ports, if not effectively blockaded in the sense of the Paris Convention, are sufficiently so to prevent, if such a thing were otherwise practicable, the importation of heavy machinery from foreign countries.

However, the Confederates will endeavour to take care of themselves. Fort Gaines has surrendered; Fort Powell has been evacuated and blown up; and Fort Morgan, which still remains, was designed to operate against an enemy approaching from the sea and not from the inner harbour. In addition to this, their little fleet has been destroyed; and, though they have the wood and the iron, they have not the machinery, nor the means of manufacturing it, for other vessels. These vessels and machinery cannot be procured elsewhere. Nevertheless, the Confederates have the bar in the bay, a number of shore batteries, and hundreds of stout hearts behind them, and others moving from the Trans-Mississippi Department—perhaps crossing the great river at this very hour—and with these they will, with the help of Heaven, try to make good their defence. Thus far, since their entrance into the bay, the enemy have made no fresh offensive movement. It may be that, having sealed up the port, they will be content with their success.

Your readers cannot have failed to observe the change which has occurred in the United States in favour of peace. Even the New York Herald recommends an armistice and the sending of commissioners to Richmond to arrange for a Convention of all the States. What if peace should come, and the North were the first to recognise the independence of the Confederate States? Might she not secure from the latter commercial advantages which the maritime Powers of Europe would regret for many years to come? Under the circumstances here supposed, the Confederates will do what any other people situated as they are, and snubbed as they have been by other Powers, would do; they will give the North better terms than they would have done if other Powers had moved earlier, or acted with more fairness and candour.

7 P.M.

There has been heavy cannonading down the river for the last hour. It still continues as I close.

LETTER FROM NEW ORLEANS.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA: August 27, 1864.

YOU cannot understand, perhaps, with how little emotion the news of the surrender of Fort Morgan was received by our people on Wednesday morning. Surrounded as it was by a fleet carrying 250 guns, five of them, including the captured Tennessee, ironclads, all the hostile guns heavier than those of the fort, this alone might have sufficed to tear the fort in pieces. In addition to this there was a force of 16,000 men on the land side of the long slender peninsula on which the fort stood, with 100 guns and mortars from between 150 and 400 yards of the base of the fort.

Before they attacked the fort the Yankees had learned that the garrison consisted of 800 men and possessed 136 guns of the heaviest calibre. On receiving its surrender they find that there were but 41 guns, mostly smooth-bore 32-pounders (there are no guns of so light calibre in their fleet), and that the garrison is not even 400 men, although they report it at 600.

In the meantime the garrison had destroyed the value of each gun, flooded the magazine, burned all the provisions and buildings in the fort, and ruined all the ammunition. At first the captors claimed all this as the effect of their destructive fire; but when they began to examine, and found nothing to reward their cupidity, they began to suspect the truth. Even the fort is hardly a stronghold any more. The 400 kept them at that point three weeks, and they got nothing but a few prisoners. Except in the capture of the two forts and of the Tennessee, the balance is against the Yankees in the account with Mobile. I have it from one of their own officers that they have lost largely, more than they have captured. Notwithstanding their newspapers count 870 at Fort Gaines and 600 at Fort Morgan, their entire lot of prisoners, naval and otherwise, is less than 900.

At noon on Wednesday the Yankees here fired a salute of, some say, a hundred guns, but I did not hear so many. One reason why our people did not seem much depressed by the fall of Fort Morgan was that on the same day they heard of the terrible defeat of their foes at the north side of the James River. According to their own account they lost 6,000 men there, and I hear it stated at a third more. We took the salute to our own account.

With this success at Fort Morgan come reports in the papers here that the people of Mobile are tired of secession, ready to revolt, one third is governing two thirds, and that the woods are full of runaways from Confederate conscription. Why do not these runaways find their way to the Union camp? There are no lions in their path. I once believed in these stories, but do so now no longer. The only refugees we see now-a-days are either people whom the Yankees have robbed until they are forced to come among them to get something to eat, or a gang of robbers who fight for plunder on whichever side yields the richest spoil. If the people of the South are tired of secession, why is it that neither New Orleans nor Memphis can be trusted to elect their own mayor?

The Confederacy is in danger.

I am very well satisfied that the Confederate States have arrived at the most critical period of their existence. They are menaced by a more formidable danger than ever before. That they have borne the bitter storm of persecution, of devastation, and war's direst and most destructive hail, is nothing to that insecurity into which they are likely now to be drawn by the kindness of friends, and by which they will be carried shortly over the Niagara of destruction.

There is actually danger of the election in the North of a President who will offer to restore the Constitution of the United States to its normal vigour: to recall, as void and mischievous, all proclamations against slavery, and even guarantee the safety of the institution in all States whence they have not already driven it—rather, so far as they have not already deported the slaves.

The Northern cause, as it is now presented to the South by Abraham Lincoln and his generals, has no friends among Southern people, unless it be a few who are spies or who hope for great profits to come from the sale of their country's interests. Even when the enemy occupies their towns, they submit only to orders and pray night and day for deliverance. They curse him bitterly in their hearts even when they smile in his presence.

There is reason to fear, however, that if there is an effort made to conciliate the wealthy classes, and especially the slaveholders, by promising them present and future security for their property, that there will be many, whose means give them influence, who will be ready to barter independence for an inglorious peace.

There are very few abroad who understand clearly that, though the menace against the institution of slavery was the immediate provocation of the revolution, it was not the object of it. That, with the great mass of the people, is independence, and that only. The slaveholders in the West, at least, and in the Border States hung out against the disruption, because they saw their property likely to be endangered. Property is always Conservative, and so it made them.

It is greatly to be regretted that the chief European Powers have not ere this settled the question as to whether there should be any reunion by acknowledging the independent existence of the Confederacy, and thus adding an additional reason for a resolute refusal, even under the most ample guarantees, for a return to the Union. Not that I believe this possible; for I believe that such Southern men as should, for the sake of slavery or any other mere property interest, take the yoke of the invader upon their necks, would be indignantly thrust out of the Confederate borders; but all dissent is dangerous to final success.

What a pity it is that the world does not know and see that not one man in twenty now engaged in the Confederate service has any immediate or prospective interest in the question of slavery, but that one and all are fighting for the independence of all their interests from the control of the Northern States! These men are not the victims of despotism, nor are they 'rude, unlettered men,' unable to appreciate their rights or without clearly defined intentions. They are men of ripe judgment and bold and outspoken wills, who are, like Mr. Davis, 'fighting for independence, and that or extermination they will have.'

We have quite a number of startling reports around us, some of which may prove true: but they are so numerous and extraordinary that we do not place secure reliance in them, at least to the extent which they have reached. There is no doubt but that General Forrest has attempted to surprise Memphis, while the Federal General A. J. Smith was hunting him in Mississippi. The report is that Forrest has taken Memphis with its small garrison and its department commander Major-General Washburne and staff. General Washburne is the one who put old citizens on the trains of cars to protect his soldiers in passing through a hostile country. He will have an opportunity now of trying some similar experiments.

It is also reported that Forrest burned five steamboats at Memphis, and destroyed an immense quantity of stores. We do know that the attempt has been made; the bold rider who has undertaken it will succeed if any one can, and if he does so, no man can sport a loftier plume than he among the daring spirits of this war.

Perhaps from a desire to vie with this achievement, the story is now current that Price has traversed the country between him and St. Louis, entered that city and made prisoner of Rosecrans. Another story places him on the east side of the Mississippi, having crossed about Helena in Arkansas with his whole force. An attempt to do this is not improbable.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

FEDERAL FINANCES.

WE are credibly informed that the Government of the United States is about to negotiate a loan at the Hague on the terms of 40 cents in the dollar to the contractors; the issue price is to be 42 cents in the dollar. All profits over that to be divided between the contractors and the United States Government. Owing to the low rate at which this loan is contracted, the negotiation is, for the present, kept a profound secret. We are not positively informed of the amount, though rumour speaks of 100,000,000 dollars. The promised interest payable in gold is stated to be 7 per cent. At least one-half of the amount is to be paid by the contractors in greenbacks.

Supposing the loan to be effected on these terms, the United States Government will receive for $100,000,000 in stock at 7 per cent. specie interest only $$28\frac{1}{3}$ millions in specie. Consequently, the rate of interest paid on the amount actually received will be $24\frac{12}{17}$ per cent.

In this calculation we have supposed the premium on gold to be 140 per cent., and that one-half of the 40 per cent. is to be paid in greenbacks.

There are at present three Federal Government loans offering in the United States market. The 'ten-forty' is a 5 per cent. loan, interest payable in gold, and the principal redeemable in gold at any time after ten and within forty years. The '1881' is a 6 per cent. loan, the interest payable in gold, and redeemable in gold in 1881. The 'seven-thirty' loan bears interest payable in greenbacks for three years, and then it can be converted into '1881' stock or into currency at the option of the holders. The '1881' is the favourite stock.

Mr. Fessenden is hardly pressed for money. On September 5, there had been paid to two-thirds of Grant's army the pay due to them to June 30. Altogether there is about $100,000,000 due to the troops, and it is intimated that they will be paid before election time. Mr. Fessenden will doubtless be compelled to issue a large amount of paper money in the next six weeks.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

The state of the discount market is not discouraging; but with money at 9 per cent., a bank suspension, and minor mercantile difficulties, it cannot be said that prospects are cheering. It is hoped that no further serious disasters will take place, but some unsoundness in trade evidently exists which it is desirable to be prepared for. The maintenance of the present high terms, it is believed, will produce eventually a healthy reaction; and if this shall prove the case, we shall not regret the little struggle which has occurred to attain this end. The late fall in the cotton market, and the fright occasioned by the state of the exchange in India, have accomplished much good, and, with a restriction of business for a month or six weeks, affairs will in all probability right themselves. If the accounts of the Banks of England and France shall steadily improve, as it is expected they will, the tone of things will gradually become better. It is a very favourable symptom to see the career of speculation arrested at the Stock Exchange, and to find that fancy securities are now entirely neglected till a substantial change shall come 'o'er the spirit' of the money market. Bankers and brokers continue as usual to be well supplied with capital, but they will have their rates for the negotiation of even the best bills from which they can make their selection. About $8\frac{3}{4}$ to 9 per cent. are the terms; but six months Bank remittance bills have been done at $8\frac{1}{4}$ and $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The late settlements in foreign stocks and shares entailed for a moment an enhanced enquiry in those quarters, but it soon passed over, and now once more there is full abundance at comparatively low prices.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The bullion market has assumed a better appearance under the increased rate of discount. The amount of gold sent into the Bank during the week has been 352,000*l.*, and other parcels are expected to be sent in forthwith. At the same time the withdrawals have been only 45,000*l.*, of which 20,000*l.* was for Mauritius, and 25,000*l.* for the Brazils. The arrival of specie, however, has been exceedingly small, viz., 2,600*l.* for New York. The Poonah steamer for the East has taken out 147,984*l.*; of this amount 120,910*l.* was silver, and 24,074*l.* gold, destined as follows:—87,404*l.* to India, 37,430*l.* to China and the Straits, 20,000*l.* to Mauritius, and 3,550*l.* to Aden and Galle. The silver market has been very quiet, the dealers having been awaiting the result of the tenders for Indian bills to-day. The sales effected in the early part of the week, both for bar and Mexican dollars, showed no alteration whatever from previous rates. It is announced that the Suffolk sailed from Port Phillip on July 2 with 41,986 oz. gold, and the S.E.H. on the 16th of the same month with 18,925 oz., making together 52,911 oz. of the value of 211,641*l.*

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The English stock market has been rather more buoyant this week, and closes with a tendency to further improvement in prices. The brokers, however, are restrained from operating with that freedom which otherwise might be expected, in consequence of the uncertain state of monetary affairs generally. The probability of money becoming dearer stops speculation to a great extent, and much activity is not anticipated till affairs are in a more settled state. Consols closed this evening at $88\frac{1}{8}$ to $88\frac{1}{4}$ for money, and $88\frac{3}{8}$ to $88\frac{5}{8}$ for the account, which, as compared with this day week, is a rise of about $\frac{3}{8}$ per cent. Exchequer bills are steady, those of March being 15*s.* to 5*s.* dis., and those of June 25*s.* to 15*s.* dis. The foreign stock market has not exhibited any particular activity, and prices for the most part remain very steady. In the chief stocks the only variations have been a decline of $\frac{3}{8}$ per cent. in Greek, an advance of $\frac{1}{8}$ per cent. in Mexican, and a fall of $\frac{1}{4}$ and $\frac{1}{8}$ respectively in Spanish Passives and the Certificates. The closing quotations this evening were, Greek, $23\frac{7}{8}$ to $24\frac{1}{8}$; Mexican, $27\frac{5}{8}$ to $27\frac{7}{8}$; Spanish Passives, 32 to $32\frac{1}{4}$; ditto Certificates, $14\frac{1}{8}$ to $14\frac{3}{8}$; Turkish Six per cents. of 1854, 90 to 91; and those of 1862, 70 to $70\frac{1}{2}$.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The market for American Government and Railway securities was not at all active in the early part of the week, and prices remained very steady, but within the last day or two there has been an improvement, and to-day there has been more doing than for some time past, at a further advance, chiefly on the rumour of the capture of Mobile by the Federals. The transactions comprise United States, at $42\frac{1}{2}$, $42\frac{3}{4}$, $44\frac{5}{8}$, $44\frac{7}{8}$, $44\frac{1}{2}$, and 45; Virginia State, $32\frac{1}{4}$, $32\frac{1}{2}$, $31\frac{3}{4}$, and $32\frac{1}{2}$; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York section, $74\frac{1}{2}$; do. do., Pennsylvania do., 75; Erie shares, $100 shares, 42, $42\frac{1}{2}$, 43 and $43\frac{1}{4}$; Illinois Central, all paid, $52\frac{1}{2}$, 52, 51, $53\frac{1}{2}$, $52\frac{3}{4}$.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

This stock has weakened sensibly this week under less favourable advices from the States, and upon rumours of the fall of Mobile, with continuous sellers. The price is now called 73 to 74.

THE COTTON TRADE AT BOMBAY.

According to advices to August 23, the market had been depressed, and the business done had been entirely on speculation. The total export for the fortnight had been 33,768 bales, and the total export from January 1, 726,097 bales.

TENDERS FOR BILLS ON INDIA.

The biddings for 30,00,000 rupees in bills on India took place to-day at the Bank of England. The proportions allotted were to Calcutta 17,77,000 rupees, to Bombay 12,00,000 rupees, and to Madras 23,000 rupees. The minimum price was as before, 1*s.* $11\frac{1}{2}$d. per rupee on Calcutta and Madras, and 1*s.* $11\frac{3}{4}$d. on Bombay. The applications within the limits amounted to 98 lacs. Tenders on Calcutta and Madras at 2*s.* will receive about 23 per cent., on Bombay at 2*s.* 8*d.* about 60 per cent., and all above these prices in full.

TREASURY BILLS FOR NEW SOUTH WALES.

It is notified that the Bank of New South Wales, as the agents of the New South Wales Government, are authorised to negotiate Treasury Bills to the amount of 100,000*l.*, due January 1, 1868, at 6 per cent. Tenders will be available to the 26th inst. The bills are to be receivable by the Government in payment of taxes, revenue, or purchase money for land, any time after April 1, 1866.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

The market for the English Railway securities has been fairly active throughout the week; in the early part prices were very heavy, and in some instances much lower. There has, however, since been a rally, and when any change is exhibited it is in most cases on the favourable side, but the variations are not of importance. The dealers appear more inclined just now to operate in this class of securities, induced in a great measure by the favourable nature of the traffic receipts. As compared with this day week, there has been an improvement of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in Great Northern; of 1 per cent. in North Staffordshire; of $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. in South Eastern; and of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in West Midland (Oxford), Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, Midland, North-Eastern (Berwick), and do. (Leeds). On the reverse side there has been a decline of 1 per cent. in London and South-Western, and of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in Great Eastern. Foreign and colonial shares have been dealt in to a fair extent, particularly Indian and Canadian descriptions, which show a slight improvement in prices.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES, &C.

At a special meeting of the Unity Joint-Stock Mutual Banking Association (in liquidation), Dr. Cook, the chairman of the committee of liquidators, in the chair, a report was read showing that the cash received amounted to 10,521*l.*; cash expended, 1,117*l.*, leaving a balance in hand of 9,403*l.* The known and estimated outstanding liabilities amounted to 1,086*l.* The cash balance would allow of a distribution of 3*l.* per share to the proprietors, and leave a balance in hand of 763*l.* The liquidators recommended such a distribution, after the payment of which they believed they would be able to collect sufficient to make a further division of about 2*l.* per share. The report was adopted, and a resolution passed requesting the liquidators to call upon the directors to return the money which they had (as alleged) illegally received as directors' fees.—At an extraordinary general meeting of the London General Omnibus Company, it was shown that the net profits of the half year ending June 30 were 36,210*l.*, showing an increase of 10,907*l.* over the corresponding half year of 1863. Out of this sum 5,000*l.* had been paid of the bank loan; 7,000*l.* was proposed to be added to the reserve fund, making a total of 12,000*l.*, leaving a disposable balance of 24,210*l.* Out of this amount the directors recommended a dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, adding a bonus of 6*d.* per share, making altogether 2*s.* 6*d.* per share or $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. free of income tax, after which a balance of 5,040*l.* would remain to be carried to the current half-year's account. The report was unanimously adopted.—At a meeting of the London Joint-Stock Bank, the resolution of a previous meeting increasing the capital to 1,000,000*l.* by the issue of new shares at a premium of 10*l.* per share at the price of 30*l.* was confirmed.—At an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders in the Crédit Foncier Company, the resolutions of the 5th inst., voluntarily winding up the company and appointing the directors as liquidators, were unanimously confirmed.

MERCANTILE SUSPENSIONS.

The drafts of the Leeds Banking Company having been returned on Saturday last by their London agents, Messrs. Smith, Payne, & Co., the Bank suspended payment on Monday. The liabilities are said to range between 700,000*l.* and 800,000*l.* It is understood that the difficulties have been occasioned through large advances made on mills, and the extension of its discount business. The paid-up capital is 110,100*l.*; there are 230 proprietors, most of whom are said to be wealthy, and as the establishment is not under the Limited Liability Act, it is thought that the liquidation may prove satisfactory. At a meeting of the shareholders held to-day a committee was appointed for the purpose of either disposing of the concern to another bank, or transferring it to a new company.—The suspension is announced of Messrs. Dawson, Graham, & Pugh, wholesale grocers. The liabilities are estimated at between 20,000*l.* and 25,000*l.*, with favourable assets.—A failure is also reported to have taken place of a large firm at Havre engaged in the cotton trade. The liabilities are reported to be large.—The failure was announced this afternoon of Messrs. Saalfeld Brothers, of Leeds, in the woollen trade. The liabilities are reported to range between 80,000*l.* and 100,000*l.*

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

The produce trades continue for the most part in the same dull state as noticed for some time past, owing chiefly to the high rate of money, and although importers avoid pressing supplies heavily on sale, prices are still declining. Arrivals are of fair extent, and deliveries, whilst not in all cases equal to those of last year, are satisfactory, so that there is no undue accumulation of stocks, which are, however, in most instances ample. With increased arrivals of wheat from the northern Continental ports, and good supplies of home-grown, prices are further depressed 1*s.* per qr. on both English and foreign. Maize is also cheaper from increased importations. Oilcake is inactive, owing to the improved state of the pastures from the recent fine weather. Prices are hardly so firm, although quotations are still retained at 10*l.* 5*s.* to 11*l.* for American. The provision trade is quiet, but for fine butters rates are pretty well maintained. 124*s.* is the present quotation for the best Friesland, and 90*s.* to 108*s.* for good to fine American. Bacon is declining in value, the weather being more favourable for curing. There is a good demand for cheese, and especially for American descriptions, which range from 48*s.* to 62*s.*, the better qualities being most in request. Lard maintains its value firmly. Navy provisions are dull of sale, and tending to lower prices. Petroleum sells steadily at 2*s.* 1*d.* per gallon for refined, and 16*l.* 10*s.* to 17*l.* per tun for crude. Rosin is not in demand, but rates are steady at 31*s.* to 42*s.* for American, and 25*s.* to 34*s.* for French. The business in turpentine is restricted to small retail lots at 63*s.* to 63*s.* 6*d.* for French. The nominal quotation of American is 90*s.* in casks. The seed-oil markets continue very dull, but without much depression in quotations. Linseed oil offers at 34*s.* on the spot, pale foreign rape at 46*s.*, and brown at 42*s.* Sperm oil is rather more saleable, but at easier rates, 64*l.* to 66*l.* being now the quotation. The tallow market has become very inactive, and prices are drooping, in consequence rather of the continued dearness of money than from any change of opinion respecting the future course of the trade. A further decline of 1*s.* per cwt. has taken place in sugar, and purchases on the spot are made very sparingly at the reduction, but there is some demand for floating cargoes for outports as well as the continent. The tea trade keeps very dull. In spices, pimento has advanced slightly; $2\frac{1}{4}$d. to $2\frac{5}{8}$d. per lb. were the last prices paid. Manilla hemp is cheaper, 24*l.* 10*s.* to 24*l.* 15*s.* being accepted to-day for barely fair roping. English tin has declined to 101*l.*, and Banca to 98*l.* cash.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, September 21.—Our cotton market has manifested some little improvement within the last few days, the ideas entertained with regard to a speedy suspension of hostilities in America being in some quarters now looked upon as hopeless, in consequence of the successes of Sherman in Georgia. Although the dealings have not been equal to the usual average, prices have slightly recovered from the late fall and still show a firmer tendency. The sales this week have been 30,000 bales, of which 14,000 were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year have been 1,908,410 bales, against 1,802,526 bales to the corresponding period in 1863. There have been imported this year 1,697,402 bales, last year the number was 1,075,913 bales. The trade have taken this year 1,179,306 bales, and to the same period in 1863, 966,107 bales. The exports this year have been 411,496 bales, last year they were 328,111 bales. There have been taken on speculation this year 321,414 bales, and in 1863, 469,318 bales. The estimated stocks at the present time are 393,436 bales, and at the corresponding period last year they were 171,727 bales. The closing quotations this afternoon were, for American descriptions, $26\frac{1}{4}$d. to $28\frac{1}{2}$d.; Pernambuco, $25\frac{1}{4}$d. to $27\frac{1}{4}$d.; Egyptian, $24\frac{3}{4}$d. to $28\frac{3}{4}$d.; Surats, 12*d.* to $21\frac{3}{4}$d.; Bengal, $12\frac{1}{2}$d. to 13*d.*; Scinde, $12\frac{1}{4}$d. to $13\frac{1}{4}$d.; China, $12\frac{1}{4}$d. to $19\frac{1}{2}$d.

Notwithstanding the improved aspect of the Liverpool cotton market, business at Manchester continues inactive and depressed. In shipping yarns, however, there has been a little more doing, though the transactions have not been to anything like an average extent, and those only in cases where spinners have been induced to accept lower rates. The average decline from the highest prices obtained is about 5*d.* per lb. In home-trade yarns business is also exceedingly depressed, and the market does not show the slightest improvement, but there is rather more anxiety manifested on the part of spinners to effect sales. The cloth market does not exhibit any symptoms of improvement; in fact prices continue to decline where sales are effected, but these continue very limited. Within the last day or two, buyers have shown more disposition to operate, but the prices offered have been very low; in some cases, however, these have been accepted by manufacturers, who appear to be less sanguine than many others as to the future. According to sellers' prices 7 lb. shirtings, which were up to 18*s.* 6*d.*, are now quoted 16*s.*, and for $8\frac{1}{2}$ lb. shirtings, which were 21*s.*, the price is 19*s.*; 6 lb. shirtings are quoted 14*s.*; 9 lb., 22*s.* 6*d.*; 5 lb. T cloths, 10*s.*; 6 lb., 12*s.*; and $8\frac{1}{4}$ lb. long cloths, 16*s.* 6*d.*; white 9 lb. do., 18*s.*; and 10 lb., 20*s.* 9 lb. printers are quoted 23*s.*, but sales in reality have been made at lower figures.

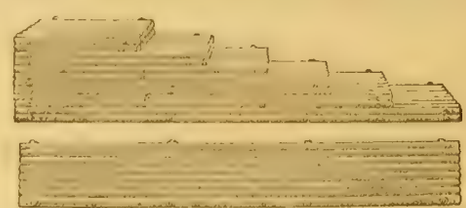
DUNCAN'S PATENT RATAN CANE SPLINTS.



THESE Splints are introduced and recommended to the Faculty for the great advantages which they possess above others,—viz., their comfort, coolness, and durability, as well as the facility with which they may be applied to the fractured limb.

As cleanliness is an important consideration, these Splints possess that quality pre-eminently, as they may be readily washed without the slightest fear of injury.

They are especially adapted to the constant usage of the General Hospital, and the movements of an Army on Service, as they cannot easily be injured. For Colonial practice they are recommended for the same reason.

They have been submitted to, and have received the approbation of, the Principal Medical Officers of the Army Medical Department.

The Splints cannot be injured by moisture; and are manufactured either with or without pads.

3. In case any prohibited articles shall be on board any ship, vessel, boat, raft or carriage arriving in the Confederate States after said 1st of March, and shall be omitted in the manifest, report, or entry of the master or person having charge or command of such ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, or shall be omitted in the entry of the goods owned by the owner or consigned to the consignee of such articles, or shall be imported or landed without a permit, the said goods shall be seized and dealt with, and the vessel and parties shall be subjected to the same forfeitures, fines, and penalties as in cases of similar omissions, landing, importation, or attempt to land or import, in relation to articles liable to duties on their importation into the Confederate States.

5. The following additional oath or affirmation shall be taken by each master or person having charge or command of any ship or vessel which shall arrive at any port of the Confederate States after the 1st of March, 1864, viz.: 'I further swear (or affirm) that there are not, to the best of my knowledge and belief, on board (insert the denomination and name of the vessel) any goods, wares, or merchandise, the importation of which into the Confederate States is prohibited by law; and I do further swear (or affirm) that if I shall hereafter discover or know of any such goods, wares, or merchandise, on board of the said vessel, or which shall have been imported in the same, I will immediately, and without delay, report the same to the collector of this district'

THE AUTOGRAPHIC MIRROR.
Nos. XV., XVI., NOW READY.

CONTENTS:—A Photo-Lithographic Fac-simile of the Original Articles of Liberties, demanded by the Barons of King John; a Photo-Lithographic Fac-simile of the Magna Charta of King John, dated at Runnymede, 15th June, A.D. 1215; Transcript and Translation of both Documents; A Letter of Henry V., and a Sonnet by Charles D'Orleans, his prisoner (1425); Lord Eldon; Prince Alexander Gortchakow; General Count de Berg; Marquis of Lansdowne; Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe; Sir G. Hamilton Seymour; Chevalier Bunsen; Bodenstedt; Lehmann; Charlotte Birch; Pfeiffer; Harriet Martineau; Sir David Brewster; Paul Delaroche; and Charles Mathews (the elder); Illustration, L. E. Ude, the modern Vattel. Price 2s. The Original Articles of Liberties, and the Magna Charta, with Transcript and Translation, may be had separately, price 1s. 6d.

'We can scarcely confer a greater favour upon ennuyés of the provinces than by recommending them to seek a reflection of their historic lore in the 'Autographic Mirror'—a work which, from a promising infancy, has now progressed into a vigorous maturity. . . . . The 'Autographic Mirror' promises to prove a work of very considerable interest. When finished and bound up it will make as valuable an addition to the scholar as it now may contribute an amusing one to the drawing-room table.'—Morning Post, July 27, 1864.

'"The Autographic Mirror" is so cheap and so excellent, that it ought to take well with a large class of readers. . . . . The publication is in "good style," and a year's numbers will make a very handsome and exceedingly attractive volume.'—Morning Herald and Standard, February 25.

'"The Autographic Mirror," of which we have the twelfth number before us, is an agreeable novelty, and we are glad to see it so well supported, both by contributors and subscribers. The work is in a large folio form, and is published twice a month, on the 1st and 15th, at the price of a shilling. The specimens seem extremely well selected, and neatly and accurately copied from the original documents into these interesting pages. A series of the completed volumes of the work will be both valuable and entertaining.'—Court Circular, August 27.

'The latter numbers of this remarkable publication—for it is remarkable—have reached us, and we are constrained to admire, not less the fidelity of imitation than the extensiveness of the autographs presented. Nay, even original sketches form a feature in the work, which, valuable for history, is, artistically speaking, worthy of the highest commendation.'—John Bull, July 23.

'Fourteen Parts of "The Autographic Mirror," each containing every variety of materials—from the letters of a Sovereign to the clever caricatures of a Thackeray—have now been issued, and sufficiently attest the favour with which the publication has been received, and the abundant resources for its continuance which the editor has at his command. The low price at which it is published requires a large sale, but at the same time ought to command it.'—Notes and Quaries, September 10.

'The work is surely making its way to the position of a great success.'—Observer, June 26.

'The Tenth Number is an excellent one.'—Observer, July 9.

'The present number contains an interesting and varied collection of autographic letters. When bound, this "Autographic Mirror" will prove one of the most interesting collections of the time.'—Observer, August 7.

The Northern Peace Party.

THE split in the Democratic party is not a subject for surprise or regret. The Chicago Convention was a hollow truce. Forbearance and compromise are indeed essential to the existence and usefulness of a party, but to compromise on the most important issue before the country is simply absurd. Now this was done at Chicago. The Peace Democrats and the War Democrats, after long negotiation, entered into a compact to join forces against the Republicans. It is fair to say, however, that the Peace men never consented to any sacrifice of principle. The arguments by which they were won over were very plausible, and the terms offered were perfectly fair, and such that as patriots they were bound to accept them. The War Democrats declared that they were determined to have peace; that they would strive to restore the Union by diplomacy; but if that failed, then they were prepared to recognise the independence of the South. These terms, we say, were proffered by the War Democrats to the Peace Democrats, and they were fully endorsed and pertinaciously urged by those who are known to enjoy the confidence of General M'CLELLAN. So at Chicago the War Democrats voted for a pacific platform, and the Peace Democrats voted for the favourite candidate of the War Democrats. The election being so near, it was expected that the alliance would last until the new President was chosen; but General M'CLELLAN has been driven by the moves of the Lincolnites to forthwith discover his game, and consequently the friends of peace will not have to endure the mortification of securing the return of a War President. Much to General M'CLELLAN's disgust, he found that Mr. LINCOLN was bidding heavily for the peace and non-abolition votes. Mr. SEWARD made a pro-slavery speech, and Mr. LINCOLN buzzed about that he was solicitous to put an end to hostilities. Alarmed at these commonplace manœuvres, and fancying that the fall of Atlanta would evoke some martial ardour, General M'CLELLAN promptly and rashly adopted the strategy of his opponent. Mr. LINCOLN was going in for peace, therefore General M'CLELLAN came out boldly for war. Grievously has the General blundered. He will not get any Republican votes. He has certainly lost the support of an influential section of the Democrats.

We need hardly observe that, so far as the South is concerned, it matters not whether a War-christian or a War-democrat is the next President of the United States. And we may add that it matters not to the North. If Rome is to be burnt, it is as well that the conflagration should be directed by a fiddling NERO as by a graver tyrant. If America is doomed to another four years of bloodshed and devastation, it matters not whether the master of the White House is a second-rate jester or a second-rate soldier. General M'CLELLAN says that he will abide by the Constitution. Mr. LINCOLN made the like promise before the war began. The truth is, to carry on war against the South necessitates the violation of the Constitution. It is vain to try to compass the evil end by righteous means. Whilst the North is seeking to trample on the liberty and rights of the South, she must needs forego her own rights and liberty. This General M'CLELLAN knows by experience. During the whole of Mr. LINCOLN's administration there has not been a more flagrantly illegal act than the arrest and imprisonment of the Maryland Legislature. Who suggested and effected this iniquitous business? Why, it was General M'CLELLAN who planned and carried out the most arbitrary proceeding of the present Federal Government. But General M'CLELLAN is not without an excuse. He pleads military necessity and incorrect information. But this is Mr. LINCOLN's—it is the universal—plea and excuse for tyranny. Whether a War-christian or a War-democrat, whether LINCOLN or M'CLELLAN, is President of the United States, so long as war is waged against the South, so long will acts of despotism be necessary. We are, therefore, neither glad nor sorry to hear that General M'CLELLAN has much less chance of winning than he had a month ago. We are, however, concerned to enquire how far the prospects of peace have been affected by the Democratic split.

There are now three parties in the United States. We do not count the FREMONT party, for that is virtually extinct. In many respects there are striking analogies between FREMONT and M'CLELLAN. Both want power. Both favour the prosecution of the war. Both assert that they can carry on the war without violating the Constitution, although each of them in his military capacity has grossly violated the Constitution. We are now informed that FREMONT is about to retire from the contest, and we dare say that he will not go unrewarded for the sacrifice.

The Republican party—or rather let us say the Lincolnite party—has thrown off all disguise as to the object it has in view. Does any one suppose that the Lincolnites wage the ferocious war out of love for the Union? Let such a one mark what has lately occurred. From the pulpits, platforms, and presses of New England it has been declared repeatedly and passionately that, if a Republican was not elected President, then the struggle for the Union was over. At one moment after Mr. LINCOLN's letter 'to whom it may concern,' it was suggested that a candidate more popular should be put forward. Now let us ask why the restoration of the Union would be in greater jeopardy if a War Democrat should be chosen for President. M'CLELLAN is as much for the Union as LINCOLN is. Yet the Republican leaders were sincere and candid in declaring that they should treat the election of a Democrat as the signal for giving up the contest. If a Democrat had to bestow the patronage of the Government, the war, instead of being a profit, would become a burden to Republican citizens. Hence, if some unforeseen accident should give M'CLELLAN a majority, and the master of legions should respect the decision of the ballot-box, the Republicans would at once advocate peace. Or is it suggested that the Lincolnites are fighting for emancipation? Why, Mr. LINCOLN has been most careful to avow that with him emancipation is merely a war measure, and this month his chief Minister Mr. SEWARD has stated that his party do not intend to interfere with the institution of slavery after the conclusion of peace. It is not for the restoration of the Union—it is not for emancipation—that the Lincolnites are working. Their object is the retention of power. The Republican party is for emancipation or for the perpetuation of slavery, it is for Union or disunion, it is for any principle or for any policy that will secure a renewed lease of power.

The War-Democrat or M'CLELLAN party is actuated by precisely the same motive. It deplores the war, and will carry on the war. It talks of peace, and rejects the only means by which peace can be obtained. It talks about the rights of sovereign States, and is prepared to fight against the sovereign rights of the Southern States. It changes and shifts with every gust of popular passion. Now the people are weary of the war, and the War Democrats are for peace. Anon Atlanta falls, FARRAGUT gains a naval victory at Mobile, the shoddy contractors get up a little show of martial ardour, and forthwith the War Democrat is for war. The M'CLELLAN party, like the LINCOLN party, has but one object, and that is at any cost to get power and patronage.

The third party is the Peace party. Now we do not say that this party, like its antagonists, does not covet power. All political parties aim, and rightly, to obtain office, for that is the very purpose of party organisation. But the Peace party has a distinct and definite policy. It stoutly maintains that whilst it hates the war it loves the Union, but it is prepared to recognise the separate government of the South, if the South declines to reenter the Union. The present strength of the Peace party is unknown. Probably it is in a minority, and the 4th of November is so near that it may be that there is no chance for the election of a Peace candidate. But nevertheless we are convinced that the Peace party by breaking from the War Democrats will gain enormously in influence. In the United States, especially on the border of the Western States, there are multitudes of men who are sick of the war, and who will gladly rally round a Peace party. Henceforth every military disaster, every fresh list of killed and wounded, every threat of a draft, every commercial difficulty, every act of despotism, will swell the ranks of the Peace party. If M'CLELLAN becomes President, New England will league herself with the Peace party. If Mr. LINCOLN is reelected, the leaders of the War Democrats will find themselves deserted, for their followers will join the Peace party. We therefore believe that the prospects of peace are brightened because the Chicago Convention is broken up, and because there is a party in the North which inscribes the word 'Peace' upon its banners.

It may be that the war is not so near an end as we think, and that our judgment is biassed by our earnest desire for peace. We do not conceal that we wish for peace, for if we did so we should grossly misrepresent what we know to be the sentiment of the Southern people. The South fights for peace, and for peace only. She asks nothing of her antagonist but to be let alone. We are aware how this peace sentiment of the South is used to keep up the war spirit in the North. The Confederate Government, under a dread sense of responsibility, whilst wielding the sword with one hand, holds the olive-branch in the other. Not one hour of unnecessary war will the Confederacy permit to be laid to her charge. But strange it is that this anxiety for peace should be regarded as a sign of the South being about to give in. Strange it is that it should be necessary to declare that the only terms on which peace can be made are the withdrawal of invading armies from Southern territory. Between the two peoples there is a great gulf, which war widens, but which a century of diplomacy cannot bridge. If any Northerner is under the impression that the South will consent to reunion on any terms, we would remind him that the South could at any time since the war broke out have returned to the Union on any terms she chose to propose. But she has endured the worst, for with her the worst is past, and in her greatest suffering she has never thought of reunion. The separation is final. The war may last ten years, but, unless the Southern population is exterminated, when peace is made there will be an acknowledgment of the separate government of the South. Therefore the North can gain nothing by not concluding immediate peace. Let the past four years teach her what she will lose by war. Well will it be for the Confederate States, but, above all, well for the United States, if the Northern Peace party becomes dominant.

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

The situation remains unchanged in front of Petersburg and on the line of the Weldon Railroad. General Grant had gone on a visit to Washington, from which place, it is stated, he went to Harper's Ferry. The cavalry of General Lee's army has captured 3,000 head of cattle, opposite Harrison's Landing, on James River.

A furious battle is reported as having been fought on the 18th in the Valley of the Shenandoah, between the Confederates under Early and the Federals under Sheridan. The latter is stated as having made the attack; and the issue of the battle, which lasted throughout the day, was the defeat of Early, with the loss of 2,500 prisoners, 5 pieces of artillery, and 5,000 in killed and wounded, among whom were Generals Gordon and Shaler. Sheridan afterwards occupied Winchester. There is good reason to distrust this report as it is here given. It came by telegram to Cape Race after the departure of the steamer from Boston.

Reports from Mobile, which are discredited even in Washington, state that four monitors of Admiral Farragut's fleet had ascended the bay within shelling distance of the city. No reliance whatever can be placed upon these 'sensational' despatches; but if it should indeed prove true that Farragut has got within range of Mobile, this is by no means conclusive of the capture of the city, as the bombardments of Charleston and Petersburg abundantly prove.

General Price is said to be preparing an invasion of Missouri.

Atlanta was still held by Sherman, who had ordered all the citizens to remove from the town. General Hood granted a truce of ten days for the purpose of effecting the removal, but entered his protest against the order as in violation of the usages of civilised warfare. General Hood was in position at Lovejoy's Station, and affairs were quiescent at the latest advices.

General M'Clellan's letter accepting the Chicago nomination, which we elsewhere publish, has divided the Democratic party. The Peace men have declared against M'Clellan. The New York Daily News, the able and spirited organ of the Peace party, proposes to call another meeting of the Convention. It is supposed that a Peace Democrat will be started. It is also asserted that Mr. Pendleton, who was nominated for the Vice-Presidency, will refuse to run with M'Clellan.

General Fremont, it is said, will retire from the contest.

One Nelson Burlingame has been arrested at Washington City for attempting to enlist lunatics in the Federal army, or as it is more plainly stated in the Philadelphia Inquirer, for 'stealing lunatics' with the intention of putting them in the ranks as substitutes. It does not appear whether Nelson is of the same family with Anson Burlingame, the Black Republican diplomatist, who once declared that he wanted 'an anti-slavery Bible and an anti-slavery God,' nor do we learn the exact circumstances of his arrest, whether it was at the instance of the Directors of the Lunatic Asylum or of Mr. Stanton. Probably Nelson was raising considerable sums of money by providing substitutes for men of sound mind and body, and thus defrauding the Government of good soldiers by giving them crazy ones. Certainly, if his offence consisted only in endeavouring to get the poor lunatics to enlist, it might have been regarded by the Washington authorities as a venial if not a praiseworthy one. In the inception of the war Lincoln abetted the so-styled Governor Pierpoint, of the pretended State of 'Western Virginia,' in stealing $47,000 in gold belonging to the North-western Lunatic Asylum at Weston, in Lewis County, Virginia, so that the idea of humanity is out of the question, while the army is in such pressing want of troops that they might be glad to get any recruits, sane or insane. The Federals have emptied their prisons and hospitals to reinforce Grant; why should they not turn out the inmates of bedlam for this patriotic purpose? Indeed, there are many who regard the 'universal Yankee nation' as stark mad, and the difference between Mr. Burlingame's recruits and the rest of their soldiers would be a difference only in degree.

It would seem a difficult matter for any new Federal commander to emulate with success the infamy of Butler, Sherman, Turchin, and M'Neill, and yet General E. A. Paine, commanding in Western Kentucky, has fairly entitled himself to rank with these ruthless 'restorers of the Union.' General Paine was only assigned to duty in his new department on the 20th July last, but he has made the most of his opportunity. Upon his arrival he was waited upon by delegations of respectable citizens, representing the agricultural and commercial interests of the country, to whom he gave his views with great force and perspicuity. 'Gentlemen,' said he, 'the only question on trial here is, "Are you people of this district ready for the Federal salvation?" If so, well; if not, you must die.' Perfectly plain and comprehensible this; but the General proceeds to develope his plan for the cure of disloyalty and the Federal salvation. He says:—

It is substantially as follows: The first and great commandment is that all you disloyal, rebellious people shall not circulate one dollar of capital in all this land. Not a dollar, no debt or bill of exchange can be paid or made without my signature, and I pledge you I will not approve any money transactions of a disloyal man. All his capital, all his money, every cent of it, shall be placed at the disposal of the Government. I will teach you that, having encouraged this rebellion, having comforted and aided your country's enemies, you must, aye, shall, reap a traitor's reward.

Before going further General Paine seems to have thought it necessary to disabuse the minds of the disaffected Kentuckians of the false notion that they had any natural or political rights, as follows:—

Talk about your rights! Why, you have no rights to talk about. A loyal citizen is the only one left with any rights at this time. And yet you come to me, asking for a banking privilege. Great God! the devil might as well ask the Almighty for a front seat in heaven. No; if in your prosperity you have despised this great and good Government, you may soon have the privilege to love it in your adversity. Not only this, but you ought, aye you must fight for this Government.

Having thus prepared his hearers for receiving salutary admonition, he goes on to announce his 'second commandment:'—

The second commandment is, that all you notorious rebels get out of your houses and leave my district, so that Union men and women may come here to help me redeem this country. What do I care about your tobacco interest, the market value of your niggers or cotton?

Very little, we should suppose, except to 'realise' their value as Butler did in New Orleans, but there remains something yet for Paine to promise. Butler murdered Mumford, and, mindful of this, the General declares:—

I shall shoot every guerilla taken in my district, and if your Southern brethren retaliate by shooting a Federal soldier, I will walk out five of your rich bankers, brokers, and cotton men, and make you kneel down and shoot you. I will do it, so help me God! You men of such large influence will be held responsible for the peace of this district. If a Union man is murdered by these guerillas here, the same fate awaits five of you gentlemen. I have sworn it, and it shall be done.

I am going to manage this district so that when I am done with it the men and women who remain can come together in the name of the Lord, and say that 'we belong to the United States.'

One might well doubt the genuineness of this report of General Paine's remarks were it not given in the columns of a Federal journal by a correspondent who tells us, with refreshing satisfaction, that 'unlike commanders generally . . . he took a straightforward high-minded course, never forgetting that he was the representative of a mighty republic, struggling for victory over treason and rebellion.' But we have a gratifying confirmation of the accuracy of the report in two 'general orders' issued from headquarters, the one three, the other six days after his coming. We give these orders as historical documents, and forbear comment on their sweeping cruelty. They speak for themselves.

Advices from Halifax represent no less than ten blockade-running steamers as lying at that port, the Little Hattie, North Heath, Constance, Flamingo, Lady Shirley, Condor, Mary (formerly the famous Alexandra), Asia (tender to the fleet), Old Dominion, and City of Petersburg. The last two left Wilmington on September 5, and arrived in Halifax, the first-named on the night of the 10th and the second on the morning of the 11th, bringing together 1,800 bales of cotton, said to be in payment of the interest for the Confederate loan. These vessels report the Tallahassee as ready to leave on another cruise on September 6, and a companion cruiser of similar construction and armament was to assist her in crippling still further the coasting trade of the United States.

In the event of hostilities between Spain and Peru, the United States of America may become involved, through the force of a treaty with New Grenada, by which the United States guaranteed to maintain, by strength of arms if necessary, the neutrality of the Isthmus of Panama. Peru has called upon the United States of Columbia, formerly New Grenada, to prevent the passage of Spanish troops across the Isthmus for purposes hostile to her. Columbia, not having the requisite power to oppose Spain in such a movement, has called upon the United States of America to carry out the guarantee of the treaty. The only question that arose upon this demand was whether a treaty made with New Grenada could be set up by the United States of Columbia. The Attorney-General at Washington having decided that New Grenada and Columbia are one and the same, it would seem that Mr. Lincoln may possibly be compelled to send ships and troops to preserve the neutrality of the Isthmus, though ships and men are just what at this moment he cannot well spare.

The State elections in Maine took place on the 12th inst. Sufficient returns had been received at Portland to show the triumph of the Republican ticket by a large majority.

ENGLAND.

Mr. Laing, the late Finance Minister in India, has delivered at Wick a lecture on 'the Trade and Finance of the British Empire,' from which, amidst a crowd of figures of great interest, marshalled with the skill and authority of an accomplished financier, the following statistics may be extracted:—The foreign trade of Great Britain and Ireland for the year 1863, according to Mr. Laing, amounted to 444,000,000*l.*, nearly double of the aggregate of imports and exports in 1854. Of the sum total, 248,000,000*l.* represent the imports, and 195,000,000*l.* the exports. Articles of consumption and raw materials imported were as follows: Corn, 28,000,000*l.*; live stock, 6,000,000*l.*; butter, eggs, and cheese, 6,000,000*l.*; tea, 10,500,000*l.*; coffee, 4,000,000*l.*; sugar, 12,000,000*l.*; dried fruits, 2,000,000*l.*; spirits, 1,800,000*l.*; wine, 4,500,000*l.*; tobacco, 3,300,000*l.*; cotton, 56,000,000*l.*; wool, 12,000,000*l.*; silk, 9,500,000*l.*; flax, hemp, and jute, 4,000,000*l.*; timber, 11,500,000*l.*; oils, 8,000,000*l.*; dyeing materials, 4,000,000*l.*; hides, 3,500,000*l.*; copper and other metals, 4,000,000*l.*; hemp and jute, 3,500,000*l.*; tallow, 2,500,000*l.*; guano, 2,560,000*l.*; leaving 25,000,000*l.* for miscellaneous articles. In exports, cottons figured at 47,500,000*l.*; woollens, 20,500,000*l.*; linens, 9,000,000*l.*; haberdashery, hats, shoes, &c., 9,000,000*l.*; silks, 1,500,000*l.*; metals, 28,000,000*l.*; earthenware and glass, 1,800,000*l.*; arms and ammunition, 1,500,000*l.*; beer, drugs, alkalis, butter, cheese, bacon, pickles, &c., 7,500,000*l.*; coals, 3,700,000*l.* British possessions were the best customers, furnishing very nearly one-third of the import and one-half of the export trade. So British India gave nearly 50,000,000*l.* of imports and took 20,000,000*l.* of exports. Australia, exclusively of the precious metals, sent 7,000,000*l.* and received 13,000,000*l.* The North American colonies gave 8,000,000*l.* imports and took 5,000,000*l.* exports. At the head of the foreign list stood France, showing an aggregate of imports and exports amounting to 42,000,000*l.*, an increase of about 18,000,000*l.* since the commercial treaty. The average imports and exports with the United States, which used to reach 60,000,000*l.*, have declined, owing to the war, to about 40,000,000*l.* The trade with Egypt amounted to 20,000,000*l.*, that with Russia to only 18,000,000*l.*, with Prussia and North Germany to 32,000,000*l.*, with Holland to 18,000,000*l.*, Belgium to 9,000,000*l.*, Spain to 6,500,000*l.*, Cuba 6,000,000*l.*, and Brazils 8,000,000*l.*

For more than three months a strike of considerable magnitude and of serious consequences has prevailed in the South Staffordshire district. About 30,000 colliers have thought fit to combine to raise the rate of wages, to deprive themselves of some thousand pounds of pay, and their masters of any possibility of a return for their capital or of the execution of pending contracts. The mischief has now assumed a more threatening aspect, and it is certain that, unless some solution of the matters in dispute be devised, the trade of Birmingham will come to a stand-still from want of coal. Indeed, if the strike continues for another fortnight, about 50,000 artisans in Birmingham will be thrown out of work, and the suffering from the coal famine will be as terrible as that from the cotton famine. A meeting has been held at Birmingham, with the Mayor in the chair, to consider the position of affairs. After some debate a resolution was carried requesting the parties to the dispute to accept the arbitration of Lord Lichfield and Lord Lyttelton, the Lord-Lieutenants of the counties of Stafford and Worcester, in conjunction with the Mayor of Birmingham. During the course of the strike there has been the usual amount of intimidation exercised against persons willing to work at the disputed rates, and some disturbances have ensued in consequence of the arrest and punishment of the ring-leaders in a case of prohibition. Indeed, the defendants were conducted to the police-court amid the applause of a mob of 2,000 persons and the sounds of bands of music. The punishment inflicted on them was six weeks' imprisonment with hard labour. Fears are entertained that the disaffection will spread into the Cleveland iron district, where the results would be most disastrous, from the present activity and the enormous contracts in hand. Large numbers of men continually arrive from Staffordshire fully prepared to inculcate the doctrine of 'higher wages or no work.' At the Tudhoe Ironworks, the men, according to notice, have already stopped work.

The National Association for the Promotion of Social Science commenced its eighth annual session, in the city of York, on Thursday last. The capital of the North was of course filled with a crowd of statesmen, economists, philosophers, judges, and physicians, with a few political and social quacks, and a goodly sprinkling of ladies eminent either for real or pretended talents. Papers were announced as in readiness at the hands of both male and female lecturers on every conceivable subject, from 'Crowded Lodging-houses' to 'Aboriginal Races in Australia.' Lord Brougham delivered, as President, the inaugural address; and his speech, wandering over a wide field, surveyed the theory and practice of education, the revised code, the Post Office, the improvement of lighthouses, the balance of power, the partition of Poland, the aggressive policy of Prussia and her outrageous conduct towards Denmark, the Aberdeen Act, colonial policy, private bills in Parliament, Mr. Gladstone's Annuities Bill, county courts, the treatment of convicts, permissive liquor laws, bribery and reform, the French army at Rome, the Belgian elections, the American war, and the decline of orthodoxy in the Church. One passage from his Lordship's speech perhaps deserves quotation verbatim. It will be observed that his Lordship, though particularly severe against the Federal Government and people, is by no means ready entirely to acquit the Southern States. In fact, Lord Brougham bears a slight resemblance to the plagosus orbilius of Eton School, who, to preserve decorum in the College chapel, was accustomed to condemn to the rod on each Monday in the year a section of ten boys, in accordance with his idea of a rigid in terrorem impartiality. The words of his Lordship were these:—

Some good men have been deceived by the notion that slavery is the cause of the war—duped by the pretext that the North fights to free the slave, whereas their emancipation edict was a mere belligerent measure, and an after-thought; they (as Bishop Wilberforce said) caring no more for the freedom of the black than they do for that of the white. But it had been reserved for the later act of the tragedy to see that Government, when destitute of other troops, drive herds of the unhappy negroes to slaughter, with no more remorse than sportsmen feel in clearing a preserve. Yet certain though it be that the North did not make war to free the slave, and that this could not have entered into their consideration when they began the contest for preventing the secession, it is no less certain that the maintenance of slavery—their detestable institution—was partly the object of the South in fighting for their independence; and the friend of humanity, although feeling that we are not entitled to require a more sudden emancipation than we ourselves effected in our colonies, may yet earnestly hope that out of this cruel contest and its countless evils the mercy of an all-ruling Providence may draw the good, contemplated by neither party, of giving freedom to the slave. But whatever difference of opinion may prevail regarding the origin of this frightful civil war, there can be none as to the duty imposed on other nations of not taking part with either belligerent; and in this country persons were most properly warned by proclamation against enlisting in either army, the enforcement of the Foreign Enlistment Act being held out as certain. Every British subject is liable to its penalties who so enlists, and that which now is a misdemeanour was formerly a felony, at one time punishable with death. All who serve in the army of either party are guilty, and may be prosecuted in the Court of Queen's Bench as if their enlistments had been in an English county. Therefore, the North makes war upon the South by troops composed in part of persons liable to prosecution for the offence of enlisting, and it was one of the gravest charges upon George III. that he employed German mercenaries against the independence of America, though these Germans were guilty of no offence in hiring themselves to the service. The poor Irish, who thus sell themselves, break the law of their own country in order to perpetuate in America all the crimes of civil war.

Lord Brougham, unfortunately, is willing to add himself to the number of those who can congratulate themselves on the attainment of an end in spite of the atrocity of the means.

FRANZ MÜLLER, after a protracted examination, was on Monday committed for trial by Mr. Flowers, the magistrate at the Bow Street police-court. When asked whether he wished to say anything in answer to the charge, the prisoner replied, 'I have nothing to say now.' The proceedings at the coroner's inquest were also brought to a close on Monday, and the verdict of the jury was that 'the deceased died from the effects of foul violence inflicted on him in a first-class carriage of the North London Railway on the night of the 9th of July last, and that Franz Müller was the man by whom the violence was committed.' The foreman of the jury also said that 'the jury, while giving their verdict, took the opportunity of expressing their dissatisfaction with the present state of railway accommodation, as affording facilities for the perpetration of various crimes and offences, and earnestly desired to call the attention of the Home Government to the subject, and to the necessity of enforcing the adoption by railway companies of some more effectual system of protection to life, character, and property.' It is not necessary, in view of the coming trial of Müller at the Central Criminal Court, to give an abstract of the evidence adduced before the magistrate and the coroner. So far as space will admit, the principal points as exhibited at the trial before the Court will in due course be detailed.

AMONG forgeries worthy of record the acts of a delinquent named John Woodhead Marsden ought not to escape notice. The Leeds Banking Company suspended payment last week, and a committee is busily employed in the Augean task of unravelling the mysteries, detecting the frauds, and adjusting the figures involved in the accounts. Among other discoveries of a similar nature, it has been found that one of the customers has passed 1,000 forged bills of exchange, representing 68,000*l.*, through the bank, and that bills of a similar character are held to the amount of 10,000*l.* Marsden was indebted to the bank for several thousand pounds, and was summoned before the committee. He, however, believed that in flight there was safety, and at once disappeared. His manager, Thomas Scaife, attended, made a full confession, was arrested, and, after examination, committed for trial. It is stated that the banking company is under liabilities for bills to the value of about one million sterling, and that a large amount of the bills is fictitious paper. The total liabilities of the bank are about two millions sterling, and the assets about one million.

WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR died at Florence, on the 17th inst., at the ripe age of 79. The deceased was descended from an ancient family, and he inherited estates that had been in the family possession for nearly seven centuries. Though best known as an author, he led a somewhat eventful and active life. He took part in the Spanish war, and received the thanks of the Supreme Junta and the rank of colonel. But being indignant at the unconstitutional proceedings of Ferdinand, he resigned his commission and the record of thanks. He was a professor of Republicanism, but rather disgusted Republicans by devoting his energies to the preservation of game. His works were brilliant, and at one time popular; but they are no longer read. They lack purpose and consistency, and they lack ideas. The 'Imaginary Conversations' will perhaps prove the most enduring. His last days were clouded by an unfortunate affair at Bath, in which Mr. Landor was clearly in the wrong, and the only excuse that could be offered for his conduct was the infirmity of old age.

THE CONTINENT.

ITALY.

The effects of the new Franco-Italian Convention have been instantaneous, striking, and important. Nothing less was to be expected from the terms of it, of which we gave a résumé last week. The leading feature in it is that at the end of a definite time the Italians are to be allowed to arrange their affairs with the Pope and his subjects en famille without the officious interference of friends. Such at least is presumed to be the intention of the treaty; but the framers of it were evidently aware that the family arrangement which would take place upon the withdrawal of the French troops from Rome would be short and sweet; the French would go, and the Pope would follow in the next steamer. To prevent such a consummation, it is arranged that the Pope should keep up a certain force, presumably sufficient to keep his own subjects in order, till a more pacific settlement should be arrived at with the Italian Government. The outward and visible sign by which the position of affairs in this case can best be symbolised, is the establishment of the seat of the Italian Government at Florence, this being a step nearer Rome, and at the same time a pledge of moderation and caution in further advances; since a transfer of the Government from Turin to Florence, and thence immediately to Rome, would involve an expense from which even the prodigality of the Italian Government would shrink. Another reason is given, and one of the greatest weight, why Florence should be made the metropolis in the place of Turin. Great uneasiness continues to prevail on the score of the attitude of Austria towards Italy. Turin must always be exposed to a sudden march of Austrian troops out of the Quadrilateral; Florence, on the contrary, is protected by the Apennines and by the sea in a manner which must make a sudden surprise from any quarter almost impracticable. Under these circumstances we cannot wonder that it should be generally understood that the present will be the last session of Parliament held at Turin. The people of Turin are, of course, disgusted; they have enjoyed for some years the advantages of a great metropolis, and have given little in return. Their town has been year by year crowded by an influx of Italians from all parts of the kingdom; the accommodation which they could offer to them was insufficient, and no capitalists could be found bold enough to lay out money in the enlargement of the town, in the face of the probable removal of the seat of Government, which is now to take place. Prices at Turin were consequently exorbitant; and the inhabitants reaped a more than golden harvest out of the political difficulties of their country. Immediately, therefore, upon the publication of the new convention in Turin, rioters began to assemble. On the evening of the 20th inst. the concourse was induced to disperse after a few shouts of 'Down with the Ministry.' On the next evening they again assembled in front of the Royal Palace. This time the shouts were 'Turin for the capital.' The military were called out, and encircled the rioters; these tried to break through the iron ring and attack the houses of some of the Ministry; the carbineers on duty, exasperated by the resistance and suffering from the attacks of the crowd, fired upon the people—without orders, as the official gazette asserts, but the question is of no moment—several of the citizens were killed and others wounded. Of the carbineers some twenty were wounded, some of them seriously. Again, on the following evening the crowds collected, this time supplied with missiles and firearms. Fresh troops had been summoned into the city under the command of General della Rocca; the mob was firmly met. The advice of Napoleon was followed, never to fire over, but right into a crowd: twenty persons were killed and wounded; on the side of the military also some casualties took place. On the 22nd inst. another attack was made by the mob; the object of their violence on this occasion was the office of the Gazette of Turin; it was repulsed by the National Guard, but not without the infliction of wounds on both sides. The Syndic of Turin has published a proclamation calling upon the inhabitants of the city to leave the question in the hands of their deputies, who will see that their rights are fairly recognised in Parliament. The King has taken the energetic step of calling upon General La Marmora to form a ministry. The gravity of this proceeding must not be disregarded; La Marmora is a soldier, and little else but a soldier, and his appointment betokens either troublous times for the internal affairs of Italy, or a fatal preference on the part of the King for violent measures to the more regular course of an appeal to the Constitution. The Ministry have certainly shown themselves unequal to the occasion, and the King appears to have acted with great judgment in requesting them to send in their resignation. General La Marmora has taken into his Cabinet two Piedmontese deputies, S. Lanza and S. Pella, for the portfolios of the Interior and of Finance respectively. His Majesty has, of course, been extremely distressed at the late manifestations in Turin, and had formed the intention of riding through the streets to show himself to the people after having first issued a manifesto explaining to them the intentions of the Government. On attempting, however, to draw up the manifesto so many serious difficulties were encountered, that it was found necessary to abandon the whole plan. The arrangement, proposed in consequence of the Convention, has been received with entire satisfaction by the rest of Italy. Florence declares itself willing to accept the temporary diadem, only with a view to the passing of it on eventually to Rome. A few journals only have considered the act of emigration from Turin to Florence as a surrender of the principle on which Italy was founded, and a mere playing into the hands of the Pope.

Count de Sartiges has communicated to the Pope the terms of the Franco-Italian Convention. The Count gave renewed assurances of the goodwill of the Emperor towards His Holiness, with promises of advice and assistance to enable the Pope to carry out any measures which might be necessary in view of the proposed solution. The Pope and Cardinal Antonelli both declared that the announcement had not surprised them, that they were aware that the status quo could not be indefinitely prolonged, and acknowledged the loyalty and good faith of His Majesty. His Holiness demanded time for the careful consideration of the terms proposed, in order that he might at a future time deliver a well-weighed opinion on the effect of the new state of things on the interest of the Papacy.

FRANCE.

An expedition is in rapid course of preparation at Toulon for the ascent of the Niger River. The French Government has furnished guns, ammunition, and a military force. The general expenses, which are on the most extensive scale, are to be defrayed from private sources. Captain Magnan, a retired officer of the French navy, will take the command. His fleet will consist of a galliot, a merchant ship, and four gunboats of light draught. He will be accompanied by a select force of scientific men and artists, and will take out a rich cargo of miscellaneous goods.

If 'vice, by losing all its grossness, loses half its evil,' surely swindling may be redeemed by its own magnificence. It is difficult to imagine the President of the Tribunal of Correctional Police consigning to eighteen months' imprisonment an individual who bore the name and titles of Wladimir Milonitowich, Duke of Medunum, Duke of Grao, and who was, moreover, a near relative of the reigning Prince of Montenegro. Astonishment at the audacity of the magistrate is increased with the knowledge that the accused also claimed the immortal name of Miltiades of Greece. Pity for fallen greatness might have touched the heart even of a French judge on learning that so noble a man had accepted the shelter of the roof of an hotel-keeper in the Rue de l'Arbre Sec, being at the time destitute of food, of money, and of clothes; and that pity should have changed to admiration for the charity of the Countess Gaetano de Barrigha, a lady of great wealth, who paid a debt of 70 francs to the hotel-keeper, who supplied her protégé with cash, and even honoured his drafts to the amount of 25,000 francs. Then again there was the liberality of M. Wall, who thought the name of a relative of the Prince of Montenegro a sufficient remuneration for coats and pantaloons to the value of 3,068 francs. Certainly, M. Wall, as well as one M. Onpell, a chemisier, had the additional satisfaction of believing that their customer was betrothed to the sister of the King of Portugal, and held in his possession the crown diamonds of Montenegro. When Wladimir Milonitowich emerges from the dungeons of Paris, doubtless the tailor, the shirt-maker, and the countess will once more hasten to relieve the cousin of the ruler of Montenegro.

An amusing example has lately been presented in the Civil Court of the Seine of the extent to which a French restaurateur will charge, and a Russian spendthrift be expected to pay. A young Russian nobleman named Bazylewski was brought up before the court for the sum of 600*l.* or 700*l.*, borrowed of M. Vavasseur, the famous French cook of St. Petersburg, besides a trifling account due for dinners, suppers, &c. M. Bazylewski admitted having borrowed the money, but demurred somewhat to the amount claimed for 'goods supplied.' M. Vavasseur's books were therefore produced in court. Among the items were found 'supper and breakage, 470 francs 40 cents; ditto, 1,386 francs; ditto, 1,092 francs 80 cents; breakfast and breakage, 840 francs; supper again, 1,011 francs 20 cents.' What the whole amount claimed might have been is not known. The court declined to allow the plaintiff more than 17,140 francs, or about 1,000 francs more than was due to him for money lent. It is, of course, impossible to estimate the exact value of the item 'breakage'; but it may be suspected that M. Vavasseur, on finding that his guests were in the habit of breaking the crockery (and a very regular habit it was, if we may judge by the bill), would supply them with porcelain less valuable than Sèvres or Dresden for their little parties.

The joke of Eh, Lambert! où est Lambert? still flourishes on the genial soil of France. Edicts have interfered to stop its growth, sergents de ville have ruthlessly crushed it or cut it down. All is in vain. A fine or imprisonment may be the result of the shout of the name of the Parisian 'Walker,' but at least the provinces are not discouraged. Not many days ago at Chambéry, at midnight, a cry of 'fire' arose. Heads at once emerged from open casemates, and the demand was made, 'Where is the fire?' Chez Lambert was the prompt reply. An oath at the unseasonable wit of the spoiler of sleep, and a slamming of windows, immediately followed. Yet the answer was true. One Lambert, a tanner, was beholding the destruction of his shop and his effects, and no one would help him.

> Nil habuit Codrus; quis enim negat? et tamen illud
> Perdidit infelix totum nihil.

Indeed, every inhabitant of Chambéry was panic-stricken at the thought of being made, as our neighbours would say, 'the object of a mystification.'

Vermouth and Fille de l'Air have again joined issue on the turf, and this time victory crowned the efforts of the mare. Indeed, it seems that each successive struggle serves only to illustrate the utter impossibility of deciding which of these two excellent animals is worthy to be considered the chief of the French turf. It is pretty certain that Vermouth and Fille de l'Air will not again meet during the present season, and it may be worth while to glance back for a moment at the career of each. Fille de l'Air, the property of Count de Lagrange, ran more than once as a two-year-old, and not always with success. She, however, won the Criterion Stakes at Newmarket in splendid style, and at once, on the merit of that performance, rose to the position of first favourite for the Two Thousand Guineas Stakes at Newmarket. She maintained that position throughout the winter and spring, and on the morning of the race was backed at very short odds. In the race she never galloped a yard, was hopelessly beaten before the first 200 yards had been passed, and never consoled her numerous admirers by even a struggle for success. She next proceeded to France, and after carrying off some small race, together with the French Oaks, returned to England to contest the Oaks on Epsom Downs. On that occasion she won with some ease, and the famous scene was enacted which afforded food for French newspapers for several days, to the intense gratification of that portion of the French people which still believes in English jealousy and English perfidy. The rider and trainer of Fille de l'Air had foreseen the result of victory; and while Count de Lagrange made the best of his way to London, certain gentlemen of the prize ring escorted the mare and her rider to a place of safety amidst the shouts and execrations of the mob. Fille de l'Air then took another trip to Paris to contest unsuccessfully the race for the Grand Prix with Blair Athol and Vermouth. Next she appeared at Ascot and was beaten. Time went on, and the mare turned up at Baden, where on one day she managed to defeat Vermouth, and a few days afterwards to be defeated by Vermouth for the Grand Prix de Bade. Finally, on Sunday last she met and beat Vermouth at Longchamps in the race for the Grand Prix du Prince Impérial. Vermouth has enjoyed a less chequered career. His stable companion Bois-Roussel was good enough to win the French Derby, and he himself was able to overthrow the champion of the English turf, Blair Athol, perhaps next to his sire Stockwell the greatest racehorse in England, in the race for the Grand Prix de Paris. What Vermouth did at Baden has been told. On Sunday, September 18, he won at Chantilly, and on Sunday last he was beaten at Paris. A match between Blair Athol and Vermouth would surpass in interest even the great match between Voltigeur and the Dutchman. That Blair Athol meeting his former conqueror on equal terms in the matter of health would revenge himself, is the firm belief of the English turf. But it is probable that England seldom, and France never, has seen a better horse than the gallant Vermouth.

SPAIN.

Gonzalez Bravo has issued a circular to the governors of the provinces, couched in the most grandiloquent language, and abounding in exalted expressions of admiration for the Queen and of confidence in the virtues of the new Ministry. A more sterling composition is a series of decrees according an amnesty for all offences against the laws of the press to the day of the date of the decree, stopping all processes then pending, and remitting all fines inflicted on journals between January 1, 1857, and the present time. The Cortes is dissolved, and the elections are ordered to take place on November 22.

GERMANY.

We have no very certain news with regard to the proceedings of the Conference of Vienna. One of the subjects lately discussed has been the liability of Denmark for the public debts of the Duchies. According to the latest accounts, Denmark has consented to be responsible for a certain part of them. Lord Clarendon is to pay a visit to Vienna. His mission is said to refer to the general issue of war or peace, and to imply a hope on the part of the English Cabinet that something may yet be saved to Denmark out of the wreck. If such be really the object of his visit, it is feared that it will not be successful, so thoroughly are the victors determined to make Denmark understand the full meaning of the maxim, Væ victis. Another conjecture with regard to Lord Clarendon's mission is that it betokens a desire on the part of the English Cabinet to restore their former cordial relations with Austria. It is impossible to appreciate how far this may be true; but at least it is somewhat discordant with the tenor of Lord Russell's late despatch to Herr von Bismarck, which condemns Prussian and Austrian rapacity with equal severity.

The Conferences of Prague on the subject of the commercial relations between the German States, and principally Austria and Prussia, still continue; but the demands which Austria has made are not likely to be acceded to. The fact is that Austria, being a suppliant desirous to partake of the advantages of the Franco-Prussian treaty, has attempted to disguise that character under the mask of a bold and somewhat indifferent spectator, willing but not anxious to join in partnership with his friends. The mask, however, is stripped off by Prussia, who is only too ready to expose her rival's weakness; and it now remains to be seen whether she will press her advantage to the utmost.

DENMARK.

There are pessimists in Denmark no less than in London, and these gentry had more than hinted that the Prince and Princess of Wales had not dared to show themselves publicly in Copenhagen for fear of the comments of the people on English diplomacy. As if to put the real feelings of the Danes to the test, and to give them full opportunity to express themselves under the cloak of darkness, the royal party made their entry into the city at night. The reception which they received must have been as flattering to themselves as it was grateful to the English nation. Without either the stimulus or the restraint of soldiery, the reception given to them by the people was completely satisfactory. Not less so was the party which was afterwards held at the palace, where politicians of every class were assembled in compliment to the heir of the throne of England and the husband of a Danish princess. Among the gentlemen who were presented to the King of Denmark on the evening of the 16th, on which this reception was held, was Mr. O'Leary, the Irishman who offered an auxiliary squadron of 100 Irish foxhunters in aid of Denmark at the commencement of the war. On the next day a review was held, in which a number of the troops took part who had fought at Dybbol and in Alsen. The Prince was unable to be present at this review in consequence of a slight indisposition. The Prince and Princess of Wales left Copenhagen for Stockholm on the 24th inst. in the royal yacht Osborne. They are expected to return to Denmark in eight days. They were saluted on their departure by the ships and the shore batteries, and the vigorous cheering of the spectators.

It is said that, in compliance with a request from the Emperor of Russia, the Danish Government has declared itself ready to hand over to the Grand Duke of Oldenburg all the documents now in the archives of Copenhagen which may assist him in making out his claims to the throne of the Duchies.

The Prussian occupation of Jutland seems likely to be continued yet for some time. It is said that 30,000 men are to be put in winter quarters there. The commandant, Herr von Falkenstein, has published a statement declaring that he has received from the Danish Government certain instructions, enclosed under cover to him, to the Danish functionaries in that province. He declines, however, to recognise in any way the Danish authority so long as the occupation continues, and will consider any such attempts to be in contravention of the terms of the treaty.

HOLLAND.

The King of the Netherlands has opened the legislative session of the States-General with a speech, in which he is enabled to congratulate the country upon a steady intellectual and material progress. Railways are progressing in that country; education is increasing among the middle classes; ship-building is flourishing in consequence of the state of war in the neighbouring countries; there is money to pay for the public service, to relieve the people of some of their burdens, and to continue the redemption of the national debt. We may join the King of Holland in congratulating his subjects that they can make so satisfactory a sketch of their national position, such in fact as cannot be at this moment equalled in any country of the Old or the New World.

GREECE.

The Greeks have taken a very important step, the results of which will be worthy of our most careful observation. By one vote of the National Assembly, one branch of the Legislature—the Senate—has been completely abolished; for the future, therefore, there will be but two powers in Greece, the Crown and the Assembly of Deputies. The measure has met with general approval among the Greeks. Reste à savoir what will be the result of so radical a reform.

BELGIUM.

The thirty-fourth anniversary of the independence of this kingdom was celebrated on the 25th inst. throughout the country. In Brussels the usual processions of bowmen, crossbowmen, &c., took place, and were followed by horse-races and the inevitable balloon ascent. It appears, however, that the citizens of Belgium think that the commemoration of their independence has lasted long enough, and no longer flock to celebrate it with their ancient ardour.

The United States frigate Niagara has returned to Antwerp after her cruise in the Channel.

RUSSIA.

The Emperor is now at Potsdam, the centre of the usual amount of active diplomacy and intrigue. No immediate results have yet appeared from his late travels in Central Europe.

The railways of Russia are rapidly extending themselves; the line from Moscow to Rezan is now completed, and the works on the great southern line are begun. A concession has been made of this line to an English company, of which they may take advantage at any time before the month of November; but so anxious are the authorities to get these works on foot, that they have already, on their own responsibility, put 6,700 men to work on the line, subject to the objections which may be made to them by the English capitalists.

We recorded lately the burning of the fair-buildings at Nijni-Novgorod; another town has now been completely burnt to the ground, every house having been destroyed. Besides the plague of fire, the Russians have also been suffering from pestilence; the contagion, called the Siberian plague, arose first among the cattle, and thence spread—by means of milk, diseased meat, and actual contact—through both the rural and town populations, until St. Petersburg itself was attacked. Stringent measures of police and the return of the cold weather have been required to put a stop to the disorder.

A new law of patents has been introduced by which both natives and foreigners will be greatly benefited. The old forms of litigation have been simplified, and the expense attending it greatly lessened.

CHINA.

Nankin was stormed on July 19 by the Imperial forces. The outer line of defence was taken by assault on the 18th, a breach 120 feet in width having been effected by the explosion of a mine containing 60,000 lbs. of powder. The steamer Confucius, which was under charter to the Chantung guild of merchants at Shanghai, and which was commanded by an American, engaged two heavy batteries facing the river, which had defied the Imperial forces. On the next morning the inner line of defence was carried. Tien-Wang, the rebel Emperor, was found dead in his palace, having taken gold-leaf two days previously to avoid witnessing the disaster to his arms. Many of his wives were found hanging in the same chamber. Kanwang, the shield king, was captured, together with the Chung-wang and many of the Taeping leaders. The city presented a fearful scene of devastation, and the streets were filled with corpses of men who had died of starvation. Nankin is now open to foreign trade.

THE CIRCASSIANS.

A letter from Trebizond, in the Moniteur, says:—'The Circassian tribe, which has taken refuge in a high mountain, behind Gouaia, still holds out in its resistance against Russia. The number of families which have retreated there is estimated at 500. Encounters take place constantly, and, although the besiegers consist of 6,000 men, the Russians have so far always been defeated. A serious attack was made recently, when the Circassians resisted with such energy that 200 of the enemy, including a colonel, a major, and several other officers, were killed or wounded. To resist the besiegers, the Circassians erect with much skill immense piles of stones of a large size, and when the attack is made, by removing one of them, which forms a sort of keystone, the rest roll down into the ravine, crushing everything before them. The mountaineers will resist so long as their provisions hold out, unless the Russians succeed in turning their strong positions. The emigration continues, and the country is being continually traversed by the bands of people removing. About 15,000 persons of the Natoukhatch tribe are expected at Novrosisk shortly, where sixteen sailing vessels, under the Ottoman flag, are waiting to embark them on their arrival. The chief of that important tribe, a rich and important personage, who possesses considerable forests and immense flocks, has already left Novrosisk with 4,000 of his people. The Russian Government has placed the corvette Wolga at his disposal, and to him was paid the greatest attention. He has gone to reside at Kustendjie.'

MEXICO.

The statements from Federal sources of disasters to the Imperial arms in Mexico have proved to be utterly without foundation—as false as Hooker's victory or Milroy's courage. News by way of Havanah is to the effect that Juarez has been driven from Monterey into Chihuahua, and that the French have seized the port of Matamoras. Cortinas was retreating before Mejia, who was advancing on Matamoras.

Negotiations have been addressed to certain firms of shipowners at Trieste for the transport of a large body of emigrants from Venetia to Mexico. The artisans who contemplate trying their fortune in the dominions of the Emperor Maximilian, and who are said to number some hundreds, have formed themselves into an association for the accomplishment of their plan. Petitions have been addressed to the authorities seeking an approbation of the scheme.

PERU.

There seems to be a fair prospect of an honourable arrangement of the difficulties between Spain and Peru. The new Peruvian Ministry entertains views of a moderate character, and has frankly manifested to the Chambers its desire to preserve peace so long as it be without dishonour to the country. By the way in which the Congress has received the explanation of the Government, it shows a wish to avoid precipitation and passion in so important a situation. The press has followed in the path of moderation. Even the declarations of M. Pacheco display a readiness to effect a compromise without inflicting any humiliation, or impairing the dignity, the integrity, or the liberal institutions of Peru. Spain can show herself benevolent without the imputation of weakness, and will, it is hoped, seize the opportunity of forming relations on a solid base, not only with Peru, but with the other Governments of South America.

WHO TALKS OF SUBMISSION?—Let us, however, go so far as to suppose that the Northern general may outwit the most accomplished living master of the art of war—let us assume that Grant is justified when, with a 'buncombe' strangely out of place in the lips of so brave a soldier, he says that the South, in its sore need of recruits, 'has robbed the cradle and the grave'—let us, for argument's sake, take it for granted that the fifth year of the war will find the Federals in possession of Richmond and the Confederates without a regular army. Those noble ranks have, we know, been sadly thinned. Many a bold and gallant leader has been slain; the electric influence of Stonewall Jackson's fiery faith can never again inspire the 'greycoat' infantry to those magnificent charges which decide the fortune of a battle; the cheerful chivalry, the gay enthusiasm of Stuart have long been hushed in death. The land has given its best and bravest to the struggle, and there is a stern sad sorrow in the hearts of those who still prolong the contest. What would the war be like, when it should become no longer one of masses and of strategy? Would the conflict cease as soon as the possibility of retaliating an advance into Virginia by a raid into Maryland or Pennsylvania had passed away? There are two facts which forbid us to believe so; the one is the temper of the South, the other is the temper of the North. Maddened by the long misery of a strife in which their homes had been made desolate, their dearest comrades slain, their women outraged, the Confederates, if they could not defend their cities in line of battle, would die desperately fighting upon their hearthstones. Submission! Who talks of submission? Who believes that these men, than whom no patriots ever fought more superbly for the fatherland, would be, in the hour of supreme trial, inferior in courage to Spaniards or Poles? Who believes that they, with our own proud blood flowing in their veins, and with everything to urge them on to an indomitable, implacable resistance, would bend the knee before the revolutionary commissaries of Mr. Lincoln and their blacks? No; the people of the Confederacy may be exterminated, but they cannot be subdued. Look next at the North, and consider in what manner they would use their victory. With a bitter hatred still rankling in their hearts, half crazy with success so long deferred, they would show but little mercy to the vanquished. They would portion out the lands of their enemies amongst the mercenaries whom they have enlisted in their cause. Horrible enough, in all conscience, has been the history of the war already; but the earth has seen no such Pandemonium as would then ensue. In every house a brave man slain, with his little children lying around him; in every house a lady struggling in the bestial grasp of Africans half mad with carnage, half mad with lust; a red light throughout the land from homes and plantations on fire;—these are some of the pictures that would then revolt humanity. Contemplating these things—remembering that even the ostensible justification of the war has now been abandoned by the shifty and unscrupulous politicians of the North—we can but breathe the word so mournfully uttered by a great English worthy on the outbreak of a civil war infinitely less sanguinary—we can but echo Falkland's cry, 'Peace, peace!'—Daily Telegraph.

GENERAL M'CLELLAN.

THE following is General M'Clellan's letter of acceptance:—

Orange, New Jersey, Sept. 8, 1864.

Gentlemen,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, informing me of my nomination by the Democratic National Convention, recently assembled at Chicago, as their candidate at the next election for President of the United States.

It is unnecessary for me to say to you that this nomination comes to me unsought.

I am happy to know that when the nomination was made, the record of my public life was kept in view.

The effect of long and varied service in the army, during war and peace, has been to strengthen and make indelible in my mind and heart the love and reverence for the Union, Constitution, laws and flag of our country, impressed upon me in early youth.

These feelings have thus far guided the course of my life, and must continue to do so to its end.

The existence of more than one government over the region which once owned our flag is incompatible with the peace, the power, and the happiness of the people.

The preservation of our Union was the sole avowed object for which the war was commenced. It should have been conducted for that object only, and in accordance with those principles which I took occasion to declare when in active service.

Thus conducted, the work of reconciliation would have been easy, and we might have reaped the benefits of our many victories on land or sea.

The Union was originally formed by the exercise of a spirit of conciliation and compromise. To restore and preserve it, the same spirit must prevail in our councils and in the hearts of the people.

The reestablishment of the Union in all its integrity is, and must continue to be, the indispensable condition in any settlement. So soon as it is clear, or even probable, that our present adversaries are ready for peace upon the basis of the Union, we should exhaust all the resources of statesmanship practised by civilised nations, and taught by the traditions of the American people, consistent with the honour and interests of the country, to secure such peace, reestablish the Union, and guarantee for the future the constitutional rights of every State. The Union is the one condition of peace—we ask no more.

Let me add what I doubt not was, although unexpressed, the sentiment of the Convention, as it is of the people they represent, that when any one State is willing to return to the Union, it should be received at once with a full guarantee of all its constitutional rights.

If a frank, earnest, and persistent effort to obtain those objects should fail, the responsibility for ulterior consequences will fall upon those who remain in arms against the Union. But the Union must be preserved at all hazards.

I could not look in the face of my gallant comrades of the army and navy, who have survived so many bloody battles, and tell them that their labours and the sacrifice of so many of our slain and wounded brethren had been in vain; that we had abandoned that Union for which we have so often perilled our lives.

A vast majority of our people, whether in the army and navy or at home, would, as I would, hail with unbounded joy the permanent restoration of peace on the basis of the Union under the Constitution without the effusion of another drop of blood. But no peace can be permanent without Union.

As to the other subjects presented in the resolutions of the Convention, I need only say that I should seek in the Constitution of the United States, and the laws framed in accordance therewith, the rule of my duty and the limitations of Executive power; endeavour to restore economy in public expenditure, reestablish the supremacy of law, and, by the operation of a more vigorous nationality, resume our commanding position among the nations of the earth.

The condition of our finances, the depreciation of the paper money, and the burdens thereby imposed on labour and capital, show the necessity of a return to a sound financial system, while the rights of citizens and the rights of States, and the binding authority of law over President, army, and people, are subjects of not less vital importance in war than in peace.

Believing that the views here expressed are those of the Convention and the people you represent, I accept the nomination.

I realise the weight of the responsibility to be borne should the people ratify your choice.

Conscious of my own weakness, I can only seek fervently the guidance of the Ruler of the universe, and, relying on His all-powerful aid, do my best to restore union and peace to a suffering people, and to establish and guard their liberties and rights.

I am, gentlemen,
Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
GEORGE B. M'CLELLAN.

Hon. Horatio Seymour, and others, Committee.

A THOUSAND LIVES PER DAY.—The Richmond correspondent of the Times writes: 'It may be within the recollection of some of your readers that in a recent letter I estimated the mortality on both sides consequent upon this war as being at the rate of 1,000 lives every twenty-four hours. There are many to whom this estimate will appear extravagant. I regret to say that increased thought and enquiry have only served to convince me that it is not far from the mark. I need hardly say that by far the largest portion of those who perish fall victims to disease. Think of the immensity of this war; of the numberless bodies of men scattered in unhealthy garrisons over the vast area of Secessia, and some conception of the waste of human life (sacrificed to the Moloch of this war no less than if cut short by the bullet) may be formed. As an item I may mention that the deaths among the Yankee prisoners now held in the South average 150 per diem. The deaths of Confederates held captive in the North must be on something of the same scale, though possibly rather less numerous, as the Northern climate is healthier in summer. Here we have 300 deaths (or thereabouts) occurring every twenty-four hours among the prisoners alone. It is not much of a stretch to conceive that each day's fighting, when there are six large armies in the field (to wit, Lee's and Grant's, Hood's and Sherman's, Early's and Sheridan's), not to mention countless desultory bodies of combatants, adds 700 men to the list of perishing victims.'

The Northern papers state that Major Reid Sanders, of the Confederate army, a son of Mr. George N. Sanders, died in Fort Warren on the 3rd inst. Major Sanders was in his twenty-seventh year.

REJECTION OF GENERAL M'CLELLAN BY THE PEACE DEMOCRATS.

(From the New York Daily News.)

THE columns of this paper bear witness that we have laboured to harmonise the Democratic party. Whatever concession we could make that did not involve a sacrifice of the immutable principle to which this journal is dedicated, we have granted. Our most fervent desire was to see consummated the unity and concord of the Democracy in this Presidential campaign. Believing that the life of Republicanism depended upon this issue, we made every effort to conciliate the conflicting sentiments that were arrayed in opposition to the present Administration; for we believed that the defeat of Mr. Lincoln would remove the chief obstacle to peace.

But, above all the claims of expediency, the principle to which we are irrevocably bound sways absolutely, and demands our fidelity beyond all other considerations. We have matured and strengthened the peace sentiment from its germ. We have been faithful to it throughout the ordeal it has passed, an ordeal that it could not have survived if within its own essence it had not possessed the elements of eternal life, the truth that may be hidden but not destroyed. To that principle that is the guide of our political action throughout this crisis, and that commands the journal we have devoted to its interests, we are linked by a bond that cannot be loosened. As we stood by it steadfastly when to do so was to court persecution and to invite oppression, we shall surely not desert it now, in the day of its strength, when, in fact, it rules the political situation. The suffrages of the Peace men are essential to the triumph of the Democracy; but the Peace men cannot give their suffrages in violation of their principles. To be true, therefore, to the Democracy, we must insist that its principles be honestly represented in this canvass and fairly put at issue at the polls.

The Daily News, however great its influence among those that accept it as the organ of their political creed, could not render that influence available in support of the doctrine of armed coercion of the States, and if it could, it would not. We earnestly hope that the States may be redeemed from the great misfortune of sectional antagonism, and that good fellowship and concord may exist among them; but we protest against a work of reconstruction that leaves a stain of blood from foundation-stone to pinnacle, and that, if ever accomplished, would give us a fabric beneath whose roof discord, hatred, and bitter recollections would dwell for ever, controlled by the bayonet and governed by the sceptre.

It was therefore with a satisfaction that knew no bounds that we welcomed, in the platform presented by the Chicago Convention to the Democracy, the proposition for an immediate cessation of hostilities and a convention of all the States. To cease fighting and to appeal to reason and calm discussion of the questions in dispute—that is precisely the plan of action that we have advocated from the commencement of hostilities. It is fair to suppose that the Sovereign States, solemnly assembled in Convention, would exercise such judgment and conciliatory attributes as are due to the spirit of enlightenment and Christianity, and would use their best endeavours to free our political system from its imperfections, that it might accord, so far as possible, with the interests of all, and be offensive to none. The Chicago platform promises with its triumph an immediate cessation of hostilities, and advocates a plan of reconciliation that every Peace man can conscientiously indorse. We accepted it, and with it the candidates nominated upon the platform.

But the candidates and the platform cannot exist apart. The platform is the soul—the candidate is the body. The one may change, decay, perish, the other is immutable and eternal, for it is a principle. The two are, therefore, inseparable in their relative positions, for if the man renounce the principle, he ceases to be a candidate of the party that nominated him.

George B. M'Clellan was nominated upon a platform that promises an immediate cessation of hostilities and a convention of all the States. Does he stand upon that platform to-day? He does not. He has renounced the platform in his letter accepting the nomination. It is as if the bridegroom should accept the bride's property, but not her person. A bond like that is null and void. The Peace party will not consent to have their principle betrayed, and then do homage to the betrayer. They demand all that is nominated in the bond. General M'Clellan having rejected the proposition for a cessation of hostilities and a convention of all the States, declined the Chicago nomination, and stands before the people self-nominated on a platform of his own creation. The Democracy must seek a candidate who will stand upon the platform, for they cannot consistently support one who is in collision with the Convention that tendered him the nomination. If the platform accords not with the nominee's convictions of the right, a due respect for the opinions of the assemblage that unanimously adopted it requires that he should give back to the Convention the standard of the Democracy. The Democratic National Convention is not dissolved. It is ready to convene at the call of its executive committee, and, if General M'Clellan cannot abide by the resolutions through which the principles of the party have been enunciated, let the Convention reassemble, and either remodel their platform to suit their nominee, or nominate a candidate that will suit the platform.

MR. LINCOLN'S EMANCIPATION EDICT.—The New York correspondent of the Daily News writes: 'Lincoln has formally announced that he will entertain no proposition for a return to the Union on the part of the States in rebellion which does not include "the abandonment of slavery." This, I need hardly tell you, was a grave error, and has furnished the Opposition during the last month with two-thirds of their ammunition; for it is clear as noonday that the President has not the shadow of legal right to attach any condition whatever to the return of any State to its allegiance. He has no authority to abolish slavery, and therefore has no right to insist on its abolition; and I can only ascribe his unfortunate mention of it, in the letter "to whom it may concern," to his belief that the public sentiment had grown sufficiently "radical" to support him in an attempt to override the letter of the law. He was greatly mistaken. People acquiesced in the emancipation proclamation, because it had a fair show of constitutionality. But there is not in the Constitution the shadow of a justification for an attempt on the part of the executive branch of the Government to impose on any State, insurgent or not, the reorganisation of its social system as a condition either of coming back to the Union or of remaining in it.'

THE 'HOPE.'—The Wilmington Journal of September 3 says that the blockade-runner Hope, which ran ashore to escape the Federal blockaders, 'is safe and sound.'

SELLING WHITE MEN AT AUCTION.

(From the New York Metropolitan Record.)

WE have maintained in these columns, time and again, that there was one way, and only one way, of placing blacks and whites on a common level; and that was by degrading the white freeman of the North and bringing him down to the level of the negro. No other plan can bring the races one inch nearer than the Creator placed them at the first, and our rulers know it. Therefore, instead of wasting their time by trying to pull the negro up, they endeavour to drag the white man down, and verily they are succeeding. Equality is setting in with a vengeance, but to secure it we have bartered Liberty. But what of that? We got more than its full value.

Formerly the auction block was sacred to the race of Ham; now the white man competes with him even there, and we would fain hope for the credit of the race brings a higher penny. But of this we are not certain. We only know that in the town of West Chester, Chester County, in the Quaker State, a regular auction block has been erected, and on that block white men and negroes have alternately taken their stand and been knocked down to the highest bidder, black or white as the case may be, and not a freedom shrieker throughout the land has made a wry face or entered a protest; not one. Where is Mrs. Stowe? Where Beecher, Cheever, and the rest? Where Phillips and Garrison? Garrison who longed for the time when—

> Fetters shall fall
> From every limb—the strong
> No more the weak shall wrong,
> But Liberty's sweet song
> Be sung by all.

Where's Tilton and the smaller fry?

What, silent one and silent all?

Shall white men be bought and sold, branded and chaffered for, without exciting even comment, while even Abolitionists, skulking behind foreign substitutes, rave of negro freedom? Is this a white man's Republic, or was George Washington a nigger? We begin to get confused and to doubt our senses as we read the following from the Lancaster (Pa) Intelligencer:

'White men and negroes mixed up indiscriminately, in accordance with the most approved theories of abolitionism, are set up to be sold to the highest and best bidder. Those engaged in the traffic have taken out a regular license, under the internal revenue law, and pay an annual tax of ten dollars for the privilege of selling human flesh and blood at public outcry. The coming draft had filled the soul of many an abolition cry of the coward with intense horror. As they heard the gorilla at Washington demanding the blood of 500,000 new victims, the warm current froze in their veins, each particular hair of their heads stood on end with fright; and, much as they loved their money, they prepared to sacrifice their best-cherished idol rather than go in person to fight out the war which their infernal doctrines had inaugurated.

'Human bloodhounds were soon on the track of every white man whom the pressure of want had reduced to a state of desperation, or of any poor devil of a negro who might be bullied, bought, or cunningly inveigled into exchanging his filthy covering of rags for a suit of regulation 'blue,' and the emptiness of his pockets for a well-filled wallet of 'greenbacks.' Having hunted down such prey, the next thing was to dispose of it to the best advantage. The substitute dealers of that section being intimate with the description of slave auctions in the South, as pictured by Harriet Beecher Stowe and others of her stripe, and being alive to its benefits, determined to introduce its benefits into the free (?), intelligent (?), and most Christian (?) county of Chester.

'It was accordingly duly advertised from time to time that at such an hour a sale of men would be held. Now a white man was put up to be bid for by white men and negroes alike, and then a negro. The scramble among the purchasers is said to have been disgustingly exciting. We can imagine the scene, and hear the voice of the crier: "Oh, yes! This way! Draw this way, gentlemen, if you please! We now offer this man, John Jones, aged 46, just out of the draft, and therefore a valuable substitute. He has been stripped stark naked and carefully examined by the board. We warrant him all right, or the money refunded. He has a sickly wife and a large family of small children, but he is sound himself. How much do we hear for him?"

'"Three hundred dollars," cries Mr. Broadbrim, whose breast is torn with contending emotions of cowardice and cupidity.

'"Only three hundred dollars," echoes the crier, "why he is worth three times that money! Four hundred; thank you, sir. Five hundred! Six hundred! There, now, that's lively, gentlemen. Six! Six fifty! Seven! And a half—and a half! Mind your bids, gentlemen. Going! Once—twice—three times—gone!"

'So went the slave auction at the county seat of abolitionised, Quakerfied Chester county.

'This is not a mere fancy sketch. The sales were had at a public outcry, by men regularly licensed as auctioneers of human flesh.'

And yet no Abolitionist has denounced the degrading traffic. Abolition tongues are mute; abolition pews are still; the hands that grasped the thunderbolts of Heaven, and shook them above the land in vengeful threatenings, hang nerveless; and the prophets who formerly had 'all the contortions of the Sybil without her inspiration,' stand silent and motionless. Why is this? Have they no words in which to denounce this crime? Or does its blackness depend upon the complexion of the victim? White slaves! Aye, it has come to that—white slave in the land of Washington! Let the Old World turn her wondering eyes hitherward, and mark our 'alacrity in sinking.' Let her see how easily freemen can be metamorphosed into slaves, and take a lesson from America. She is too slow; we can do the work of centuries in a year.

THE FEDERAL DEBT.—The official statement of the public debt on August 30 shows the amount outstanding to be $1,878,565,234, and the interest, in both coin and lawful money, $77,447,122, or an increase of the public debt since August 2 of $53,073,000, and of interest $1,029,000. The debt bearing interest in coin is now $889,899,492; the debt bearing interest in lawful money, $469,197,000; the debt on which interest has ceased, $357,470; the debt bearing no interest, $519,111,267. The unpaid requisitions are $78,795,000, and the amount in the Treasury, $17,189,518.—New York Shipping List, September 3.

ADVICE TO CAPITALISTS.—No other security is so reliable as that of the United States Government, and no other pays as good interest to those who invest specie.—New York Herald.

OPERATIONS OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

NEW YORK: September 17, 1864.

THE Democrats are making prodigious efforts to give éclat and enthusiasm to the nomination of M'Clellan. There are to be simultaneous meetings to-day everywhere in ratification of the nomination, and to organise for the active canvass. To-day has been selected because it is the anniversary of the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and it is the catchword of the party for the election canvass that it is struggling for the rescue of the Constitution from its enemies. The preparations in New York city for a mass meeting in Union Square are on the most magnificent scale. There is little doubt the exhibition will be as grand and enthusiastic as that held in the same place to oppose the election of Mr. Lincoln in 1860—most likely with about the same success.

Nevertheless, a few of the original Peace men are talking of a third candidate, and private meetings are held in the city to debate the expediency of doing so, in order to preserve the nucleus of an organisation. I doubt whether it will amount to much. The principal leaders of the Peace party are disheartened and silenced, or give in their adhesion to M'Clellan as a bitter necessity, a question of the life or death of civil liberty in the North, before which the contingent issues of the war question become of secondary importance. Neither M'Clellan nor M'Clellan's platform finds favour with these men, who, nevertheless, have prevailed upon themselves not to oppose him—perhaps to vote for him. One of them defends this course upon grounds which serve to explain for all. The following brief excerpts show the drift of the whole:—'We are in the midst of a revolution more deplorable and horrible than ever before afflicted human society, and unless we can overthrow its authors at the ballot-box, in the approacning election, we are absolutely certain to drift into civil war and social anarchy at the North.' 'If he (Mr. Lincoln) should be reelected this fall, civil war will doubtless break out everywhere at the North, for war cannot be carried on an hour against the Confederate States without dragging after it, as an inexorable "necessity," the destruction of liberty in the North, and the majority have at last reached that extreme point of endurance when they will not submit to slavery and absolute ruin of their families.'

What the Convention ought to have done, and General M'Clellan's unfitness to represent a truly constitutional party, are exposed at length with this conclusion.

'If the Convention had grappled with the great questions underlying the war, General M'Clellan's nomination would, of course, be absurd, but as it only sought to disarm the madmen at Washington and reestablish Northern freedom, it does not matter much who is the candidate. First of all, and over all, Abraham Liucoln must be defeated, for until that is done, not even preliminary steps towards peace and union of the States are possible.'

The anticipations of civil war from Lincoln's election spring from the prevalent Democratic opinion that Mr. Lincoln cannot be reelected at a free election, and that, besides the Executive use of the army vote, there are several States, without which he cannot get even an apparent majority of votes, which it is impossible he should carry but by the power of military dictation to the voters, or an absolute seizure of the polls. Such designs are imputed to him as parts of his deliberate purpose to secure his own reelection; and there are very conclusive proofs that he is capable of so acting, in the military means taken to carry the New Hampshire, Connecticut, and Pennsylvania elections last year; the open invasion of the ballot-box in Delaware, Kentucky, and Maryland this year; and the prohibition of the introduction of arms or ammunition into the West, after the 'loyal seizures;' partisans of the Administration have been organised and armed by the Government. The Chicago Convention declared in its third resolution, that 'a repetition of these acts in the approaching election will be held as revolutionary, and resisted with all the means and powers under our control.'

The Democratic addresses and resolutions everywhere re-echo the same resolve, and counsel a general organisation of the opponents of Mr. Lincoln to meet this issue of 'revolution' by armed resistance. The election of Mr. Lincoln, if clearly effected by such means, will be held to be void, and his inauguration resisted. Even the attempt will be the signal for popular commotion and violence, which only troops can suppress. The extent and gravity of these apprehensions were expressed in a letter from Ex-President Franklin Pierce, read in the Chicago Convention, in which, after speaking of 'military presence to overawe the unarmed citizen' in elections, he says:—

'If in any sovereign State, recognising the authority of the Federal Government, military usurpation shall come to suppress in the people the exercise of their rights under "the Constitution" and enacted laws, we will meet that military usurpation with all the power we can command.'

An ominous conflict of powers between the military and the State has just risen in Kentucky. General Ewing, the United States officer in command there, lately issued an order to the civil officers in his military district, directing them to make provision by tax for the raising and supporting of a military force in their respective counties. Governor Bramlette has issued his proclamation directing those officers to refuse obedience to General Ewing's orders.

The friends of Mr. Lincoln are working hard to consolidate their forces for an active canvass, which they say shall be 'short, sharp, and decisive.' They have wide breaches to heal, but they appear to be doing it effectively. Chase is propitiated very much as the Peace men are propitiated towards M'Clellan. He can see no other way of helping the cause. The reports about Fremont are various. A despatch from Washington, a few days ago, said that Fremont's letter of declension is written, and ready to be published, on a fitting opportunity, which would be found soon. To-day it is reported, from the Democratic side, that Fremont does not intend to decline, and will not, in any possible event, favour Mr. Lincoln.

There has been a curious development here within a few days, which strengthens the suspicion that General Fremont is bargaining for the disposal of what support he has to give. There has been published here a weekly paper, called the New Nation, devoted to his political interests. It has fallen into difficulties, there is a dispute about title among the proprietors and claimants. These have got into the newspapers with their various stories, and the exposures are very edifying. The writing editor was a certain General Cluseret, who commenced with a great fervour of admiration for his friend General Fremont. The General, as is now disclosed, furnished most of the money in the name of a supposed 'National Pathfinders' Association,' which was composed of only three persons, the General being himself the principal and most active, and chief, if not only, paying member. General Cluseret accounts for his being thrust out of the office by charges that General Fremont has 'a certain political bargain in view' which the more conscientious editor would have nothing to do with. The following, which is the concluding passage of the letter, in which Cluseret takes leave of his former patron, is tolerably significant:—

'Although Mr. Lincoln is far from being the candidate of my choice, between him and M'Clellan no loyal man can hesitate; the New Nation will not hesitate; it repudiates all sorts of bargains and will not aid them, if either afar off or near, directly or indirectly, but it will always be the vanguard of loyal patriots for liberty against slavery. We have often reproached Lincoln with the want of dignity as evinced in his jokes, but Fremont's jokes are worse, for they are played at the expense of honesty.' Put that with the Democratic news of Fremont's firmness in opposing Mr. Lincoln, and the enquiry naturally suggests itself, What is Fremont to get if he shall so help the Democrats that M'Clellan will be elected?

Two State elections have been held since the nomination of M'Clellan by the Chicago Convention. Both were in New England, in the States of Vermont and Maine. The general result shows the Administration as strong as ever. The Republican majorities are large, and they gain a member of Congress in Maine. The Democrats lose the only member they had in either of those States. This is a bad beginning for the redemption of the Democratic promises, to repeal in the next Congress the proscriptive Acts of this, which they say have strengthened and intensified, and, if what they say of them is true, justify the armed resistance of the South.

Secretary Seward has been taking part in the election by short speeches at Auburn, his New York residence; and at Washington on his return. They are both marked by the Secretary's astonishing aptitude for self-contradiction and blundering.

At Auburn, he proclaimed as the happy result of late Union victories and the popular zeal for volunteer enlistment for about a thousand dollars a head: 'We shall have no draft, because the army is being reinforced at the rate of five to ten thousand men a day by volunteers.'

When he got back to Washington, and the Maine and Vermont elections were over, he found an order for drafting ready to be issued, and he accordingly explained this away by saying that he meant to be understood that there should be no draft if volunteers were numerous; but because volunteers do not come in, 'the draft will surely come, if we do not volunteer and prevent it.' And the order is out for a general drafting to begin on Monday, showing that the Secretary of State did not know what he was talking about at Auburn, or that he was designedly talking to deceive.

Another passage in that speech has produced a wide political sensation, and is the subject of keen and indignant scrutiny. Speculating on the chances of the election of General M'Clellan, Mr. Seward, Secretary of State in the subsisting Administration, which will be thereby overthrown, asks the following portentous question: 'Who can vouch for the safety of the country against the rebels during the interval which must elapse before the new Administration can constitutionally come into power? It seems to me that such an election would tend equally to demoralise the Union and to invite the insurgents to renew their efforts for its destruction.'

This is a most unfortunate question, and has given the Opposition plausible ground for interpreting it into a threat that if the President is condemned by the result of the election in November, he will feel himself discharged from the duty of conducting public affairs on a policy not his own until his successor is elected, whereby during the interval the Union would be demoralised and the rebellion encouraged. The assumption is not a violent one, and the Democrats are making much use of it in charging on the President the purpose to extort votes from the fear of the mischief he might do if defeated beyond the power of General M'Clellan to remedy.

After all the dallying on the subject, the draft is ordered to commence on Monday, the 19th, in all places in which the quota is not filled up by volunteers. The Secretary of War, in announcing it, fortifies the call by letters received from General Grant and General Sherman, urging the calling-out of the whole five hundred thousand men in the shortest possible time.'

This is a sudden change of position again, for it is scarcely a fortnight since the authorities advised the public that a hundred thousand new men would be more than sufficient to close the war. It is noted as a sign of the inspiration from Washington, under which General Grant's letter was written, that he assigns, as a motive why the draft ought to be enforced now, that the South would be thereby convinced that there is no Peace party in the North at the coming election. The correspondence was got up quite as much to help Administration politics as to strengthen the army.

GENERAL FORREST'S RAID INTO MEMPHIS.

(From the Richmond Examiner.)

The Mississippian, published at Jackson, Mississipi, gives some interesting particulars of the late raid of General Forrest upon Memphis. He dashed in upon the place like an eagle upon his prey. The Yankees were so completely surprised that nothing was known of the presence of our men until a portion of the Yankee General's staff was captured and he forced to skedaddle, his night-dress flying like a kite in the breeze.

General Forrest had no time to destroy property to any great extent, his small force of about 600 men, as soon as the Yankees recovered from their surprise, being surrounded by four or five times their number. He had to charge through them and make his escape, which he did in grand style, losing only about thirty men all told. Captain Bill Forrest, who led the advance with 100 picked men, only lost two, one killed and one wounded.

The Yankees lost about four hundred in killed, wounded, and prisoners. Our forces captured over five hundred splendid horses, clothing, fine small arms, &c. Although General Forrest did not release our prisoners or burn their Government stores or transports, he has shown what can be done by pluck and daring, and proven to the Yankee Generals that they are not safe even when guarded by thousands of bayonets in their 'pride of place,' when he is on the war path. His bold movement also had the effect of turning the Yankee column back that was moving down through North Mississippi. They were dumb-founded, on hearing that Forrest had made a dash into Memphis, and immediately evacuated Oxford and turned their faces northward.

The prisoners captured in Memphis, two hundred and thirty odd, were brought down on the cars to Canton, and were to reach Jackson on the next day.

LETTER FROM CANADA.

FROM AN OCCASIONAL CORRESPONDENT.

September, 1864.

MONTREAL far surpasses all my preconceived ideas of Canada. As yet, of course, I have only seen the more civilised phases of Canadian life, and never expected to come across the rougher experiences of the Western forests in the streets of Montreal and Quebec; but I must fairly admit that I did not look for much that is grand, or costly, or imposing, or is associated with our ideas of wealth and luxury—I might almost say extravagance. Rapid development, brilliant progress, I knew I was sure to find, but not such a finished exterior. I anticipated a young colony with an old head, but not one with so old a face. Now, my first walk through the streets of this city quite upset all my ideas, and showed me that there was much more of the Old World's architectural magnificence here than I had been willing to believe. Whether it was that my long-acquired habit of associating all capitals of agricultural districts with Ipswich prevented me from anticipating in this country any higher style of architecture than is to be met with in that most respectable but seedy town, I know not; but I certainly never expected to find that Canada had a Paris. However, I have been undeceived, and, if you know anybody labouring under a like delusion, you may at once enlighten them, and tell them that the buildings of Montreal would surpass those of many a fine city on their side of the Atlantic.

The St. Lawrence Hall, the hotel in which I am staying—a well-known house amongst Canadians and Americans—is situated in the centre of the handsome edifices to which I have alluded. I won't trouble you with an enumeration of them, but merely say that these buildings are chiefly banks, insurance offices, and those of other public companies, fine churches and chapels, spacious colleges, and asylums, and hospitals, all well placed in broad streets or detached in commanding positions. Those which pleased me most were the French Cathedral, the Palais de Justice, and the Post Office, all perfect in their way. And then there are markets, three in number, and splendid stores after the style of Cannon Street, and handsome squares in the suburbs, and grand wharves along the river, and much more that is worth a visit of which I have not time to tell. The city is backed by a thickly-wooded mountain, round the summit of which I had a beautiful drive to get a view of the neighbourhood; and a grand one it is, with the city and its sparkling tin-roofs beneath you, and the mighty St. Lawrence, two miles wide, beyond and all around the island on which the city stands, and at the western end of the city the far-famed Victoria tubular bridge spanning the breadth of the great river, and in the distance across the stream the purple mountains of Vermont, from which the Yankee sentinel can daily feast his hungry appetite by gazing at the tempting bait below.

The New York Herald is still at the old game, thirsting for 'Canada's blood;' and, if I am to believe what I hear of the vast circulation and influence of that beautiful journal, there must be an enormous number across the frontier who are intent upon thus satiating their thirst. But Canada is quite deaf to all their threats, perfectly indifferent to their taunts and sneers; in fact, I almost begin to think that the Times was right in its charges against the colony, and that the Canadian self-confidence is very much like apathy. However, they tell me that the volunteer movement is progressing, but I cannot say that I have seen anything of it yet. I only know that the volunteer department is entrusted to the care of the Attorney-General, under whose tender guidance it is said to thrive; from which fact I am led to conclude that lawyers here eschew red tape, else I should hardly expect to find a precocious young colony, of very liberal views and independent principles, consigning its military organisation to such a wholesale dealer in that repulsive article.

I am now in the future capital of the two provinces of Upper and Lower Canada. . . . At present you would find it difficult to recognise in Ottawa the future metropolis of Canada. The inhabitants talk of it as Ottawa city, but it is much more like an overgrown village perched upon the top of a steep cliff, and straggles along the bank of the river and out away into the country beyond, as if all the houses were afraid of touching each other, and objected to the formality of a continuous street. No one seems exactly to know why it has been selected as the seat of government. Some tell me to avoid throwing down an apple of discord between the rival candidates, Montreal, Quebec, and Toronto, by preferring any one of them; some say it was selected by mistake; some, I believe, think it was done by the Queen to spite the Canadians. But for whatever cause selected, it has every element necessary for the creation of a great city and the capital of the two provinces—a grand river, a lovely site, a considerable distance between its walls and the Yankee frontier, a very central position as regards the Eastern and Western provinces, and easy access from all sides. People are talking about the proposed coalition of all the provinces now under British rule, and saying that if this federation scheme comes off Ottawa will never be permitted to retain her recently-acquired privilege, and that the seat of government must in that case remain, as it now is, in Quebec. But I cannot believe that any one who has ever seen the new Parliament buildings in course of erection at Ottawa would be so barbarous as to demand the destruction of that beautiful edifice. The cost of the new Houses has been enormous, and I do not think the Canadians are likely to stand by and see their money thrown to the winds. If the new Parliament buildings are never to be used, I cannot imagine a more flagrant instance of reckless expenditure.

DEGENERACY OF NORTHERN MASONS.—The Masonic fraternity have hitherto been of the opinion that the acts of vandalism hitherto practised by the Federal soldiers in the various Masonic Lodges of Mississippi, were not the acts of Masons, but of hired soldiers, incited by a desire of booty; but we blush to record an instance which shows that they have been mistaken. During the last visit of the enemy to Port Gibson, they visited the lodge room, stole the regalia and jewels, and tore up and destroyed the records and papers of Washington Lodge No. 3, and Clinton Chapter No, 2. They also destroyed the charter of the said Chapter, issued by the Grand Chapter of the United States, September 18, 1826, and signed by De Witt Clinton. And, as if to add insult to injury, one of the party left on the altar a card, on which was inscribed, 'Thomas Price, W.M., of Peoria Lodge No. 15, Peoria, Illinois.' In the Revolutionary war, when the charter of a Lodge and its record had fallen into British hands, they were promptly returned by a flag of truce, under a guard of honour. How different the conduct of W. M. Price, who, by his action, seems to have gloried in destroying the records and papers of an institution devoted to benevolence.—The Mobile News.

THE DEATH OF GENERAL MORGAN.

(From the Abingdon Virginian.)

On Saturday, the 3rd instant, accompanied by the brigades of Giltner, Hodges, and Smith, and a detachment of Vaughan's, with four pieces of artillery, General Morgan and his staff approached the town of Greenville, Tennessee. Scouts had brought the information that the enemy were not nearer than Bull's Gap, sixteen miles distant, and, in addition, a guard had been sent into the village to reconnoitre. Upon the report of the entire absence of the enemy, Cassel's battalion, commanded by Captain I. M. Clarke, together with the four guns, were posted some three or four hundred yards from the court house, when General Morgan and his staff entered and established their headquarters at the residence of Mrs. Dr. Williams, near the centre of the town. Shortly after the advent of the guard in town, young Mrs. Williams, daughter-in-law of the lady at whose house General Morgan had his headquarters, disappeared; a scout was sent for, but could not find her, and as she returned with the enemy next morning, it appears she had ridden all the way to Bull's Gap, and had given information of Morgan's whereabouts and the strength of the guard Precaution had been taken to prevent the egress of persons who might convey information to the enemy, and all the roads and avenues were picketed. After visiting the camps and seeing that pickets had been duly posted, General Morgan and his staff, at a late hour of the night, retired to rest. Being greatly fatigued, they slept very soundly, and were startled from their slumbers about six o'clock on Sunday morning by the elder Mrs. Williams, who informed them that the Yankees had surrounded the house. The General and his staff at once sprang from their beds, armed themselves, and rushed out at the opposite door to that at which the Yankees were thundering.

On the side of the house where they escaped there is a very large yard and garden, with a great deal of foliage and a vineyard. These, together with the basement of the old hotel at the south-western extremity of the grounds, enabled them to conceal themselves for a time; but the Yankees by this time began to appear so thick and fast around them that concealment became hopeless, and they rushed out to attempt to fight their way through, in the hope of succour and assistance from the battalion so near at hand. The officers with General Morgan were Major Gassett, and Captains Withers, Rogers, and Clay, and a young gentleman by the name of Johnson, a clerk in the office of the Adjutant-General. At this time they were all, except Withers and Clay, in the basement of the old hotel, occupied by Mrs. Fry (wife of the notorious bushwhacker and murderer, now in our possession), who was all the time calling to the Yankees, informing them of the hiding-place of the 'rebels.'

Seeing escape almost hopeless, General Morgan directed Major Gassett to examine and see if there was any chance of escape from the front of the basement into the street. Major Gassett looked, and replied that there was a chance, but it was a desperate one, which General Morgan did not hear, as at that instant the Yankees charged up to the fence separating the hotel from Mrs. Williams's grounds, when the General, with Major Gassett, Captain Rogers, and Mr. Johnson, sprang out in the direction of the vineyard, when the two latter were captured and the General killed. The latter had just fired his pistol, and was in the act of firing again when he fell. Captains Withers and Clay had not been able to get out of the house, and had concealed themselves in or near it. Major Gassett, in the meantime, sought shelter in the basement and vineyard alternately, but could not elude the vigilance of Mrs. Fry, who was all the time directing attention to his whereabouts. Being the only rebel left—Withers and Clay having been discovered and betrayed by a negro — Major Gassett's ingenuity was put to work to avoid capture. Mrs. Fry knew he was in the basement, and the Yankees were as thick around him as snakes in harvest. After passing to and fro several times between the basement and the garden, all the time under fire, he finally took shelter in the former, and at an auspicious moment sprang into the street, gave Mrs. Fry a parting blessing in his exit, mounted a horse hitched near by, and made his escape. A great many shots were fired by the Yankees, but the only one which took effect was that which killed General Morgan, piercing his right breast and ranging through diagonally. Withers, Rogers, Clay, and Johnson are now, we presume, in a Yankee prison, and Major Gassett is again on duty with his command.

The General was determined never to surrender, and told members of his staff they must not give up. He was heard to say, 'They have got me sure,' when he drew his pistol and commenced firing.

After General Morgan had been killed, the unfeeling brutes who murdered him threw his lifeless body across a horse and paraded it through the streets. His body was subsequently sent through the lines by flag of truce.

Tribute to North Carolina.—The Sentinel prints the following extract from a letter of General Lee to Governor Vance of North Carolina, complimenting the North Carolina troops for their conduct at Reams Station:—'Headquarters Army of Northern Virginia, 29th August, 1864. His Excellency C. B. Vance, Governor of North Carolina, Raleigh: . . I have been frequently called upon to mention the services of North Carolina soldiers in this army, but their gallantry and conduct were never more deserving of admiration than in the engagement at Reams Station, on the 25th instant. The brigades of Generals Cook, M'Rae, and Lane—the last under the temporary command of General Conner—advanced through a thick abatis of felled trees, under a heavy fire of musketry and artillery, and carried the enemy's works with a steady courage that elicited the warm commendation of their corps and division commanders and the admiration of the army. On the same occasion the brigade of General Barringer bore a conspicuous part in the operations of the cavalry, which were no less distinguished for boldness and efficiency than those of the infantry. If the men who remain in North Carolina share the spirit of those they have sent to the field, as I doubt not they do, her defence may be securely entrusted to their hands. —I am, with great respect, your obedient servant, R. E. Lee, General.'

A worthy Progenitor.—B. F. Butler's father was a privateer in the war of 1812; but subsequently turning his attention to more questionable operations, he was tried, convicted, and hanged at one of the Spanish West India Islands for piracy. Tradition adds that he was also quartered; but of this report the evidence is not satisfactory.—New York Correspondent of the Morning Herald.

SACKING OF THE VIRGINIA MILITARY INSTITUTE BY HUNTER'S FORCES.

(From the Richmond Examiner.)

The report of the superintendent of the Virginia Military Institute made to its Board of Visitors on the 15th of last month, has been transmitted to the office of the Adjutant General of Virginia. As the report gives an authentic and official narrative of the sacking and rifling by Hunter's forces, it is valuable and interesting as a part of the history of the times. We, therefore, make some extracts from its pages. Referring to the conduct of Hunter's marauders after their arrival at the institute, the report of the superintendent says:—

On the Sabbath morning of June 12, 1864, the beautiful buildings erected by the liberality of the State for her favoured military school were made a mass of ruins, by the order of Major-General D. Hunter, commanding the United States army of Western Virginia, after having been first sacked by his lawless and rapacious soldiery. The quarters and offices of the superintendent alone remain; and the order for the destruction of these was only suspended because the illness of two of my children, one with an infant forty-eight hours old, did not permit them to be removed without risk of life.

Every species of public property was removed or wantonly destroyed, and among the most serious losses are to be named our valuable library, the accumulated care of twenty-five years, and the philosophical apparatus, so long used by our late distinguished Professor of Natural and Experimental Philosophy, Lieutenant-General Thomas J. ('Stonewall') Jackson. The apparatus and many of the valuable books had been removed to Washington College, under the presumption that this venerable institution might afford a shelter and protection to them. But the work of destruction went on. The college building was sacked—the libraries of both institutions were destroyed and every particle of philosophical apparatus broken to pieces. Shavings had been prepared to fire the college building also, and the design was only prevented by representations from some of the trustees setting forth the purely civil organisation of the college, and that it was the recipient of the bounty of Washington himself.

Our hospital was first rifled of all its most valuable medical stores, and was then burnt, although one very severely wounded cadet, and one sick cadet, dependent upon both for comfort and almost for life, had to be removed from the building, at great risk, in the midst of the shelling and the rifle balls of the sharpshooters.

The families of Colonels Williamson and Gilham were required by rude officials to vacate their quarters, and although they were nominally allowed the privilege of removing their furniture, in part, through the kindly interposition of Hon. S. Mc D. Moore, few facilities were afforded them to do so, and the torch was applied while helpless females were endeavouring to save their little stores, and their quarters and many of their personal effects were destroyed.

Every public document connected with the operations of the institute found in my office—and there were many copies of the various annual reports and registers—was destroyed or removed. My private library was rifled of many of its most valuable and portable volumes; and the portraits of Ex-Governors M'Dowell, Wise, and Letcher, which occupied prominent positions in it, were removed.

The houses of our poorest operatives, including seamstresses, laundresses, and labourers, were searched in common with those of the citizens generally, and some of these persons were left in a destitute and almost starving condition. The kindness of friends in Lexington had opened their houses to receive the trunks and effects of cadets; such houses were made the peculiar objects of vindictive spoliation.

Our shoe shop was despoiled of all its leather and unfinished work, and the shoe lasts, implements, and benches were then wantonly destroyed.

The bell attached to our public clock was taken down and removed, and the beautiful bronze copy of Houdon's Washington, by the gifted and lamented Hubard, after being mutilated in the effort to take it from its pedestal, was removed. Report has come in within the last few days that the enemy, being unable to transport his work of art through the mountain passes of Virginia, it was finally broken to pieces and destroyed.

F. P. BLAIR AND EDWARD EVERETT.

(From the Richmond Whig.)

Silver Spring, August 24, 1864.

Hon. Edward Everett.—My dear Sir,—I have troubled the President, I fear, too much, pressed as he is with many cares, to make an extraordinary effort towards thwarting the intrigues of England in seeking to engage the monarchies of Europe in her scheme of dividing the republic. They all have a common apprehension that our system of government, if progressively prosperous, may expand its influence and control their destinies; but England sees a pressing danger to her ascendency on the ocean in the growth of our maritime activity. It alarms her jealousy more immediately than the fear, which reaches her, with all the rest of the royalties, remotely, that our republican advances may gain too much among their people. Hence you see that the late debate in the House of Lords, when there was such a strong demonstration made of the wish to get Europe united to intervene to destroy our Union, shows yet more plainly that the Ministry only wait that event to make England the champion of the movement. When I received your letter, for which I give you my best thanks, I put it and the enclosure in the hands of the President, and urged upon him a second time the necessity of sending some more capable than any Minister that we have now in Europe to avert, if possible, the threatened coalition against our national life. I think we could offer to Louis Napoleon, in a treaty of commerce, advantages to the staple productions of France—in a treaty (secret if necessary)—new securities to his dynasty—in one offensive and defensive against our own and France's hereditary enemy and rival, an alliance more stable than English entente cordiale, which would keep him out of the plot against our Government. But if he is so bound up by new devotion to the old enemy of his house and his nation, then we ought to appeal to Russia, and endeavour to get up a Northern coalition which, made strong by our naval power, could cope with the ambition of England and France to give law to two continents. Russia, which has sought in vain to bring out her strength to play a part on the ocean, would gladly, I think, employ her diplomatic skill in concocting a plan to unite the Northern powers with the United States in the effort to deliver the land and sea from the domineering control of England and France.

It is clear that we should attempt in some way to defeat the scheme of England against us, which has for its immediate object the separation of the States and to place the States where Republican principles prevail between European dependencies North and South. The man who should back this project, now so manifestly indicated in the English Parliament, would deserve the gratitude of every lover of his race from age to age.

I had another conversation with the President on this subject but a day or two since, and I urged that you were the most accomplished man for this mission that our country furnished. I had broached the matter to Mr. Seward before going to the President for the third time, but he was fully impressed with the idea that for 'the present there was no danger of intervention; England was all right! Lord Lyons was our friend abroad! He thought of sending Mr. Weed to look into matters there, who had access to all the men in authority in England and France,' &c., &c. I told the President of this conversation, and observed that I thought you had more the ear of the sovereigns and people of Europe than Mr. Weed. Mr. Seward's suggestion, we were safe from intervention 'for the present,' makes the opportunity pertinent to intervene on our part to prevent it on that of our enemies in the future. The President concluded the interview by saying that he would give the matter his serious consideration, and I believe he will make the mission unless it be made a personal matter by Mr. Seward, who may insist on making our diplomacy a monopoly of his own to the exclusion of the President's interest in it, and set Mr. Weed, who is identified with himself, over it, as a general superintendent of our diplomacy in Europe. I wish it insisted on by persons of more power than your obedient servant, F. P. Blair.

THE DEPOPULATION OF ATLANTA.

We subjoin the letter of General Hood in reference to the depopulation of Atlanta:—

Headquarters, Army of the Tennessee, Office Chief of Staff, September 9, 1864.

Major-General Sherman, commanding United States Forces in Georgia.

General,—Your letter of yesterday's date, borne by James W. Ball and James R. Crew, citizens of Atlanta, is received. You say therein—'I deem it to be to the interest of the United States, that the citizens now residing in Atlanta should remove, &c.' I do not consider that I have any alternative in the matter. I, therefore, accept your proposition to declare a truce of ten days, or such time as may be necessary to accomplish the purpose mentioned, and shall render all the assistance in my power to expedite the transportation of citizens in this direction. I suggest that a staff officer be appointed by you to superintend the removal from the city to Rough and Ready, while I appoint a like officer to control their removal further south; that a guard of one hundred men be sent by either party, as you propose, to maintain order at that place; and that the removal begin on Monday next.

And now, sir, permit me to say that the unprecedented measure you propose transcends in studied and ingenious cruelty all acts ever before brought to my attention in the dark history of war.

In the name of God and humanity I protest, believing that you will find that you are expelling from their homes and firesides the wives and children of a brave people.

I am, General, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. B. Hood, General.

Official—McA. Hummett, Lieutenant, &c.

Accompanying the above was the following letter addressed to Colonel Calhoun, Mayor of Atlanta:—

Headquarters of the Army of the Tennessee, Sept. 9, 1864.

Hon. James M. Calhoun, Mayor.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter touching the removal of the citizens of Atlanta, as ordered by General Sherman. Please find enclosed my reply to General Sherman's letter. I shall do all in my power to mitigate the terrible hardship and misery that must be brought upon your people by this extraordinary order of the Federal commander. Transportation will be sent to Rough and Ready to carry the people and their effects further south.

You have my deepest sympathy in this unlooked-for and unprecedented affliction.—I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant, J. B. Hood, General.

On to Richmond.—'Concentration' of troops is now going on such as the war has not yet seen. From Georgia, from Louisiana, from Texas, from Arkansas, from Missouri, from South Carolina, from North Carolina, from all parts where the Federal army has hitherto been scattered, the troops of the United States are to assemble in three great bodies, each larger than the gallant Confederate army, to make a final end of the capital of the 'rebellion,' and with it the great 'rebellion' itself. A glance at the map will show any competent military mind that the permanent possession of Atlanta, or even of Chattanooga, by the Federals, is impossible unless the whole line of the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad, with its important points, including Lynchburg, Richmond, and Petersburg, shall be held by them also. Last April, when General Grant was beginning his grand campaign against what he deemed the head and heart of the Confederacy (that is to say Richmond and Atlanta), General M'Clellan wrote an article for a New York weekly paper, the Round Table, in which he showed the absolute necessity of the possession of Richmond and the line of railroad thence west to Knoxville before any permanent and satisfactory advance could be made by the United States forces south from Chattanooga. With Sherman advanced as far as he is at present in the very heart of Georgia, his left flank and long and attenuated line of communications are considerably exposed to irruptions and attacks from South Carolina, North Carolina, and Virginia. It will become, therefore, imperatively necessary, in order to secure the advance already gained, that the Confederate armies should be driven south of the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad, and east of the chain of mountains which jut into the western half of North Carolina. M'Clellan was right, and General Grant realised the necessity for the capture of Richmond quite as much as did the present Democratic candidate for the Presidency. Hence his repeated combined movements against the Southern capital, and the wild and savage desperation with which he has flung his swarming hosts upon the earthworks of Beauregard and the bayonets of Lee.—New York Correspondent of the Morning Herald.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of THE INDEX, 13 Bouverie Street, E.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

Advertisements should be sent and Money Orders made payable to J. B. HOPKINS, INDEX Office.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1864.

The War.

THE great feature in the military events since the fall of Atlanta is the latest strategic effort of General GRANT. For nearly four months he has been 'fighting it out on the line' to Richmond, and his dogged determination has ended in placing him at Washington. In front of Petersburg, with the exception of a trifling attack on a picket line at midnight of September 12, and a grand lift of 3,000 cattle effected by the Confederate cavalry opposite Harrison's Landing, fighting has quite gone out of fashion; and therefore, as there was nothing on earth for GRANT to do there, he was perhaps usefully employed in a consultation with President LINCOLN on the campaign of November. That for the promotion of Mr. LINCOLN'S interests the Federal army will maintain its lines in front of Petersburg as long as possible cannot be doubted, but circumstances seem to indicate that no active operations, except at the initiative of General LEE, will again be undertaken. However, there is reason to suppose that General GRANT remained but one day at Washington, and that he proceeded to SHERIDAN'S headquarters at Harper's Ferry on September 17. Doubtless, therefore, he was present at the action fought on the morning of September 18. Intelligence up to September 10 represented General EARLY as lying just beyond the Opequan, or rather perhaps at the sources of that river. His left seemed to extend almost up to Martinsburg, his main force to cover the advance upon Winchester and Berryville, holding the two pikes in strength, with his whole army facing towards the north-east. Now it is to be observed that it was reported on the 12th that EARLY was expected at Petersburg to reinforce the army of General LEE, and it is not improbable that the rumour rested on a good foundation. This we believe to be the true interpretation of the action fought on the 18th. If General EARLY was falling back, it was of course incumbent on General SHERIDAN to harass his rear guard. If the attack was made with vigour and in considerable force, EARLY would have been compelled to strengthen his rear, and that which at first was a mere skirmish would have grown into a battle. If EARLY were successful in repulsing the enemy, he would still continue his retreat in order to carry out the original object of his movement. Consequently whether victory crowned the Federal arms or not, it was clearly open to the Northern press to announce that EARLY had retreated up the Shenandoah Valley, and that SHERIDAN had occupied Winchester.

The Federal accounts claim not only a victory, but such a slaughter of their enemies as, if existing in reality and not in imagination, would have caused the force under EARLY to have disappeared entirely from the rolls of the Confederate army. Indeed, 5,000 killed and wounded, 2,500 prisoners, and five cannon, are the trophies on paper of SHERIDAN'S attack. Moreover, Generals GORDON and SHALER are reported killed. The Federal loss is also said to have been heavy. Experience, however, has taught us to receive with considerable reserve any intelligence which comes viâ Cape Race, and which cannot possibly be contradicted for the space of four or five days after its arrival in Europe. Indeed, the practice of finishing off the budget of news with some grand piece of fortune for the Federal arms has now become so habitual with the employés of Mr. STANTON, that the omission of that particular item would alarm us with the idea that the SECRETARY OF WAR had resigned office.

In the neighbourhood of Atlanta all is quiet, and it is even rumoured that SHERMAN has left with troops to reinforce GRANT. His army remains intrenching itself at Atlanta, and HOOD'S army rests at Lovejoy Station. How far General HOOD is to be blamed for the loss of Atlanta and the repulse at Jonesborough is not clear. SHERMAN is of course only too pleased to believe that generalship and not numbers won the day, to boast that HOOD thought the flank movement a mere feint, and that therefore HARDEE had but one corps d'armée to oppose, as it appears, the overwhelming attack of no less than six times their own number. That General HARDEE escaped utter annihilation is due to the amazing gallantry of his men and the skill and bravery of that excellent officer. It is probable, however, that the campaign on the part of the Federal army in Georgia is at an end, and, with the exception of the exertions of the Northern generals to preserve and improve their communications in the face of the activity of flying columns of Confederates, the south-west will offer but little to divert the attention of New York and Washington from the more engrossing topic of the Presidential election.

As was anticipated by those who had some acquaintance with the geographical position of Mobile, and the extensive works erected for the defence of the city, and who, knowing the devoted courage and fidelity of its inhabitants, recollected that 'a city is composed not of walls but of men,' failure has attended the efforts of FARRAGUT to capture or destroy the pride of Alabama. It is now discovered that the Federal fleet is not within shelling distance of the city, for, as is naïvely observed, the Government 'discredits the rumour.' It is even asserted that GRANGER has returned with 2,500 troops from Mobile to New Orleans, in order to undertake some new expedition. Perhaps, however, the results of isolated expeditions are too vividly impressed on the minds of Federal officers at New Orleans not yet oblivious of the disaster on the Red River, to leave much to be feared from this once favourite but now abandoned method of waging war. Eighteen months ago Federal garrisons abounded at every point within reach of Federal gunboats. Now there is one army at Atlanta, doomed probably to total inactivity; another at Petersburg, confronted by an equal force of Confederates; and another in the Shenandoah valley, engaged hitherto in a perpetual alternation of advance and retreat without any reasonable purpose except to defend Washington. The Federals are also in possession of New Orleans. These are the results of the mighty campaign of 1864. Texas is free from the foe. In Louisiana the Federals hug the Mississippi, and crouch under gunboats. The Confederates roam unmolested through Arkansas, and again threaten Missouri under the gallant General PRICE. The Northern Government is distracted with its electioneering operations, and fights only for victory in that campaign. Beyond all this, it is now certain that men are once more scarce, and that men must be had to maintain the positions held by the Federal armies. At Auburn Mr. SEWARD promised that there should be no draft. At Washington he declares that as 'grace can only show itself by works, so the draft will surely come if the people do not volunteer and prevent it.' The draft stood fixed for September 19, and urgent indeed must be the demand for troops when the Government ventures on so unpopular a step in prospect of the approaching election.

Washington Diplomatists.

INTERCEPTED letters resemble bursted guns—they do incalculable mischief to those who have discharged the missile. If some process of mental photography could present at certain moments a picture of the most secret operations of human thought, the effect would scarcely amaze the detected schemer more than does the publication to the world of plans and acts and ideas intended only for the perusal of a confidant. Indeed, so irreparable is the accident, so disastrous the effect of such disclosures, that the writer may even be tempted to wish that, like CHARLEMAGNE, 'he could not write, but had a mark to himself, like an honest plain-dealing man.'

In another place we print a letter which first saw the light in a Confederate newspaper, whose editor has the luck to be the possessor of the original. The manuscript, doubtless, was captured in the course of General EARLY'S advance through Maryland. The principal actors in the neat drama, the plot and action of which are disclosed in the letter, were FRANCIS P. BLAIR, THURLOW WEED, EDWARD EVERETT, and ABRAHAM LINCOLN. The PRESIDENT of the United States is a personage familiar, we fervently trust, to all students of American affairs, but a few words on the three remaining dramatis personæ may prove acceptable to readers on this side of the Atlantic.

FRANCIS P. BLAIR is a man far advanced in years, who, in former Administrations of the American Government, was a very prominent actor. He was Postmaster-General under President VAN BUREN, and when that 'old public functionary' was laid upon the shelf, he retired to his country seat of 'Silver Spring,' near Washington City, where he has ever since remained in seclusion if not obscurity. When the Black Republican party rose into importance, FRANCIS P. BLAIR became for the first time anti-slavery, and though too old to take an active part in public affairs himself, he yet exercised a considerable influence in Republican councils in the person of his sons FRANCIS P. BLAIR, jun., and MONTGOMERY BLAIR, the latter of whom is a member of the present Federal Cabinet.

THURLOW WEED was for many years an editor in Albany and a member of the famous 'Albany Junta,' which gave law to Democratic politics in the State of New York. He, too, went over to the Republicans in the hour of their strength, and his diplomatic mission to Europe, and his unsuccessful efforts to raise money here for Mr. CHASE, are well known.

EDWARD EVERETT, the Unitarian clergyman, the Harvard Professor, the Massachusetts Senator, the United States Minister to the Court of St. James's, the American Secretary of State, the candidate for the Vice-Presidency of the old line Whigs, the orator of the Mount Vernon fund, and writer for Bonner's Ledger, enjoys too wide a celebrity to make it necessary for us to do more than advert to his remarkable antecedents. He is a rhetorician of the first order, the delight of lecture-rooms, and the pride of Fourth of July celebrations. As a public man he has always been too timid to affect very decidedly the destinies of his country, and it was his timidity alone which brought him into the service of the war party of ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Now, the plot was simple enough. EDWARD EVERETT, like a great many other sensible people in America, wanted a place, and as there was no hole round enough for him, the only resource was to make one. Thereupon he applied to his excellent friend, F. P. BLAIR, who kindly undertook the office of placemonger to Mr. EVERETT. According to his own account, the zeal of F. P. BLAIR on the part of his dear friend was something amazing. He went three times to the PRESIDENT, and endeavoured to frighten out of his senses, by a terrific picture of the jealousy and hostility of England, that singularly imperturbable ruler of his people. He represented that England was busily employed in enlisting the monarchies of Europe in a scheme for dividing the great Republic—that she trembled at the ascendency of the maritime power of the United States, and at the favour which the Federal system of government enjoyed among the people of this country. The Peers were of course at the head of a movement which only awaited unity in Europe to adopt intervention. Then, having discovered the disease, he proceeded, like a quack doctor at a country fair, to advertise the remedy. He proposed, by a treaty of commerce offering great advantages to the staple productions of France, to tempt the sagacious ruler of that country into an alliance more stable than the English entente cordiale. Nay, he even went so far as to offer new securities for the Imperial dynasty as the price of an offensive and defensive alliance between Washington and the Tuileries. If NAPOLEON refused to listen to the voice of the charmer—for doubtless the silvery eloquence of EVERETT was praised as able to charm wisely—then an appeal was to be made to Russia, who only required the aid of GIDEON WELLES and the Federal navy to curb the ambition of the two great Powers of Western Europe. Under the inspiration of such an idea, well might F. P. BLAIR exclaim: 'The man who should thwart the scheme of England would deserve the gratitude of every lover of his race from age to age.'

Mr. EVERETT did not get the appointment. Of course not. F. P. BLAIR only laughed in his sleeve when he gravely informed that suppliant for place under WILLIAM SEWARD, that the PRESIDENT had actually condescended to consider the matter, but that probably the SECRETARY OF STATE would make a personal matter of it and appoint THURLOW WEED. However, this marvellous mission has not been established, and so Mr. EVERETT may yet hug himself with the notion that after all he was the man to curb the proud spirit of monarchical England.

The important feature, however, of this queer revelation of the way in which trusty friends 'do' each other in true Yankeee fashion is a short reply of Mr. Lincoln to the elaborate argument of F. P. Blair. Whatever doubts might be entertained as to the goodwill of the Emperor Napoleon, the President knew well enough that in Russia he should find a genial friend, and perhaps a willing ally. The Czar had been exterminating the Poles for the terrible sin of loving liberty, and Mr. Lincoln had been fighting the Confederates because those 'misguided rebels' were determined to achieve their independence. Both had been perfectly unscrupulous in the agents and the means employed in their amiable undertakings. Both had marched towards the desired end through seas of blood and piles of burning houses. The single distinction that one had succeeded and the other had failed was a mere trifle. Consequently, if there had been any necessity for an alliance with Russia, the task of forming the friendship might have been accomplished by Thurlow Weed or even by Edward Everett. But, in the present state of the Federal Treasury, Mr. Lincoln was not so stupid as to waste £20,000 on an useless exploit. Mr. Lincoln has a diplomatist at his disposal more able and less costly than either Weed or Everett—more able because England meekly bows to his opinion, because France does not disregard it, because its own disinterestedness lends to it an overwhelming force. Mr. Lincoln's Talleyrand is no less a person than Lord Lyons, the Minister of England at the Court of Washington. 'There is no danger,' says the President, 'of intervention; England is all right; Lord Lyons is our friend abroad.' We from long experience have been well acquainted with the fact that Lord Lyons is the friend abroad of the Federal Government. It is a humiliating fact, derogatory at once to the honour and the honesty of Lord Russell. It is to Englishmen, if possible, a deeper degradation to learn that fact through the channel of a boast from the mouth of Abraham Lincoln.

The Modern Cremona.

The order of General Sherman making it compulsory on the inhabitants of Atlanta, loyal and disloyal, Unionists and Secessionists, to remove from their homes immediately, is a measure in perfect keeping with the truculent character of that man after Abraham Lincoln's heart, and will excite no surprise among any class of observers of the American war. General Sherman is undoubtedly the representative military leader of the belligerent North. He at least indulges in no weak humanitarian scruples as to the treatment of 'rebellion.' Whatever faults may have been committed by other commanders of the Federal armies in sparing the homes and lives of non-combatants (and but few have offended in this way), General Sherman has always acted fully up to the Republican programme. No temporising with treason, no rose-water for 'rebels'! Væ victis! handcuffs, halters, the fusillade, the conflagration—these are the means of this man's mercy, these the rules which guide him in his efforts at restoring the Union. It is a mode of procedure which can certainly be commended for its extreme simplicity, to exterminate the old occupants, or, failing that, to drive them out from the homes they once inhabited, but which never belonged to them, and parcel the lands and tenements among the rightful owners—the loyal people of the North. General Sherman has not the faintest misgiving either that this is not sound policy or that it is not enjoined upon him by considerations of the most elevated patriotism. The well-known resolutions of Faneuil Hall—1st. Resolved that the earth is the heritage of the saints; 2nd. Resolved that we are the saints—are kept by him steadily in view.

It has frequently been pointed out to the Federal leaders that to acquire a ravaged and desolated country, a wide waste of blighted fields marked here and there by the ruins of a once thriving town and the ashes of what was formerly a noble mansion, would hardly repay them for the trouble of the acquisition, supposing that it might surely be done. To make a solitude and call it a property would seem to be the consummation of folly, especially when we consider that the devastation can only be accomplished by the expenditure of untold millions, to say nothing of the prodigal sacrifice of human life. And so it has been urged, in proof of the insincerity of the Federals in their prosecution of the war, that they could really never hope to reestablish their authority over the South, or they would not endeavour to convert the South into a howling wilderness. When Mr. Jedediah Doolittle settles down on a rich thirty-acre lot in Iowa or Wisconsin, either as squatter or tenant, hoping ere long to be the recognised owner in fee-simple, he does not sow salt instead of grain over the land, nor indulge his natural propensity for whittling in the defacement of the 'shanty' with his jack-knife. Doolittle is wiser in his generation than to act thus; he is too 'smart' to do anything of the kind. And it would certainly appear that the Yankees of the present day are not so degenerate as to cheat themselves after this absurd fashion, by making utterly worthless and unprofitable the territory which they hope hereafter to enjoy. When the elder Mr. Weller reproached Samuel for allowing himself to be 'done' by the melancholy man in the mulberry suit, we all recollect the sorrowful terms of the rebuke, 'I wouldn't ha' thought you could ha' done it, Samivel, my boy;' and the Doolittles of a former day, who were gathered to their fathers after many years of successful traffic in 'tuppenny clocks and wooden nutmegs,' could they revisit the earth, might well shame their 'spooney' children for making so bad a speculation as this doubtful conquest of a ruined and worthless South.

General Sherman, perhaps, has learned wisdom, as his columns have been pushed further towards the Gulf, and as his confidence in the subjugation of the Confederates increases with his military success. Instead of burning Atlanta, he merely orders its inhabitants away. The military is to be succeeded by the domestic evacuation. The disloyal citizens are to follow General Hood. The loyal citizens, those who are willing to take the oath of allegiance to the Lincoln Administration, are to go North. General Sherman will be satisfied with nothing less than the possession of Atlanta, its dilapidated railway sheds, its crazy barbers' shops, its small drinking saloons and dingy billiard-rooms, with all and singular the appurtenances thereto belonging, free from native Georgians and adopted Atlantadæ, that he may divide the town among emigrants from New England and loyal supporters of the Union. Or he may be actuated by a benevolent desire to spare the inhabitants future discomfort when hereafter he shall burn down the whole, in the words of Dahlgren with reference to Richmond, 'make one vast flame of it.'

Seriously, the forcible expulsion of the entire population of a captured city is an enormity so great that we should stand aghast at it if the melancholy experience of this dreadful war did not furnish us with daily outrages equal in guilt if not in proportions. The only wonder is that it passes with small comment from the press of Europe, and that the enlightened nations of the globe should have grown so callous to the sufferings of a brave people that they do not cry out against it, and protest against the conduct of a great war in a manner utterly repugnant to the moral sentiment of mankind.

New Prospects of the Roman Question.

French policy has entered a new phase. Through the usual unofficial channel of such announcements, Europe has been admonished that the army of occupation is at last to be withdrawn from Rome. The terms of the convention between France and Italy, as reported, are simple and straightforward enough.

Within two years a Papal army is to be formed, and as that army is formed the French troops are gradually to be removed. The evacuation is to be accomplished within the period named. The Italian Government is to protect the Papal States against attack from without; the Papal army is to be strong enough to maintain tranquillity at home. Finally, the Italian kingdom, having absorbed so large a part of the Papal territory, is to assume a proportionate part of the Roman debt. Such are the terms of this agreement. The removal of the Italian capital to Florence is clearly connected with it, either as a condition precedent, or by force of a secret article. Ever since the annexation of Naples to the kingdom, it has been evident that the capital could not be permanently fixed in the extreme north-western corner of the realm. The work in which Piedmont had avowed herself engaged since 1848 had not been the annexation of Italian States to the kingdom of Sardinia, nor even the expansion of Sardinia into Italy, but the fusion of all Italy, the Sardinian States included, into a common nationality, in which Piedmont claimed no other primacy than that of sacrifice, and to which she presented nothing but herself and her King. Turin, the capital of Piedmont, had no sort of title to be the capital of Italy. Military, geographical, and political considerations alike unfitted it for that rank. Yet it retained that position for the time; and this was a highly significant fact. It meant that the future capital of Italy was not yet available; that for the moment Italians could not transfer their Government to that city on which they had set their hearts. Had Florence or Naples been fixed upon, the seat of government would have been removed at once, without crowding into Turin all the new offices of the enlarged monarchy. The temporary residence of the Government in so unsuitable a spot was a practical reassertion of Count Cavour's declaration that Rome must be the capital of regenerate Italy—an intimation that it was not worth while to move until Rome was ready to receive her destined Court. The transfer of the Government to Florence is a tacit renunciation of this purpose—an avowal that, at least for the present, Rome is not likely to be the Italian capital. It may mean that the Italian Government despairs; it may mean simply that the statesmen in power have become convinced that, without giving up their hopes of uniting Rome to the kingdom, they had better abandon the idea of fixing their capital there. But, whatever the meaning of the act, it amounts to just such a retractation of the constant Italian demand for Rome as is necessary to enable Napoleon III. to withdraw his protection without betraying the Pope. And this he has done with a promptitude and in a method which seem to imply that he is glad to extricate himself from a difficult position.

No doubt he is glad. It must not be forgotten that while he is in an important sense the creator of Italian unity, he is in no respect the author of the French occupation of Rome. The kingdom of Italy is the work of the Empire; the restoration of the Pope was the act of the French Republic. It was determined before the President came into power; it was not in his power, if he desired it, to retract at that moment a measure so popular with the country, and especially with the peasantry, to whose votes he was so deeply indebted. Policy might force him to side absolutely with the Pope; but his personal sympathies must be with the Italians. After the restoration of the Papal authority and the establishment of the Empire, other circumstances conspired to make his position at Rome embarrassing. Napoleon desired the well-being, contentment, gratitude of Italy; to that end it was necessary that the chief of Italian cities should no longer be held against Italians by French troops. And yet the Catholic sovereign of Catholic France could be no party to the overthrow of Papal sovereignty. The present compromise is exactly suited to meet his conflicting purposes. He yields the guardianship of Rome to Italy, and yet takes security that Rome shall be guarded. He ceases to stand with a sword betwixt Italy and her hopes; and yet he places a sword between the Pope and his enemies which must keep them as effectually in check as his own. The device is ingenious; the arrangement is simple and equitable; the withdrawal of French interference is in itself a boon at once to the Pope and to Italy.

So long as Napoleon III. lives and wills it, we doubt not that, hard as the condition is, Victor Emmanuel and his Ministers will do their best to fulfil their share of the compact. The risk they incur is terrible. That the King of Italy should stand between Italy and Rome, that Italian bayonets should intercept the cherished purpose of the Italian nation, will awaken the indignation not only of enthusiasts like Garibaldi and republicans like Mazzini, and all over whom these have power, but also of all that numerous class of minds which are incapable of diplomatic foresight and of that inexhaustible patience which is necessary to those who wait on the slow steps of destiny. Every Italian who cannot understand the vast gain to the nation in having no foreign army quartered at Rome, and who cannot look forward to a time when France and Austria may be unable or unwilling to protect the Pope from afar, will say that if Rome is to be kept from Italy by force, it should be by foreign force—that it is better that France should execute her own decrees against Italian unity than that Italian soldiers should be the ministers of her will. There is danger of another Aspromonte—danger perhaps of worse, of risings in the cities which are the seats of patriotic enthusiasm, and of collisions in which Italian blood will be shed by Italian soldiers. But the statesmen who surround the King of Italy are farsighted and courageous; and they rely, with good reason, on the general calm sense and loyal patience of the nation. They may probably believe that the people will wait, in reliance on their King and their Government, for the realisation of their universal purpose in the way marked out by their constitutional leaders; and they know that the removal of the French army removes the chief barrier between Rome and Italy, never to be replaced. A change in the counsels of France, a European crisis, many accidents by no means improbable, may at any moment give Rome to Italy, when once no foreign army stands in the way. The Italian Government, therefore, can afford to accept the French offer, even if it mean exactly what it says and nothing more, and trust to the chapter of accidents or the natural tendency of events. The people, let us hope, will be persuaded to assist and obey their Government, instead of trying to drive it over the precipice which it discerns and they do not.

If Italy, then, can be induced to be patient—if time be given for the gradual development of the proposed arrangement and the natural operation of its provisions—it may possibly lead to a better solution of the Roman question than any contemplated by either of the extreme parties.

Hitherto there has been an insuperable obstacle to compromise in the direct personal hostility between the Papal and the Italian Courts. PIUS IX. distrusts his despoiler, and a proposal which would require that the POPE should repose confidence in the KING of ITALY is not free from difficulty. But, if the new scheme of NAPOLEON III. constitute VICTOR EMMANUEL guardian of the Papal States, and if that function be performed with fidelity and loyalty for several years, the feelings of the Head of the Church may be very different. He may see in the KING of ITALY a faithful son of the Church, and forgive the secularisation of the monasteries to Italy, as his predecessors have forgiven it to France. And when once such a good understanding is established, the main difficulties of the present situation will be smoothed down to tractable dimensions.

The sole remaining obstacle to the success of the Imperial scheme—and, in spite of experience, perhaps not an insurmountable one—is the formation of a force capable of keeping the peace in Rome itself. The withdrawal of the French troops is contingent on the organisation of a Papal army, and if the parties to the compact act loyally up to their engagements, the means may easily be discovered for executing what is but a matter of detail. If agitation from without were to cease once and for ever, the task of keeping the peace at Rome would not be too great for the skill of ANTONELLI. If the Italian Government honestly lent its aid to the suppression of factious intrigues, the populace of Rome would not resist the firm but conciliatory measures of the Papal Government. The EMPEROR has seen, and rightly, that Catholicism will not calmly contemplate the dishonour or plunder of the Head of the Church, and he has attempted to reconcile the march of Italian ideas with the preservation of what is dear to every adherent of the Church of Rome.

CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

MANCHESTER: September 28, 1864.

FOR an Abolitionist to champion the Confederacy is a phenomenon that has long since lost its quality of rarity. It has ceased to be a contradiction in terms and has grown to be a sign of the times. It is indeed possible the Confederates may not be charmed by the advocacy of their new allies, any more than their new allies can regard with entire complacency the embarrassing relationship they no longer find it honest to shrink from or disavow. In some essential respects, however, tribute from this peculiar quarter is the highest that could be paid; and perhaps before rejecting the curious offering the Southern people will remember with approval that the gift is handed to them with a reluctance that makes it costly—at least to the giver.

The most recent and apparently most unwilling convert from the Anglo-Federal ranks is the Rev. J. Page Hopps, a very broad-Churchman of the school of George Dawson, whose curate he formerly was, and of whose inimitable qualities as a lecturer he by no means shuns to remind one. The rev. gentleman, as I mentioned in a previous letter, felt himself moved to volunteer a series of lectures on 'Peace in America on the basis of Southern Independence.' He opened his campaign at Oldham, has followed it up at Ashton, and I understand is about to continue it at Stockport and other manufacturing towns that return members of Parliament. How he fared at Oldham we were all content to take upon trust. At Ashton (Mr. Milner Gibson's constituency) I made one of his hearers, and found the salient points of his lecture at least sufficiently clear and defined to be worthy of being reproduced in the report accompanying this letter. Of his audience the rev. gentleman had certainly no reason to complain, for the town hall was very much crowded, and everybody looked like the image of attention. After expressing his sense of the responsibility of addressing 'so magnificent a meeting' upon so serious a question, he felt it his first duty to disown the Southern Independence Association. He belonged to no party. He was one of those (how like the George Dawson of twelve years ago!) who deeply regretted that the questions of our time somehow got into the hands of 'parties'; and he was also one of those who wished to bring about a healthier state of things, when free men, unconnected with this party or that, would address themselves to the great questions of the day without the risk of being identified with some 'party' or other that had chosen to take the matter up. His next duty was to declare himself an abolitionist, an admirer of Republican institutions, and one who thought the secession of the South a hasty and ill-tempered act. But his third office was a more ticklish one—that of testing the meeting, and, if possible, carrying it by a sort of rhetorical coup-de-main. He was an abolitionist, but there was more than slavery in this war; he admired Republicanism so much that he would have two republics at peace with each other, instead of only one inherently at war with itself; and although the seceders were 'hasty and ill-tempered,' it was clear the task of bringing them back was at least a hopeless and impolitic one, and the Federal power would do wisely to confess as much, and take the consequences. At this point the rev. lecturer was greeted with rounds of general cheering, and it became manifest that, in so far as a large and authentic meeting could be held to represent public feeling in Ashton, the Confederate cause had thoroughly won the good will of the constituents of the President of the Board of Trade. Having argued forcibly and conclusively the right of secession (which he held was the sole proposition there was any logical necessity to prove), he went on to consider whether there was any reason for secession. That was a question, he confessed, which no outsiders had a right to ask. It was the business of the Confederacy to judge for itself on that matter. He did not say it was well for the Southern States to secede; nor did he say they had good and sufficient cause for what they did. But one thing he knew—he knew they had some cause for seceding; and another thing he had proved, viz. that the North had no right to coerce. As to at least one of the causes of secession, let it be remembered there was a general predominance of the North, tending to put the South in a helpless minority, at the mercy of Northern abolitionists and Northern manufacturers,—a condition of things in which the Southern producer was made to pay heavily for his compulsory partnership with the Northern merchant. Let them also bear in mind the significant fact that, immediately upon the secession of the South, the North (hoping to get the seceders back in a crippled state) passed a tariff more oppressive than ever, the effect of which would have been to shut out nearly every article of foreign manufacture; and coupled with that fact, let him remind them that the Southern States, immediately after seceding, proclaimed their intention of adopting free trade,—it would then be seen that it was in a great measure a question of taxation and commerce, a question of clashing interests that had grown irreconcilable, that really led, after forty years of conflict, to actual secession and to war, and only to war because, in exercising their right of quitting the partnership, the Southern States were met by an opposition that attempted to coerce them to remain. 'Let Englishmen,' said the rev. gentleman in conclusion, 'let Englishmen, in kind and earnest tones, send across the Atlantic the message, "Put up thy sword into thy sheath," and he believed that ten million hearts, both North and South, would grow glad at their voice and answer them with blessings. Let Englishmen speak the word "Peace," and once more their industry would flourish and the people would be fed.'

At the close of the lecture the whole assembly cheered the rev. gentleman again and again, and the proceedings were brought to a close by a vote of thanks to the Mayor of the Manor (S. D. Lees, Esq., M.D.), who presided on the occasion, and whose cordial cooperation has never been wanting to the Confederate Cause in Ashton.

The Lancashire quota of signatures to the great 'Peace Address to the People of the United States' is now completed and on the way to London. How the movement has sped in other parts of the United Kingdom I cannot of course pretend to say, but if anything like the same measure of success has attended it there as in the manufacturing districts, the aggregate result must be an 'instrument' as enormous as it is unparalleled. It would have been the work of but a little more time to have reckoned the signatures in the North of England alone by millions instead of hundreds of thousands.

The refusals to sign the document have been extremely few, and it somewhat oddly happens that it is with these—as showing the strong, nay jealous, sympathy that is felt for the Confederacy in some parts of the country—that it chiefly concerns me to deal. The following choice morceaux may be rather hard of digestion in certain quarters, but they are extracts from letters that have been placed at my disposal, and it would not be just to the Confederates or their friends if they were merely expediently suppressed:—

Carmarthenshire.

I regret being obliged to return the enclosed, which I cannot sign for the reason stated at the foot of this note, viz., that if by 'Sister States' be meant the South, it would be a misrepresentation to say that my sympathies ever were more in favour of the North; and I cannot refrain from adding that the cruel, unmanly, and brutal treatment of the Southern women by officers still in the service of the North, has filled me with disgust (and I believe the feeling is general in England) towards a people and Government who have tolerated such conduct.

Preston.

I return to you the copy of the 'Address,' and without my signature, as I cannot adopt the language of it. Yankee boastful vanity has disgusted me. Their undisguised hatred of England she can afford to accept, but I believe it is not the interest of this country to promote the reestablishment of the Union at the expense of the Confederacy.

Leicestershire.

Be so good as to send some more blank addresses for signature, and also send some to —— and ——. Do not infer from the signatures already forwarded to you that we all agree in the whole of the Address. I and others detest the Yankees. They without cause hated us with an agony of hatred, and for that and other causes I hate them.

Rectory, York.

I regret I cannot sign or circulate the Address you have sent me. I was never 'inclined' to the cause of the North against the South, and I do not believe that some of the sentiments of the Address are shared by any considerable portion of the English nation. I will gladly sign an address for peace pure and simple, and the shorter the better; but secession was always right, and the war on the part of the North was always infamous and tyrannical.

The Vicarage, Lincolnshire.

I cannot sign the Address for peace in America, because my sympathies have always been with the South, which the concluding sentence in the first paragraph denies. Otherwise I go entirely with all you say.

Milford Haven.

I cannot say that when the war began my 'heart was more inclined' to the North than to the South, nor from the first did I believe (and many think with me) that the 'action of the South was but the work of a faction.' Under these circumstances I deeply regret that I am unable to sign the Address for peace, and I write to say so, not that it is of any importance how this small section of the community might view the form of your efforts or the language you employ, but because I think it extremely probable that many will like to join in an appeal for peace, who will not do so only because they are unable to subscribe to the form in which the Address now being circulated is couched.

AN ABOLITIONIST CLERGYMAN ON SOUTHERN INDEPENDENCE.

GREAT 'PEACE' DEMONSTRATION AT ASHTON.

FROM OUR OWN REPORTER.

ASHTON: Sept. 26.

LAST Wednesday evening the magistrates, clergy, leading local gentry, manufacturers, tradesmen, and cotton operatives, attended in overflowing numbers in the large Town Hall of this borough, to hear a lecture on 'Peace in America on the basis of Southern Independence,' from the Rev. J. Page Hopps, formerly of St. Saviour's, Birmingham.

S. D. Lees, Esq., M.D., Mayor of the Manor, occupied the chair. The meeting was said to be one of the most important, whether as regards its influential character or the numbers attending it, ever held in Ashton.

The Chairman said it was not his duty that night to make a speech, inasmuch as the reverend lecturer was prepared, he believed, to address the meeting at considerable length. He might, however, be permitted to repeat what he had often said before, that the American question was one in which the prosperity of Ashton was very deeply involved, and therefore it deserved the serious consideration of every one present. It was quite certain that a return of their prosperous condition could not be reasonably expected until there was a return of peace in America. Until that time they could not expect to receive an adequate supply of cotton fit for their machinery, and he was sorry to add that until then there would be no bread for the unfortunately famishing people who had so long been dependent upon public charity. The manufacturers were all agreed that the prospect during the coming winter was a gloomy one, that many large concerns were preparing to close, and that probably the distress would be felt by the operatives this season as severely as during the worst period of the cotton famine; and concurrently with this alarming view of the case, it was to be remembered that the funds in the hands of the Central Committee and the Mansion-house Committee were getting rapidly exhausted. It was but natural, therefore, if only on selfish grounds, to hope for the return of peace on some terms or other. Partisans of the North ought to join in that wish. For his own part he was, as they well knew, an advocate of the independence of the South, on the ground that the South deserved it and had won it; but whether the North could or could not conquer the South, it was quite certain that the two peoples could never again dwell together in the Union as it existed before the war, and therefore he desired to see a peaceful separation as the best for the Americans and for ourselves. There were some, he believed, in that hall who adopted Northern views, but he had no doubt they would listen patiently to the reverend lecturer on the Southern side of the question, and, in that case, his office as chairman would be, as he hoped, a sinecure.

The reverend lecturer, on presenting himself to the vast concourse of people, was received with loud applause. He assured them he felt the very great responsibility of addressing a magnificent meeting like the one then assembled upon the most serious question of their day. He could only promise them that he would give them the best he had on this matter; for it would be an insult to such an audience to come before it only with passionate declamation or with loosely-formed opinions, expressed as it were at random, or so as to feed the excitement of the hour. He wished it, however, to be clearly understood that he stood upon that platform on his own responsibility. He represented no society, nor was he a member of any 'party.' If any Tory, therefore, fancied he was going to claim him because he happened to partly agree with him on the American question, he might save his pains. He was there as a free man to speak: the audience were there as free men to hear. If any of them were anti-slavery, so was he. If any of them were for the great American Republic, so was he; and he loved the idea so well that he would have two republics instead of one. With all these concessions, he desired not to be led by fancies, but by facts. Before he had done they would see that fair play and peace were involved in the American question, and that peace in America meant the recognition of the fact that the present war was a hideous, cruel, and blind mistake. He would, however, confess that he too had his sins on this matter. At first he shared the then prevailing opinion, and he wrote and spoke in favour of the Northern Government, and he longed to see the Confederacy put down. But that was before he studied the question. He now felt bound to believe that the South had a right to secede, that the North had at all events no right to coerce, and that a certain portion of the English people were very far from having a true insight into the whole case. Let them all remember they had nothing to do with the objects of the Confederacy in the form of government they wished to adopt. For the purpose of his argument, it might be all true that was said about the slaveholding system. But this would not affect their right to govern themselves. What if the Northern States were really fighting against slavery? How could that affect the right of the South to secede? Supposing the South had this right—and that was the point he meant presently to dwell upon and prove—it was not for logical men to turn round and say, 'But you are going to govern yourselves on wrong principles.' That was purely their own business and none of ours. The question for our consideration was not how they proposed to govern themselves, but whether they had a right to govern themselves at all. (Here the reverend lecturer entered upon a lucid and cogent argument, in which he examined the origin of the American Union, citing many eminent authorities upon the subject, and proving with much clearness and force the indubitable right of the South to secede.) It appeared from what might be called the almost united testimony of every party and statesman previous to the war that, first, each State was distinct and separate, and independent, except for the transaction of certain affairs that the Union was formed to expedite; second, that the will of the people which took a State into the Union could take it out; and third, that the coercion of any State was unlawful and impolitic—a crime, in fact, against the Constitution and the people, and the liberty on which the very Republic was based. Now, here was a curious list of threats of secession, which ought to take a deal of dust out of English people's eyes. Threats against the integrity of the Union were uttered in the following order: By Connecticut, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire, in 1780; by the Northern States in 1784, again in 1786, and many times during the sitting of the Federal Convention at Philadelphia, under the Presidency of Washington himself, in 1787; by Massachusetts, in 1789; by the North, in 1790, 1791, and 1792; by Pennsylvania, on the reappointment of Washington as President, in 1794; by Virginia, Kentucky, North Carolina, and other Southern States, in 1798; by the Northern States, in 1804; by the New England States (especially Massachusetts), in 1808; by the North, in 1818, 1819, and 1820; by the Southern States (on the tariff system), in 1824, 1828, and 1830; by the Northern States, in 1838, 1840, and 1842; by the North, again, in 1846; again in 1850; and again in 1854; and, finally, by the Southern States, in 1860. Secession, therefore, was no new thing. Ever since the Union was established secession has been contemplated at frequent intervals, the legality of it had never been questioned, and the power of coercion had never been suggested. And now for a few words in reply to a question which some no doubt were impatient to ask: 'What about slavery?' He had already proved that they had no right to ask that question. Not even the Northern States had a right to ask it. But there was no need to dispose of the matter in that way. He would look the question fully in the face. Slavery, he owned, had something to do with secession. To say it had nothing to do with it was as great a mistake as to say it had everything to do with it. The fearful gulf now stretching between North and South was wider and deeper than the one question of slavery could have made it; but he believed the slavery question had helped to widen it. The fact of Lincoln's election being the signal for secession was a proof that slavery had something to do with it; but Lincoln's election was only the spark that set the gunpowder on fire. But was the Northern Government, therefore, fighting against slavery, and was that one of the issues of the war? He did not know whether to wonder more at the audacity or the simplicity of those who said so. The Fugitive Slave Law made slavery compulsory upon every State in the Union. Northern senators voted that bill, and Boston fired a hundred guns to commemorate its becoming law, and Boston's hundred ministers knelt over their scarlet cushions and blessed God for the enactment. President Lincoln, on his election, offered a guarantee that slavery should not be interfered with, and Congress passed a resolution that it was no part of the war to repress the institution. But when the Southern armies could not be subdued, Lincoln turned round and met the military necessity by issuing his proclamation. That instrument was at once a threat and a bribe. If you keep out of the Union, we will punish you by emancipation; if you keep in the Union, we will let you keep your slaves. The opinion of F. Douglass was of priceless value. Himself a fugitive slave, now a scholar, he at least ought to be listened to as the advocate of his race. Douglass at first rejoiced in this war. He was permitted by the Federal Government to go to the South to raise a regiment of emancipated slaves, but has returned a heartbroken man, declaring that the negro was being used by the North for its own cruel purposes; and that, between North and South, the slave, as between two millstones, was being ground to powder. In this matter of slavery, in so far as it was a cause of the war, he (the reverend lecturer) would say at once the North was to blame. The North broke the laws of the Union, violated the Constitution, and then sought to punish those with whom they had broken faith. He praised the North—he praised the Abolitionists—for defying the impious Slave Law Bill; but he thought it cowardly and mean not to take the consequences of their own actions—not to be virtuous up to the virtue they professed. The fact was, the wrong section of Americans had seceded. It was the North, and not the South, that ought to have gone out. (After referring at some length and with much force to the political preponderance of the North, and the irreconcilable commercial differences between North and South, the reverend gentleman concluded his address as follows.) The South does not want war. It never did want war. There is to me a pathos, as well as a solemn dignity, in the attitude of the Southern States appealing to the world to testify that all they seek is to be let alone. Why, then, is this war to be continued? The war is unjust, inasmuch as the aggressors had no right to invade their sister States, to confiscate, coerce, and destroy. The war is useless, inasmuch as it is impossible that six millions of people united by a common peril, a common hope, a common hate, will ever be subdued. The attempted coercion of the seceding States is every way impolitic and bad. Bad because they who attempt to coerce them have no right to do it—bad because to have attempted it was to insult the principles upon which the Republic was based—bad because to succeed would be to introduce the crimes and the cruelties of the worst of European despotisms—and bad because it is endangering the liberties of the very people who are engaged in it, since it is a law in government that they who consent to tyrannise over others must necessarily be training up in their midst tyrants who will in turn rule over them. But grant all that had been said against the Confederacy—grant they had no right to secede—grant their enemies are fighting for the freedom of the slave—and even then I will ask you whether freedom is to be served by years of such ghastly warfare as this. Freedom would then indeed be a more hideous idol than Moloch, at whose horrid shrine besotted parents compelled their children to pass through the fire. I ask you if it has not been sufficiently proved that this is a useless as well as unjust war. I ask you if the price already paid in blood, treasure, and liberties, is not more than enough; and if not, tell me, in the name of all that is horrible, how much farther in this fiendish carnival you would have your brethren go. As a lover of freedom and a friend of peace, I put it to you whether the time has not come for England to say, 'Put up thy sword into thy sheath.'

At the conclusion of the lecture, which occupied an hour and a half in the delivery, and was listened to throughout without a dissentient murmur, the reverend gentleman was honoured with an enthusiastic vote of thanks—in fact, the cheering appeared to be quite general, not only in ratifying the vote of thanks, but at frequent intervals in the lecture, and especially at those passages wherein the reverend gentleman's arguments told with most weight against the North.

A very large number of the population of Ashton have added their names to the Peace Address about to be forwarded to the 'People of the United States.'

FEDERAL ATROCITIES.—The Richmond correspondent of the Times writes: 'It is time that your readers should understand that this American struggle (apart from the great armies on either side) has long ago ceased to be conducted according to the nominal code of civilised warfare. I have again and again endeavoured to call attention to acts of special barbarity, and, little heed as England now gives to the details of this war, I am in hopes that the recent infamous atrocities committed in Westmorland County by Federal officers, who instigated the brutal African savages to enact deeds of lust and shame upon white women such as make the blood run cold with horror, will not have fallen upon entirely unheeding ears. But if it is imagined that Southern men, and especially Virginians, will look quietly on at burning farms, and merely capture the Yankee perpetrators of these atrocities when they catch them red-handed, your readers can know very little of Southerners, or, indeed, of human nature.'

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

NEW YORK: September 13, 1864.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION—THE FUTURE OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY—THE POSITION OF M'CLELLAN—THE SPECULATION IN GOLD—WAR RUMOURS—FAILURE OF THE LOUISIANA COTTON CROP—HOW GENERAL MORGAN WAS BETRAYED.

THE indications would now appear to be unmistakable that a fierce war will rage from now to election day between what are known as the peace and war wings of the Democratic party. Prior to the meeting of the Chicago Convention, and after its adjournment, we were told that all was 'harmony' in the ranks of the Democracy, and that they would enter the Presidential contest—the most momentous and important in this country's annals—with an unbroken front. But there seems to have been a fatal error in all this; or rather, the harmony was only a conditional one, and hinged on the position the candidate of the Convention would assume in his letter accepting the honour.

The platform was adopted the day preceding the nomination for a candidate, and no one can read that without coming to the conclusion that the Convention, large and influential as it was, was almost unanimous for peace. Nor was this a peace in one hand, and a sword in the other. It was intended to mean the best possible peace that could be secured, and at any rate a discontinuance of further fighting. The platform was everywhere construed to embody these principles, and Peace men hailed it as a harbinger of joy and gladness. Next day came the nomination for President. There was some opposition shown to M'Clellan, and here was the first symptom of a disturbance of the previous harmony that appeared. A portion, a minority of the Convention, could not trust M'Clellan as a Peace man, and the majority, as is believed, only trusted him because of a conviction that he would repudiate his former declarations about a continuance of the war, and accept the platform already adopted. It is absurd to suppose the majority of that Convention held any other belief. They had declared the principles of the Democratic party to be Peace, and it was as essential for a Peace candidate to be nominated as for the arm to be attached to the body. None but a convention of idiots would pursue any other course. If the declaration of principles and sentiment was peace, then the standard-bearer of those principles must, of necessity, be in favour of their full and unequivocal enforcement. M'Clellan was nominated under what has turned out the terribly mistaken belief that he would wipe out his former record and square himself with the platform; but his letter shows that he will do nothing of the kind, and like a bombshell has it done its work. The party is torn asunder, and the golden opportunity for peace through a Democratic Administration is lost.

It is impossible to describe the depth of bitterness which the Peace men feel towards M'Clellan and the War portion of the Democracy who will adhere to him, nor do I think there is the remotest chance for this feeling to be allayed. The War Democracy will urge the Peace men to stand with them, if for no other purpose than to oust the present Administration from their places. This, they will contend, is the vital point; while the nominee of the party is merely a secondary consideration—not to be thought of, indeed, before so momentous a consideration as driving the present usurpers from power. But such coaxing and argument will fail in its purpose. The Peace party at the North is determined that a Peace candidate shall be presented for the suffrages of the people; if the people will not rally to his support, the fault will be their own, and it will, at any rate, be decided that the majority of the North is not ready for peace. We may reasonably look then, at no distant day, for the nomination of an out-and-out Peace candidate for the Presidency, who can be voted for not only by the Democracy, but by all other politicians and the public at large as well.

Just now the M'Clellan men are the most jubilant and boastful of all. They regard the question as already settled, and their organs are engaged in carving out the labours of their 'future President.' 'When General M'Clellan is elected,' &c., &c., &c. 'The new President's policy will be,' &c., &c., &c. Well, what will his policy be? Why, so far as fighting is concerned, it will far outstrip Mr. Lincoln for vigour; for the Union is to be 'preserved at all hazards.' Mr. Lincoln's war, it is alleged, is to destroy the Union—M'Clellan's will be to preserve it; and it will be war to the hilt if the South so wills it. The South can have peace 'now (when M'Clellan takes his seat) in the Union, but it can never have peace out of the Union.' Such is the programme of the M'Clellan organs, and the letter of that personage shows that the programme is correct; and M'Clellan will receive thousands of votes that would otherwise be cast for Lincoln, simply because he is a War candidate, but favours a different conduct of the war. The blind zeal of multitudes will cause them to vote for M'Clellan, because, as they believe, he really will be successful in bringing or whipping the South back; they do not believe the South will spurn the kind offer to return to the Union (?); and there are actually tens of thousands at the North who expect to see the South back again as soon as the offer is made! Once M'Clellan is elected, the war will be over!

You will see from this that the true position of the South is still totally misunderstood at the North. A minority, it is true, do understand it, and these are in favour of stopping the war at once and making the best bargain with the South they can. But the vast majority, still hugging the fatal delusion that the South can be whipped into 'obedience,' are for a continuance of the strife, and, therefore, either Lincoln or M'Clellan will be elected, though I think the former.

The rupture in the Democratic party is greatly relished by their opponents, as might well be expected. United, the Democracy would have been a terror to their enemies, and the field would have been swept with all ease; but as it is, the odds are decidedly with Lincoln. His reelection will be rendered doubly certain if, as is alleged, Fremont has written a letter withdrawing as a candidate, thus leaving the contest to Lincoln and M'Clellan, and a Peace candidate should one be run. This alleged letter of Fremont's is said to be in the hands of his friends, and will be made public at an early day. The report from the second gun of the fall campaign—the election in Maine—reached us last night, and if the returns at hand may be regarded as an index of the State, the Republican vote, like that of Vermont, is in excess of last year. The World, as the crackbrained champion of M'Clellan, does not regard these returns from Maine and Vermont as indicative of how these States will vote in November, but to my mind they point unerringly to the triumph of Lincoln.

The News to-day charges that the substance of the Chicago platform was drawn up two months since, and presented to M'Clellan, who 'approved it both in its letter and its spirit,' whereas now he ignores it in toto, and comes out with a platform of his own. It is charged by some that the fall of Atlanta and the victory in Mobile Bay was the reason for M'Clellan acting as he did. With such grand victories his friends argued, a Peace candidate would stand no chance of an election, and M'Clellan, to have any show at all, must reaffirm his former declarations that the war must go on. But let these victories the people would have been dragged with Lincoln and his efforts, would have acknowledged that the war was a failure, and would have been ready, for the best peace that was practicable; but 'Atlanta and Mobile,' as the song has it, changed all this, and in further victories is our only hope. It is the old delusion, as I have said above, that the South can really be conquered and brought back to the Union by force of arms.

As a friend of the South I hope Lincoln will be reelected. Were I compelled to vote, I should vote for him in preference to M'Clellan, and in doing so I should feel that I was casting a vote for the independence of the South; but as I am not compelled to vote, I shall stay at home and let the politicians fight it out.

There are some who assert that the M'Clellan letter is a mere blind; that he is not the Fighting War man that he pretends to be in that letter; that it has been forced from him as the only hope of success; but that, once elected, he will 'see the flag of the Union trailed in the dust,' and be the negotiator on one side of a 'dishonourable peace.' General Wood, in a published letter, charges this on him flatly, and the Abolition journals generally, to damage him as much as possible as a candidate, reiterate the charge—and all this, too, in face of the unmistakable letter that M'Clellan has written.

The violent reaction in gold is without any substantial basis whatever. Just at present there is no particular demand for the article, and the bears, taking advantage of this, have dealt it a series of sledge-hammer blows, bringing it yesterday as low as 214. From this there was a return to 221½; but as I write (Tuesday) it is not quotable over 219. The mischief caused by these freaks of the bears is most incalculable, and where parties are compelled to sell their goods, bought at much higher rates, or say when gold ranged from 250 to 280, the losses are severe indeed; and even where the goods are not sold, the heavy fall tends to impair the credit of every merchant who happens to have a large stock of goods, bought at inflated prices, on hand. Outside of the bull operators in gold I hear of only one failure, that of a German house, the liabilities of which are not known.

Of course, among men who know anything of the financial position of the United States, this 'fall in gold' passes them as the idle wind. They know there is no substantial basis for it—they know that our paper liabilities are increasing steadily at the rate of five millions per day—they know that the receipts are not one dollar to six as compared with the expenses—and they know that the Government is constantly pledging itself to additional gold interest upon bonds that must be met, or repudiation follow. The latter, they feel sure, is certain, and hence the antics of the bears in gold do not trouble them. Those who have stocks of goods that they can hold, will hold them through all the absurd attacks that may be made upon gold; while those who have not the means to hold must of necessity be heavy sufferers.

The money market is, of course, deranged by the gold flurry, and paper ranges from 8 to 16 per cent., with a decidedly close scrutiny of names.

Rumours were current yesterday that Grant had been driven from the Weldon Road with a serious loss in men and guns, but there is no confirmation of it to-day, or indeed of any fight whatever in that direction. At last reliable advices, Lee was still massing his troops in front of Grant, and reinforcements from some quarter were daily arriving, but beyond this nothing positive is known. It is not likely, however, that Grant will open an assault upon Lee, but will rather await an attack for which he is stripping everything within his reach. His lines were extended on Friday night by the capture of the Confederate picket line across the Plank Road in front of Petersburg, an attempt to retake which was unsuccessful. The Confederate pickets give as an excuse for the capture of their line that they were 'asleep,'—the charge having been made after midnight. The new position places Grant about half a mile in advance of that previously held.

There is considerable speculation as to where Lee is receiving his reinforcements from. Some writers assert that they are from Hood's army, others from the Shenandoah, and still others that they are new recruits. My own belief is that the latter form a portion of the reinforcements, and that the balance are withdrawn from the Shenandoah—Early, meanwhile, being left sufficiently strong to maintain his position at Winchester, which he has thus far done successfully.

I have before advised you of the failure of the cotton crop in Louisiana. Let me give you an extract of a letter just to hand, dated the 3rd inst. 'The cotton crop is utterly gone; the worms will not leave enough to pay the expense of assessing, let alone gathering it. This cultivation of Southern soil and crops on Northern principles is a magnificent failure,' and, I may add, it will be so as long as the invader remains.

We have nothing whatever from Mobile, save a rumour that Forrest and his men have arrived there to take part in the defence of the city.

Hood reports the driving of Sherman's forces from Jonesborough, and the recapture of the hospital at that point containing Confederate wounded. Sherman's army is probably now all at Atlanta, the works around which will be strengthened, and the army proper allowed to rest. It is doubtful whether he will essay the offensive again under four or six weeks. Reliable advices represent that Hood left his antagonist nothing that could be rendered of the slightest value. The communications of Sherman with Nashville are said to be in order again.

The Cairo despatches give a 'report' of the death of General Price, from dysentery, at Arkadelphia.

It is understood that the Tallahassee was to leave Wilmington to-day, and that the Edith would soon follow. The A. D. Vance, from Wilmington, with 410 bales of cotton, bound for Halifax, has been captured, as also the Elsie, with 400 bales, 150 of which were destroyed by a shell from the Federal cruiser exploding in her forehold. The two vessels with their cargoes are valued at $500,000. The Georgia, prize, and the Niagara arrived at Beaufort on the 9th, en route to Boston. As a partial set-off to the above captures, the Confederates on Saturday week captured the Federal steamer Fawn, and burned her to the water's edge. Her officers, crew, and passengers were taken prisoners.

Morgan was betrayed by a woman in whose house he was sleeping near Greenville. The woman, unknowingly to the General, was the wife of an officer on Burnside's staff. Finding who her guest was, she mounted a horse, rode fifteen miles, and returned with the party who took him prisoner. He attempted to escape and was shot dead.

Stanton, it is said, will oppose the project for a free trade in cotton, though Lincoln is believed to favour it.

The loss of Atlanta is now clearly traceable to the absence of Hood's cavalry, which was off raiding on Sherman's lines. Had it been with Hood, Sherman could hardly have swept round to Jonesborough without the fact being quickly known at Atlanta, whereas Hood was totally ignorant of the event until he heard of the defeat of Hardee's corps.

Richmond papers just to hand report Grant massing a large body of troops on the road two miles south of Petersburg, as if with the intention of reaching the South-side railroad at some point near the town.

It is said that six corps of Sherman's forces were pitted against the corps of Hardee in the battle of Thursday at Jonesborough—enough, certainly, 'to crush out' that part of the 'rebellion,' any how.

THE DISTURBANCES AT TURIN.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

TURIN: September 24, 1864.

WE have had two days of horrors. This city, hitherto the model of cities for the good behaviour of her population, and the quietest of all European capitals, has been the theatre of bloody scenes which have no parallel in the history of Piedmontese convulsions, even at the darkest epochs of priestly supremacy and military despotism.

As soon as the intelligence of a convention being stipulated between the Italian and French Governments, in virtue of which Florence was to become the capital of the kingdom, was divulged through the city, the greatest excitement prevailed, which with wonderful rapidity spread like wildfire among the masses. This was on the morning of the 21st. Conflicting rumours began to circulate in favour of and against the Ministers; but this very collision of opinions tended to increase rather than diminish the uproar. At last the single idea seemed all at once to take hold of the popular mind, namely, that the removal of the capital to Florence implied the abandonment of Rome. Who first uttered it, or whence it came, no one knows: the fact is that, by noon of the same day, all Turin thought so, and was impressed accordingly.

Now that I am enabled to reflect a little more coolly on the mysterious flash of that one common idea, I must confess that there was nothing wild in it. The Emperor of the French, by his actions and policy, had long ago forced upon the Italian people the opinion that he was personally opposed to Italian unity, and that all his endeavours had constantly pointed to his favourite scheme of an Italian Confederacy. Moreover, it had been almost universally believed that if the cause of unity had made so little progress in Italy, this had happened through the influence and opposition of the Emperor and his august wife, who were reported to have stated that France would never allow an Italian garrison to occupy the Eternal City.

Was it then strange that the population of Turin—this ever-vigilant sentinel of our liberties and our national honour—should unanimously be led to believe that the transfer of the capital to Florence meant neither more nor less than the official avowal of the Italian people's renunciation of all claims on Rome? Of course some sentiment of interest, gain, and selfish lucre must have had its share in the manifestation of the popular opinion. This is quite natural. But I do positively declare that this venal desire was restricted to a few individuals, and that the great majority of both Turinese and non-Turinese inhabitants of the city entertained no thought which was not disinterested and noble.

After 2 P.M. of the same day all the squares and principal streets were really full of people, partly going and coming and partly stopping in small squads to discuss the momentous question of the day. Up to that moment no display of force had yet been made by the authorities, and as Turin has always been looked upon as the most loyal and most orderly city in the kingdom, it was not even dreamed that any force would ever have been called out. But we had reckoned without our hosts.

Piazza S. Carlo is undoubtedly one of the most magnificent squares of Turin, and every English tourist must remember its splendid monument of Emmanuel-Philibert's equestrian statue. Well, it was there that most of the population had collected, not only on account of its delicious and sunny locality, but because it was expected that a demonstration of young wags would be made against the director of the Gazetta di Torino for having spoken in favour of the removal. As bad luck would have it, it happened that the office of the Questura (the chief department of police) is situated in Piazza S. Carlo, near the church of Sta. Cristina, almost opposite the office of the Gazetta.

A few minutes before three o'clock the procession entered Piazza S. Carlo from Via Nuova. It was composed of about thirty individuals belonging to that class known here under the name of giovanni di banco, or clerks. They had no arms whatever; were carrying an Italian tricolor; and were accompanied, very naturally, by a crowd of noisy boys, who yelled, hissed, and screeched like so many imps. Now mark what happened, and believe that what I am going to relate is as true as truth itself, inasmuch as I was an eyewitness myself of the first act of this bloody and awful drama.

No sooner had the procession stopped in front of the office of the Gazetta than out of the Questura rushed about fifty guards, who, sabre in hand, fell like demons on the inoffensive actors of the procession, cutting right and left without mercy. It was a speedy work, I assure you, which did not last so long as it takes me to relate it, and which cleared out the ground as if a whirlwind had passed over it. After this inhuman butchery came the chase, and after the chase the arrest of those of the processionists who had had the good luck of being spared by the sabre. The number of the wounded is not yet ascertained; some say they were above fifteen. The fact is that only ten were arrested and dragged to the Questura. It was when the last couple of the arrested were entering its door that all the people disseminated through the square collected in a solid mass, and rushed like an avalanche towards the Questura, whose doors were immediately shut. Then a wild scene ensued—one of the wildest I ever saw. Baffled at finding the solid door resist against their pressure, the people began to shout and throw stones against the windows. Not one single pane was spared; everything that could be broken was pulverised; but not even a penknife was brandished. The population was utterly unarmed. A little later a deputation came to the Questura from the City Hall asking for the immediate release of the arrested, which was at once granted. The crowd outside was frantic with joy when they beheld their fellow-citizens rescued from their iniquitous captivity, and as they continued to shout against and threaten the guards of the Questura, a battalion of Carabinieri (our local gendarmes) was summoned to the spot to keep the populace in check, who, having by this time (about 7 P.M.) been augmented with a large number of workmen just from their shops, had really assumed a terrible attitude.

Still not a solitary act of reprisal had yet been committed by the citizens, and it was hoped that nothing more serious would happen to sadden our hearts. It was really believed that the popular excitement, after having freely vented its fury in clamours and vociferations, would at last fall into its normal tranquillity and be hushed. But we were reserved to a bitter and melancholy disappointment. While the angry human sea was roaring in Piazza S. Carlo, a few hundreds of other citizens were walking up and down Piazza Castello, which is within gunshot of the other square. These were people even more peaceable than those collected in Piazza S. Carlo, and who had resorted there only attracted by curiosity. I happened to pass through Piazza Castello at about half-past 9, and saw a great many ladies with their male companions scattered in different directions, and seemingly indifferent to what was being enacted at three hundred paces from them. I saw also a platoon of Carabinieri, commanded by an officer, marching in a very composed and solemn way towards that corner of the piazza where the Via di Po begins.

Just at that very instant a score of rough-looking fellows, shouting 'Down with the Ministers!' 'Death to Minghetti!' and such sort of nonsense, entered the Piazza Castello from the Via Nuova, and met the platoon of Carabinieri face to face. What was the immediate result of the meeting I cannot tell you, but it must have been of no serious character on the part of the civilians, for I positively know their only weapons consisted of sticks, which they carried on their shoulders. Be it as it may, scarcely five minutes had elapsed when the platoon fired indiscriminately among the people, and, having reloaded their muskets, fired again. It is reported that Lord Granville, happening to be on the piazza, and seeing how infamously the inoffensive citizens had been fired upon, rushed to the spot and cried to the Carabinieri, Qu'est-ce que vous faites, misérables? Vous tuez des gens sans armes! Sixteen dead bodies were picked up, and a great many wounded—some say thirty, and even more. A gentleman who was sitting outside the Dilei coffee-house had a thigh shattered by a bullet, and another gentleman was killed near the Fivrio coffee-house. Now, when we consider that these two places of Turinese resort are in Via di Po, and far from the scene of action, we shall conceive how wild must have been the fire of the soldiery.

Immediately after the second report, a general cry of desperation was heard. Several groups of persons ran frantically up the streets crying for arms, and on arriving at the shops of the gunmakers battered down the doors to arm themselves, while others commenced unpaving the streets. From every nook and corner of the city strange and lugubrious yells arose; drums were beating, companies of Bersaglieri and squads of National Guards appeared, the uproar was intense, the danger of a general collision was imminent, but God be praised! the patience of this exemplary people triumphed over the bad instincts of human nature, and by midnight comparative order was restored.

Who gave the order of firing upon an unarmed population? Who ordered the soldiers to come out of their barracks with loaded muskets? If any real danger threatened the Carabinieri, why did they not use their bayonets and try to defend themselves with them from the attack of common sticks? This is what we do not know yet.

The next day (September 22) found Piazza S. Carlo and Piazza Castello occupied by infantry. Fifteen thousand troops of all arms are said to have arrived from the neighbouring camp of S. Maurizio during the night. Water in abundance had been poured on the spots where the citizens' blood was shed; this ablution had obliterated the red traces, but the city had not forgotten the horrid memory of the slaughter. Still the population, though gloomy and threatening, walked the streets unarmed. There were clamours the whole day, but no deeds of violence. The City Council issued a proclamation exhorting the citizens to be calm and generous, and promising them that justice should be done. This seemed to produce a salutary effect, and every one uttered a prayer to the merciful God for the safety of the city.

Towards night strange rumours were put in circulation. To the abandonment of Rome was now added the cession of the Valley of Aosta to France. This story, absurd as it was, was believed by the people, who, hydra-like, hissed, writhed, and threatened to be mischievous. Still no arms were to be seen, and this was already a blessing. The National Guards refused to come out. Every square and street was choked with a living mass. It was said that the provinces were moving towards the capital, and that the trains from Milan and Genoa had been stopped. By nine o'clock Piazza S. Carlo had the look of a pandemonium. Under the double wing of its majestic porticoes, two battalions of infantry were bivouacking, and its centre was crammed with people of all ages and both sexes. Opposite the office of the Questura the human surge was awfully threatening. Oh! such yells and oaths! Still, no arms. At this instant a company of Carabinieri was ordered out of the Questura to clear the entrance. On their appearing the crowd foamed with frenzy, and discharged a cloud of stones into them. Even two pistols were fired, and two Carabinieri fell to the ground mortally wounded. What ensued afterwards is indescribable. I borrow some particulars from the Gazetta del Popolo, which, though very faint and imperfect, may furnish an idea of the horrid tragedy that followed:—

'Then the whole company of Carabinieri rushed out of the Questura, and, hastily forming into line, without order or notice, fired into the compact mass. Of course every shot told; but the horror of the situation was increased by an unforeseen event. The Carabinieri had formed in such manner that some of them were obliquely facing the eastern, and some the western, wing of the porticoes under which the two battalions of infantry were encamped. Several bullets of the Carabinieri struck some soldiers, and among them the colonel of the 17th, who fell mortally wounded. The troops, believing themselves attacked by the people, rushed to arms, and in their turn poured their deadly missiles into the human mass, thus assailed on three sides. Nor did the series of fatal blunders end here; for the two battalions, being drawn up opposite each other, for some time also fired into each other's ranks with a terrible effect. A few minutes after, the unarmed crowd had vanished as if by magic, but about one hundred and fifty bodies lay stretched on the square.'

Let me close this horrible and bloody statement of a triple massacre.

The next morning (Friday, 23rd), no city on the earth presented a sadder look than Turin. I went to see some of the dead that had been carried to the hospital of S. Giovanni during the night, and there with my own eyes I saw and counted twenty corpses—eighteen men, including a boy of twelve and an old man of sixty, and two women, one of them enceinte. The Official Gazette of the same day gave the total amount of the victims of the 22nd as follows:—'Twenty-six dead, sixty-six wounded; among whom are fourteen soldiers of the latter, and two of the former;' but I positively know it is incorrect.

On the afternoon of the 23rd, a proclamation from the Crown announced to the city that the Ministers had resigned, and General della Marmora had been charged with the formation of a new cabinet. The city is quiet, but bears the traces of a city taken by storm. There are accusations in circulation which point very high, but I don't believe them. Some of our Ministers may perhaps have fancied, and even longed for, an Italian Deux Décembre; but I don't believe the Crown has anything to do with such criminal projects. Our Parliament, which is to meet on the 5th of October next, will undoubtedly unmask the traitors, if treason there was, and summon to the bar of public opinion the wretches who have caused the blood of the most exemplary population of Italy to be shed so wantonly and dastardly.

FEDERAL RULE IN MEMPHIS, TENNESSEE.

WE have been favoured with the following extract from a private letter, written by a resident of Memphis to a friend in London:—

You have asked me for facts in regard to the present condition of Memphis, as contrasted with its former condition. I wish I could picture the present as I see it. Trade, instead of being free as air, is now subjected to such restrictions as these. Every one doing business in Memphis must first apply for permission, setting forth his loyalty to the Federal Government. If the evidence is satisfactory, permission is granted, and the amount of goods he may purchase and bring to the city per month specified. He must give bonds and security for complying with the trade regulations and not exceeding the amount specified. He must then get a permit for the passage of his goods, which permit is lodged at Cairo, where the goods come with sworn invoices, and these are endorsed on the permit. A certain fee must be paid on every permit. He must pay three per cent. to the Government for the privilege of selling goods in a rebel State, and his loyalty must be unquestionably vouched for. You can easily imagine the amount of bribery that may be brought into requisition by such arrangements; and still there is much suffering from the want of what we used to consider the necessaries of life. A tariff of prices is laid upon all articles of daily consumption, as beef, pork, flour, vegetables, &c. In consequence our markets are supplied with very poor articles, and in small quantities. If I wish to visit a friend in the country, I must get permission of the authorities. Preachers in churches must pray for the President of the United States. No clergyman is allowed to officiate unless he takes the oath of loyalty; in fact, all classes are required to take the oath. The whole male population from eighteen to fifty are enrolled in the militia, and required to parade twice a week, when all the shops are closed. The greatest inconvenience we suffer is in the depredations of the soldiers upon our grounds, gardens, &c. Not one in a hundred distinguishes between meum and tuum. They take what they want wherever they can find it. They drain cisterns, destroy patches of vegetables, when the owners are dependent upon them for subsistence, force persons in the country to give up mules, horses, wagons, money, and often, if provoked by failing to find what they want, they kill by hanging or shooting without compunction. A friend of mine gave a party of soldiers all the provisions in his house for breakfast. While they were there another party came with a similar demand. He met them at the door, holding his little boy by the hand, and told them their comrades had eaten everything. One of the newly-arrived soldiers called him a liar, drew his pistol, and shot him. He fell dead at the feet of his little boy. I could not enumerate the cases of this nature that have occurred. The beauty of the suburbs, as you remember, was in the forest trees. These have been destroyed in all directions. The fort on the bluff commands the river, and could destroy the town, but could not defend it.

MURDER OF PRISONERS BY THE FEDERALS.—The Louisville (Kentucky) Journal, of August 26, says:—'Information was received in this city yesterday that Captain Garrett, in command of a detachment of Federal troops from Shepherdsville, recently made a foray into Hardin county, and on Otter Creek captured a guerilla named Miles, and arrested two citizens well-known in the neighbourhood—Mr. Robert Vanmeter and William Suttler. The captain charged the citizens with being rebel sympathisers, and said that he had orders to arrest them and conduct them under guard to headquarters at Shepherdsville. He started on the return with his prisoners, and, stopping at Pitt's Point, confiscated a lot of whisky, and report says that he and his command got gloriously drunk and insulted many of the citizens residing in the neighbourhood. The party arrived in Shepherdsville on the same afternoon, but reported no prisoners at headquarters. Late in the evening of the same day, the children of Mr. M'Douvall, the coroner of Bullitt county, living a short distance from the town, were sent out to look for the cows. They returned and stated to their parents that they had discovered lying in the woods the dead body of Mr. Vanmeter, covered with blood. Word was conveyed to Shepherdsville of the fact, and Captain Garrett, still under the influence of liquor, was heard to remark that, if search was made, three dead bodies would be found instead of one. The spot was visited, and the drunken remark of the captain was found to be fearfully true. The bodies were recognised as those of the three men made prisoners in Hardin county. All were shot through the body and were stretched upon the ground cold in death, and surrounded by their own gore. The facts are plain that the prisoners were deliberately murdered by the captain and his drunken men.'

PROFESSOR GOLDWIN SMITH ON THE ENGLISH ARISTOCRACY.—Among the 'distinguished' arrivals by a recent Cunard steamer was Mr. Goldwin Smith, the Professor of Modern History at Oxford. One of his first essays in public since his arrival has been reported for the public edification. At a public assembly at Brown University this Oxford Professor was present and asked to speak. The portion of his speech which is reported was that of a thorough-paced demagogue, though he craved pardon for himself on the ground that he was a student and not a politician. In it he railed at the British aristocracy as a friend of the slave-holding Confederacy and the enemy of the free North. But he was glad to know that the working men of England were with the North; and a knowledge of that fact had restrained the aristocracy and prevented the Government from recognising the Confederacy.—The Montreal Gazette.

FEDERAL WAR NEWS.

(From the Hartford Times, September 17.)

As it seems to be a settled thing that from this time forth until after the Presidential election the war telegrams are to be more untruthful than ever, and that one side alone of the reality is to be presented to the public, it may be well to remind those simple-minded souls, who still place reliance on Mr. Stanton and the 'special despatches of the newspapers,' of the fact that such announcements, take them week by week and month by month, are pretty sure to expose their own real character by their inconsistencies. The whole history of the war, from the first battle of Bull Run down to the present time, if it were made up only from the Government bulletins and the six-column accounts of newspaper correspondents which daily figure in the principal New York and other papers with flaring 'stud-horse headings,' would present nothing but one unbroken series of brilliant successes, darkened by no page of disaster, and scarcely varied by even slight temporary 'reverses,' as Bull Run was called. According to the official bulletins, and the letters that flame in the New York sensation newspapers, our armies have had one almost continuous and unbroken march of triumph, and we have conquered the rebellion over and over again. The whole gist of the matter was revealed by the remark of the New York Herald's correspondent, Mr. Thompson, who went with General Banks on his Red River expedition, and who, remonstrating with a gentleman for proposing to write to a friend the real truth about Banks's awful defeat, made in substance this declaration: 'Yes, I admit that what you have there written is true, only you have not told half of it; but it will never do to send it North. We newspaper correspondents are not sent here to give news of defeats; it is our business to send news of victories; and with us nothing but victories ever occur. We are employed to make victories out of all that happens, or, at any rate, never to recognise or admit a defeat.' That tells the whole story of the Tribune, Herald, and Times army letters; how it squares with the 'official bulletins' from Washington every reader can judge for himself.

It was not very many weeks ago that the best army correspondent of the whole lot—Mr. Swinton, of the Times—was expelled by Generals Grant and Meade. He had always done his duty faithfully by exalting the successes of our arms, and making the best (that is, the least) of reverses. His accounts were probably the most graphic and faithful of any. But the remarkable part of the matter is contained in the editorial comments of the Times itself on the expulsion of its favourite correspondent. This journal, growing indiscreet in its wrath, declared at the time, that Mr. Swinton was expelled from the lines because he had declined any longer to bepuff and glorify Grant and Meade, and the general officers under them! If, said the editor, our correspondent had consented to continue the puffing of the Generals under whose control he was, he would doubtless have been allowed to remain!

It is the accounts furnished by correspondents placed in these circumstances, which are heralded to the world still as the truthful news of the war. The system of 'glorification' (as the New York paper was compelled to call it) is to be intensified in practice now. Mr. Stanton and his 'censor' of war news clearly like it. The plan, it is evident, is not to be abandoned during this month or the next. How such 'official' conduct is regarded by intelligent and candid men at home or abroad, we need not say.

THE FEDERAL DEBT.

(From the Richmond Whig, Sept. 3.)

THE broken merchant dreads of all things an examination of his books. He knows he is ruined hopelessly, but his nerves are too weak to withstand the shock of seeing that ruin depicted in black and white—in figures that will not lie. Our enemy labours under precisely this cowardice. He will not open his books and face the music of its terrible column of figures. He prefers to shut his eyes and spend four millions a day; consoling himself the while with the reflection, après nous le Déluge.

Neither Chase nor Fessenden has had the courage to investigate fully the national accounts. Indeed, it may be doubted whether any investigation would reveal the whole truth. The Yankee Treasury, unlike our own, was thoroughly organised at the beginning of the war. Its system of checks and balances ought to have been perfect. But, as if by tacit agreement, the proclamation of war was hailed as the signal for universal peculation in all departments and among all grades of officials. Moreover, the reputation of Mr. Chase previous to the war was not the best in the world. We may be sure, therefore, that the actual expenditures of the United States have been largely in excess of its published budgets.

Republican papers estimate the public debt, in round numbers, at eighteen hundred millions. Democratic journals, more honest, state that on the 4th March next the debt will exceed twenty-six hundred millions. The World compares this debt with that of Great Britain, which is known to be the largest in the world. On the 31st of March last, the British national debt was 799,802,139 pounds sterling; or, reckoning five dollars to the pound, $3,999,010,695—the interest on which, at 3 per cent., is $119,970,320. The entire wealth of the English nation, according to the official returns in April, 1861, was $31,500,000,000. The yearly interest, therefore, is at the rate of one dollar for $262 59 of the valuation.

Including 4,000,000 slaves at Southern valuation, the entire wealth of all the United States and Territories in 1860 was $16,159,616,060. The public debt of the North, exclusive of State, municipal, and other liabilities, will be in March next $2,653,427,101, all of which is to be funded and draw six per cent. in gold, which is $159,205,626. Therefore, the yearly interest, payable in gold, is at the rate of one dollar for $101 50 of the valuation, which is more than two and a half times the debt of Great Britain.

But, with gold at 250, payable in United States currency, the rate of interest will make the Yankee debt more than six and a quarter times larger than that of Great Britain; and that, too, as compared with the resources and valuation of the whole United States in 1860. Deduct the wealth of the seceded States (slaves, land, property of all sorts), and add the outstanding and unacknowledged liabilities of the Government, and it will be seen that the actual debt of the United States at this moment is, relatively, not less than twenty times greater than that of Great Britain.

GENERAL MORGAN'S SUCCESSOR.—The Richmond Examiner, of September 12, says: 'Colonel Basil W. Duke, formerly of General John H. Morgan's staff, has been assigned to the command of the deceased chieftain's troops. Colonel Duke is a dashing officer, of daring courage and fine abilities.'

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

NOTWITHSTANDING the gloom and depression which prevail in all commercial circles, occasioned by the numerous failures that have taken place within the last week or two, and the apprehension entertained in most quarters of further serious disasters, arising from the heavy and sudden fall in cotton and over-speculation in various articles of produce, the money market has remained remarkably steady, and will, it is thought, experience improvement. The Bank accounts are getting stronger, more bullion is flowing into the vaults of Threadneedle Street, and there is less anxiety with respect to the future. The worst of the failure of the Leeds Banking Company has now been realised, it will wind up, and the business has been scattered in different channels. The failures that have occurred in London have been those of weak establishments, but no very large houses are expected to fall. After the end of the present week it is presumed affairs will right themselves, and if on the payment of the dividends the Bank should go back to 8 per cent., there would be a general rebound. The days of speculation are now over for the present, and it is as well that there should be no immediate revival. The rate of 9 per cent. is generally the current one for first-class paper; in special transactions a quarter lower may be accepted. The present temporary panic will no doubt be succeeded by a calm; but we may yet have further spasmodic changes in the course of the winter.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The market for bullion and specie has, upon the whole, assumed a rather better appearance. The amount of gold sent into the Bank during the week has been 259,000*l.*, but against this there have been withdrawals to the extent of 125,000*l.*, of which 30,000*l.* was for shipment to the Mauritius, and the remainder for Portugal. The arrivals of specie have likewise been large, viz. 456,000*l.* from the West Indies; 166,944*l.* from Australia; and 114,000*l.* from New York, making a total of 736,944*l.* In the early part of the week the silver market was rather active, but it has since become very quiet. The dore silver brought by the Tasmanian from the West Indies has been sold at 61$\frac{5}{8}$d. per oz. standard, and the fine silver at 61$\frac{3}{4}$d. per oz., being a decline of about $\frac{1}{4}$d. per oz. on previous rates. Some portion of the Mexican dollars by the same vessel have been sold at 60$\frac{3}{8}$d. per oz., showing a further fall of about $\frac{3}{8}$d. per oz.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The market for the English Funded Securities has been very heavy throughout the week; in fact, a panic feeling has occasionally prevailed, caused by the continued high price of money and the difficulties which are daily presenting themselves in various commercial circles. The great fall which has taken place in most descriptions of securities has brought forward sellers to a very large extent; but operators are very cautious in making purchases, the general belief being that prices have not yet touched their lowest. Consols closed this evening at 87$\frac{3}{4}$ to 87$\frac{7}{8}$ for money and 88 to 88$\frac{1}{8}$ for the account, which is a fall since this day week of about $\frac{3}{8}$ per cent. Exchequer bills have rather improved, the March issue being up to 12*s.* to 4*s.* dis. In the Foreign Stock Market the dealings have been rather limited, and have been chiefly confined to those of a more speculative character; but in almost all cases prices have had a downward tendency. Greek stock closed at 23 to 23$\frac{1}{4}$, being a decline of $\frac{7}{8}$ per cent. Mexican stand at 26$\frac{7}{8}$ to 27$\frac{1}{8}$, or a fall of $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. Spanish Passives have declined $\frac{7}{8}$ and the Certificates $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., closing respectively at 31$\frac{1}{2}$ to 31$\frac{3}{8}$ and 13$\frac{5}{8}$ to 13$\frac{7}{8}$. Turkish Six per cents. of 1854 are 90$\frac{1}{2}$ to 91$\frac{1}{4}$, being an advance of $\frac{1}{8}$ per cent.; but those of 1862 have declined $\frac{1}{4}$, being now 69$\frac{3}{4}$ to 70$\frac{1}{4}$.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The market for American Government and Railway securities has again been very fairly supported as regards business, but, nevertheless, prices continue to decline. The official dealings have been in United States six per cents., at 44, 44$\frac{1}{2}$, 43$\frac{3}{4}$, 44$\frac{1}{4}$, 33$\frac{7}{8}$, 44, 43, and 43$\frac{1}{4}$; Virginia State six per cents., 24, and 27$\frac{3}{4}$; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York section, second mortgage, 69$\frac{1}{2}$, and 68$\frac{1}{4}$; do. do., Pennsylvania section, first mortgage, 76, and 75$\frac{1}{4}$; do. do., second mortgage, 68. Erie shares, $100, all paid, 42$\frac{3}{4}$, and 42; and Illinois Central, 7 per cent., all paid, 52, 52$\frac{1}{2}$, 51$\frac{1}{4}$, 52$\frac{1}{2}$, 50, 50$\frac{1}{2}$, 50, and 49$\frac{3}{4}$.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market has been dull and inactive all the week, and this stock has participated in the general depression, still further increased by the unfavourable accounts from the Shenandoah Valley brought by the steamer yesterday. The closing price is down to 68 to 70, consequent upon the failure of a Liverpool speculation.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

There has been a fair amount of business transacted in British railway shares, but prices in all the leading descriptions have declined. At present business is to a certain extent curtailed, in consequence of the dealers being engaged with the half-monthly settlement. As compared with last week, there has been a fall of 2$\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in Great Northern, of 2 per cent. in London and North Western and Midland, of 1$\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in Lancashire and Yorkshire, of 1$\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. in South Eastern, of 1 per cent. in Caledonian, Edinburgh and Glasgow, Glasgow and South Western, Great Western, West Midland (Oxford), London and Blackwall, Chatham and Dover, South Western, Metropolitan, Birmingham and Derby, Edinburgh, Perth, and Dundee, North London, South Devon, and Vale of Neath; and of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in Great Eastern, East Anglian, Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, North Eastern (Berwick), do. do. (Leeds) and Shropshire Union. In foreign railway shares there has been very little doing at reduced rates, but for colonial descriptions there has been a better demand, at fairly sustained quotations.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES, &c.

At a general court of the Bank of England, the Governor K. D. Hodgson, Esq., in the chair, it was shown that the net profits of the half-year ending August 31 amounted to 850,813*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.*, making the amount of rest on that day 3,859,557*l.* 14*s.* 5*d.*, and after paying a dividend of 5*l.* 15*s.* per cent., the amount of rest would be 3,022,760*l.* 4*s.* 5*d.* The dividend was declared payable on October 10, free of income tax. Yesterday, another meeting took place, when a ballot was taken for the purpose of confirming the dividend.—At a meeting of the proprietors of the English and Irish Bank, a special resolution was passed for voluntarily winding up the concern and appointing liquidators.—At the ordinary general meeting of the Financial Discount Company, the report stated, that with a paid-up capital of only 30,000*l.* a gross profit of 8,005*l.* had been realised for the six months ending September 24, and after paying all expenses, &c., the net profit was 4,910*l.*, from which was declared an interim dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. for the half year, or 10 per cent. per annum, leaving a balance of 3,410*l.*, which with interest left 4,836*l.* to be carried forward as at the rate of 30 per cent. The report was adopted.—At the ordinary meeting of the Bank of British Columbia, the report, which was unanimously agreed to, stated that after paying all current expenses the amount of undivided profit at the end of the half year to the 30th of June last was 11,105*l.* Out of this sum the directors propose to appropriate 5,000*l.* to paying a dividend at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, free of income tax; to add 4,000*l.* to the reserve fund, which was thereby increased to 6,000*l.*, and to carry forward 2,105*l.* 16*s.* 6*d.* to the current half year. At a meeting of the United Mexican Mining Company a dividend was declared of 5*s.* per share, payable on October 11.

THE FAILURE OF THE LEEDS BANKING COMPANY.

There was an adjourned meeting of the shareholders in the Leeds Banking Company held to-day at Leeds, when a statement of accounts was presented showing liabilities to the extent of 1,330,308*l.* against assets estimated at 826,695*l.* A long discussion took place, which terminated in a decision to wind up the concern, and three liquidators were named to carry out the objects in view.

MERCANTILE SUSPENSIONS.

The following mercantile firms have suspended payment during the week, viz.:—Messrs. Saulfeld Brothers, of Leeds, woollen cloth manufacturers.—Mr. John Abraham, of Aldermanbury, in the Leeds woollen trade.—Messrs. Oldrich & Co., of Mark Lane, in the cotton trade, with liabilities estimated at between 50,000*l.* and 60,000*l.*—Messrs. Turck, Barclay, & Co., of Gresham House, general merchants, with about 120,000*l.* liabilities.—Mr. F. Yagues, a commission agent, engaged in the Spanish trade; his liabilities, however, are understood not to be large.—Mr. J. W. Marsden, of Leeds and Lonnon, ironfounder. He has absconded, and it has since transpired that he has committed forgeries on the Leeds Banking Company to a very large extent.—Messrs. Alfred Teale & Co., of Leeds, with 100,000*l.* liabilities.—Mr. Charles Turner, of Holbeck, near Leeds, cloth manufacturer.—Messrs. William Turner and David Johnson, of Leeds, cloth manufacturers.—Mr. Francis Clough, of Gresham House, in the cotton trade, with liabilities extending to between 150,000*l.* and 200,000*l.*

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

The produce markets continue dull in most departments, both buyers and sellers acting with undiminished reserve. Generally the variation in prices is trifling, as supplies are not pressed heavily for sale; but where parcels are realised for immediate payments, lower rates are taken. The London cotton market continues heavy, the principal transactions being on reduced terms. At the close, however, the American advices have caused a slightly firmer tone to prevail. The provision trade progresses quietly but steadily; butters of all imports maintain the rates of last week, and cheese sells rather more freely at full prices, American brands 90*s.* to 112*s.* for good and fine. The demand for bacon is restricted, and confined chiefly to mild cured Irish sides. There are no indications of improvement in the grain trade, which remains extremely dull throughout the provinces as well as in Mark Lane, and fully another 1*s.* per quarter must be taken off the quotations of all kinds of wheat. For linseed-cake rates are still upheld, American barrels being quoted 11*l.* 5*s.* to 11*l.* 10*s.*, and bags 10*l.* per ton. Petroleum has been more in demand at 2*s.* 1*d.* to 2*s.* 1$\frac{1}{2}$d. per gallon for American refined on the spot, and also for the last three months' delivery. French refined turpentine is firmer at 64*s.* per cwt., but the nominal quotation of American is unaltered. The demand for oils of all kinds is very inactive, but supplies are not forced off upon lower terms. Linseed, at 34*s.* 6*d.*, is perhaps a shade firmer. Sperm is quoted 64*l.* to 64*l.* with a very slow sale, the stoppage of machinery in the cotton manufacturing districts being against consumption. Tallow meets some speculative enquiry for distant delivery, but the trade are doing very little, and quotations are rather lower on the spot. Jute has suffered a further depression of 20*s.* per ton, common to fine qualities selling at 11*l.* to 26*l.* 15*s.*, and cuttings at 6*l.* 10*s.* per ton. The sugar market is still depressed, and stocks have so accumulated as to exceed those of last year at this time. Considerable supplies of coffee have been cleared off, but at easier rates. The tea market is flat, with change in the value of China teas. Assams have made better prices. Spices generally meet a quiet demand without change in value. In drugs, gums, and drysaltery articles, transactions are of merely retail extent at moderate rates. Metals are neglected. Scotch pig iron has receded to 57*s.* 6*d.* Spelter offers at 24*l.* Straits and Banca tin at 98*l.* cash, and pig lead at 20*l.* to 20*l.* 5*s.* per ton.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, September 28.—Our cotton market still continues very much depressed, owing partly to the tightness of money, the unfavourable influence exercised by the recent failures in the cotton trade, and the apprehension that more serious disasters are likely to follow. The slight recovery in prices, which took place at the close of last week, from the recent heavy fall, has not been maintained, and the tendency of the market has been heavy, but closes rather firmer to-day. Business this week has been far from active, but there is rather more doing than there was last week. The sales during the week have been 30,000 bales, of which 14,000 were on speculation and for export. The total sales this year so far have been 1,945,417 bales, and to the same period in 1863 1,866,995 bales. There have been imported this year 1,720,459 bales; last year the number was 1,147,137 bales. The trade have taken this year to the present time 1,195,446 bales, and to the same in 1863, 996,574 bales. The exports this year have been 411,312 bales; last year they were 339,486 bales. There have been taken on speculation this year 326,835 bales, and in 1863, 492,914 bales. The estimated stocks at the present time are 392,042 bales, and at the same period last year they were 201,115 bales. The closing quotations this afternoon were, for American descriptions, 24$\frac{3}{4}$d. to 27$\frac{3}{4}$d.; Pernambuco, 25$\frac{1}{4}$d. to 25$\frac{1}{2}$d.; Maranham, 25*d.* to 25$\frac{1}{2}$d.; Egyptian, 20$\frac{1}{2}$d. to 26*d.*; Smyrna, 11*d.* to 16$\frac{1}{2}$d.; Surats, 10*d.* to 20*d.*; Bengal, 10$\frac{3}{4}$d. to 11$\frac{1}{2}$d.; Scinde, 11$\frac{1}{4}$d. to 11$\frac{1}{2}$d.; China, 13$\frac{1}{4}$d. to 15*d.*; and Japan, 15$\frac{3}{4}$d. to 16*d.*

All the markets at Manchester continue very flat, but an opinion appears to be entertained in many quarters that prices have now touched the lowest point—that is, for the present—unless some unforeseen cause should arise to create some fresh disturbance of confidence. In shipping yarns there has been slightly more business doing within the last day or two, and a few orders have been taken at about the nominal quotations of last week. In home-trade yarns there is also a little more steadiness, and for the finer descriptions there is now rather more doing. The cloth market shows but very little sign of improvement. Buyers still refrain from giving orders to any extent either on foreign account or for home stocks, whilst there is more disposition on the part of manufacturers to realise even at the present reduction. The offers made by buyers, however, are only at a further depreciation in prices, and this the manufacturers are quite indisposed to agree to. Would they consent to accept the terms offered, a good business might be done. In shirtings there has been rather more doing, in consequence of sellers having slightly lowered their pretensions, in order to meet the offers of buyers. The closing quotations were: 7/8 Grey Printers, according to quality, 7s. to 14s.; 3/8 Grey Madapollams, 6s. to 9s.; 3/8 Grey Printers, 9s. 6d. to 16s. 6d.; 5/4 Grey Shirtings, 11s. 3d. to 23s.; Water Twist, No. 20, 1s. 9½d. to 2s. 6d.; No. 30, 2s. 1½d. to 2s. 7d.; No. 40, 2s. 7½d. to 3s. 0½d.; Mule Twist, No. 20, 1s. 5½d. to 2s. 4½d.; No. 30, 1s. 8½d. to 2s. 6d.; No. 40, 1s. 11d. to 2s. 9d.; No. 50, 2s. 5d. to 3s.; No. 60, 2s. 6d. to 3s.; No. 70, 2s. 8d. to 3s. 2d.; No. 80, 2s. 11d. to 3s. 5d.; No. 90, 3s. to 3s. 7d.; and No. 100, 3s. 3d. to 4s. 1d.

The Campaign.—The Richmond Examiner of September 7 says:—'By dint of a heavy expenditure of means, energy, and men, the enemy have reached the centre of North Georgia; but if we compare the cost of this expedition with the results realised, we find nothing to warrant despondency. He has had to give up East Tennessee and leave nearly all of West Tennessee open to Confederate incursions. He has had almost to abandon Mississippi and Alabama. Even Kentucky has been left unprotected, and the north bank of the Ohio has been threatened. To maintain his long line of communications and make headway into Georgia, he has had to evacuate immense districts of country already overrun, which would have yielded him a thousand times more value than the region of Georgia which he has desolated. Like the dog crossing the stream, he has let go what was substantial to plunge after a shadow. It will cost him more men and money to maintain himself at Atlanta than it would to subjugate and possess any two States which he had occupied, and has now abandoned. If the Confederacy had the election of his policy, it would gladly choose that he should continue his campaign in Georgia rather than employ the same army in many enterprises which she would have infinitely more difficulty in thwarting. If we maintain our army intact, we have but to bide our time, and the result will take care of itself. If the season of winter and bad roads sets in, finding Sherman still in Georgia, and our own army confronting him in force, we should soon have no reason to regret the loss of Atlanta. On the far side of the Mississippi the situation is peculiarly favourable. Texas is free from Federal troops; the greater part of Louisiana is delivered of their presence; Arkansas is no longer in thraldom, and General Price is marching with a considerable force into Missouri. In virtue of the concentrated efforts of the enemy in Virginia and Georgia, we have gained much lost territory on this side of the great river; but we have won back much more territory on the other side by actual conquest. Except the channel of the Mississippi and the land bordering the rear communications of Grant and Sherman, the Confederacy now holds most of the ground it lost in 1862 and 1863.'

The Battle of Reams' Station.—General Hill, in his official report of the brilliant affair at Reams, which we quote below, says he captured 2,150 prisoners, 3,100 stand of small arms, 9 pieces of artillery, 12 stands of colours, 10 caissons, and 32 horses. Now, we saw at least two thousand of the prisoners ourself, and have seen perfectly reliable individuals who have seen the other trophies mentioned in the report. We make this statement with no intention of intimating that anything that General Hill sends to the War Department needs confirmation from any source as, with a modesty equal to his bravery, he is inclined always to underrate rather than overestimate the fruits of his victories. On the other hand Meade sends an official report of the same fight to his master Stanton, in which he displays the impudence of a confirmed 'moral agriculturist' in claiming a victory. He estimates our losses by thousands, when, all told, in killed, wounded, and missing, General Hill says, it was only seven hundred and twenty. He adds that we left our dead and wounded on the field, when it is a notorious fact that the Yankees ran in such pell-mell style that not one of them, except prisoners, saw the field or the dead after the fight.—Richmond Paper.

Black Republicanism.—The Buffalo Express, a Lincolnite paper, publishes the following:—'The propeller Arctic left last evening with a large load of delegates for the Chicago Convention. Admiral Richmond was on board with his political suite, consisting of party fry of all sorts, sizes, and complexions. Never did such a load of copper float upon the waters of Erie as the Arctic bore away last evening. We should regret, from personal, social, and pecuniary reasons, to record her loss with her entire freight; but it certainly would be no national calamity, or loss to the cause of loyalty, if she should touch bottom.' Commenting on this, the Buffalo Courier says:—'The above, from the Express of this morning, we put on record as about the most diabolical expression of party malignity run mad we have yet seen. Stripped of its verbiage, the paragraph is nothing less than the utterance of a wish for the death, by a catastrophe which would make the whole country shudder, of the hundred or so of men and women who left our city by the Arctic last evening. For "pecuniary" and other reasons, the Express would "regret" the occurrence; but, as the country would be the gainer by it, and as, of course, the patriotic are stronger than the "pecuniary" motives of the Express, it would be forced to rejoice over the perishing, by a miserable death, of these hundred souls.'

REGULATIONS TO CARRY INTO EFFECT THE ACT TO IMPOSE REGULATIONS UPON THE FOREIGN COMMERCE OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES, TO PROVIDE FOR THE PUBLIC DEFENCE, APPROVED FEBRUARY 6, 1864.

I.—AS TO THE SEA.

1. The owners of any vessel intending to sail from a Confederate port with a cargo consisting in whole or in part of cotton, tobacco, military and naval stores, sugar, molasses, or rice, shall, before the lading on board of any such articles, file with the collector of the port from which the vessel is to sail a copy of her register, with a declaration of the names of the owners and officers thereof, the place of their birth, and of their residence for the preceding year, together with the port or place to which the said vessel proposes to sail. The said declaration shall also set forth the quantity and value, in Confederate currency, of the cargo proposed to be taken out, as also the consent of the said owners that one-half of the tonnage of the said vessel may be employed by the Confederate Government for its own use, both on the outward and homeward voyage, at the rate of freight hereinafter mentioned. The collector shall submit a statement as to the owners and officers to the military commandant of the port; and if he shall not object to their loyalty, or to the sailing vessel, for reasons of military necessity, the collector shall grant a permit for the lading of said vessel, one-half for account of the owners, and one-half for account of the Confederate States.

2. Before the said lading shall be completed, the owners of the vessel shall execute to the Confederate States a bond in one-half the value of the vessel, with security deemed adequate by the collector, conditioned that she will pursue the voyage designated, and that she will return with reasonable despatch to a Confederate port, after her outward cargo shall be discharged, with a cargo consisting one-half of articles not prohibited by the laws of the Confederate Government, and the other half of such articles as the Government shall offer for shipment from such port, at the rate of freight hereinafter mentioned.

3. Each shipper of any portion of the cargo proposed to be laden on board the said vessel shall, before the lading thereof, make application to the collector for a permit to lade the same; which application shall declare the articles to be shipped, and the quantity and value thereof in Confederate currency, the port of destination, and the name of the consignee. A permit shall then be granted by the collector, if the application is deemed satisfactory. The lading shall be had under the inspection of a revenue officer, who shall be charged with the duty of seeing that the goods laden conform to the permit.

4. Before the completion of the lading on board, or the granting a clearance, each shipper of any portion of the cargo shall execute and deliver to the collector a bond to the Confederate States, in one-half the value of his shipment in Confederate money, with security deemed adequate by the collector, with condition that at least one-half the net proceeds of said shipment shall be invested in goods or articles not prohibited by law; and said goods or articles shall be shipped by the same or some other vessel to the Confederate States within sixty days from the unlading of said cargo.

5. The freight to be paid by the Confederate States on all cotton and tobacco shipped from a Confederate port shall be fivepence sterling per pound, payable on delivery at the port of destination, in coin or sterling exchange. Return freight shall be at the rate of 20*l.* per ton, payable on its delivery in a Confederate port, in cotton, at twelvepence sterling per pound for middling uplands, and at a proportionate price for cotton of other qualities; or, at the option of the Government, in specie or sterling exchange. In calculating the ton of freight by weight, 2,240 pounds shall be allowed; by measure, forty cubic feet shall be allowed.

6. The rates of freight for articles other than cotton and tobacco shall be adjusted at the same relative rate, and payable in the same way.

7. The Government reserves the right to limit or prohibit the shipment of rosin, turpentine, or any manufacture thereof, whenever deemed dangerous to its own shipment.

8. Upon the completion of the lading of the vessel, and before receiving her clearance, there shall be delivered to the collector, in addition to the usual manifest, another, setting forth the names, ages, and description of the officers and crew, and of every passenger intending to sail in her. The said last-mentioned manifest shall be delivered to the commandant of the port, who shall thereupon cause the entire vessel to be searched; and if satisfied that the parties on board are persons who may safely be permitted to leave the Confederacy, and that the passengers have the proper passports, he shall certify the same on the manifest, and return the same to the collector; whereupon, and not before, a clearance shall be granted to the vessel, and she shall be permitted to sail.

9. The owners of each vessel, and of each portion of a cargo, sailing from a Confederate port, shall be allowed to take up their respective bonds by producing to the collector the certificate of the proper agent of the Confederate Government at the port of delivery, setting forth the particulars, showing that the said party has complied with the obligation of the said bonds so far as the same was practicable; and the collector, upon being duly satisfied, shall be authorised to surrender the said bonds.

10. Nothing in these regulations shall be so construed as to conflict with the proviso of the law which declares 'that nothing in this Act shall be construed to prohibit the Confederate States, or any of them, from exporting any of the articles herein enumerated on their own account,' nor shall a bond be required of a State in any case.

11. The penalties of all bonds executed in conformity with these regulations shall be recoverable in full, on proof of breach of the conditions of the bond, and without proof of any damage suffered by the Confederate States in consequence of such breach; and all bonds shall be executed in such form as to give effect to this regulation.

12. Vessels sent into the Confederacy for the purpose of exporting cotton received in payment of any Confederate bond or obligation, shall be subject to these regulations only so far as relates to such portion of the tonnage, if any, as may remain vacant after the lading of the cotton received in payment as aforesaid.

13. Whenever any vessel shall bring into the Confederate States an entire cargo for account of the Confederate States, the owners of the said vessel and the shippers of her cargo shall be relieved from the bonds previously given to invest and bring in one half of the net proceeds of her outward cargo; and the certificate of the agent of the Treasury Department, at the port of lading, that such cargo was duly shipped in pursuance of the regulations, shall authorise the collector to cancel and surrender the said bonds.

THERE are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17 Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24 Rue Lord Byron.

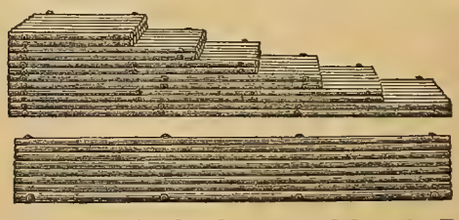
DUNCAN'S PATENT RATAN CANE SPLINTS.



THESE Splints are introduced and recommended to the Faculty for the great advantages which they possess above others,—viz., their comfort, coolness, and durability, as well as the facility with which they may be applied to the fractured limb.

As cleanliness is an important consideration, these Splints possess that quality pre-eminently, as they may be readily washed without the slightest fear of injury.

They are especially adapted to the constant usage of the General Hospital, and the movements of an Army on Service, as they cannot easily be injured. For Colonial practice they are recommended for the same reason.

They have been submitted to, and have received the approbation of, the Principal Medical Officers of the Army Medical Department.

The Splints cannot be injured by moisture; and are manufactured either with or without pads.

The 'New Regime.'

DOUBTLESS the English reader has never seen a copy of the New Regime. Nay, we dare assert that the English reader has not the faintest idea of what the New Regime may be, and now hears of its existence for the first time. The New Regime is occult to the Cisatlantic public, a flower not rubescent to European eyes, a gem shining in a cave comparatively unfathomed by HER MAJESTY'S subjects. That cave is Norfolk, Virginia, and the gem shines for the peculiar satisfaction of Major-General BENJAMIN F. BUTLER. Not to put too fine a point on it, the New Regime is the organ of B. F. B., registers his edicts, sounds his praise, and lays down the law of loyalty which he is called upon to enforce in his military department. Three or four issues of this interesting journal, and three or four only, have fallen under our notice, but their contents are of a nature to make us regret that we have not seen more. So much energy of expression, so much devotion to the cause it espouses (true as the dial to the sun, in utter indifference whether the sun shines upon it or not), so much point, piquancy, political wisdom, fun, feeling, and philosophy, are dog-cheap at 'five cents a copy,' were it the pure coin of the realm; and when we consider that all these excellences, literary and journalistic, are offered for a half-dime in greenbacks, we stand astonished at the prodigality of the publishers, and envy the good fortune of the good people of Norfolk.

Just as Mrs. JARLEY kept a poet, and in former days kings and rulers kept their fool (Mr. LINCOLN, we know, is his own jester), so General BUTLER keeps his organ. It is maintained, of course, at Government expense, and not out of the Beast's exchequer; but it is worthy of its master as he is worthy of his Government. Indeed, the very name of the paper has been most happily chosen to indicate the policy of BUTLER and LINCOLN in the conquered provinces of the South. 'The Union as it was' may be all very well for Buncombe; Mr. SEWARD, addressing the simple citizens of sweet Auburn under many inspirations, may proclaim that the restoration of the old Union is what they are fighting for; but BUTLER knows better than that. It is not the ancien régime at all that he seeks to restore; it is the NEW REGIME of LINCOLN, SHERMAN, PAINE, TURCHIN, and their confrères, who have associated themselves together in a Grand Society for the Plunder of the Confederate States and the Extermination of the Southern People (*Un*limited), and the object of this organisation is well signified in the title of BUTLER'S journal. SHERMAN will probably set up an organ in the town he has so recently captured, under the name of the Georgia Greenback, and PAINE may publish for the enlightenment of his unhappy subjects a daily, to be known as the Kentucky Cutthroat, whose aim it shall be to prepare the world for the sweeping changes in the moral, political, and social institutions of the States 'in rebellion' which are to be made when these States have been thoroughly subdued.

Certainly no one who was acquainted with Norfolk in the olden time can run his eye over the columns of the New Regime without being strongly impressed with the fact that a new order of things prevails in Lower Virginia. About nineteen-twentieths of its advertising space is devoted to the publication of 'General Orders' from the 'Headquarters of the 18th Army Corps, Department of Virginia and N. C., Fort Monroe,' and therein we see the paw of the Beast on all the interests of Norfolk, its trade, its social economy, its religion. It is set forth officially that 'any parties disfiguring, or in any wise molesting, any of the Government orders which may be posted within this district,' must be arrested on the spot by any person, citizen or soldier, who shall witness the act. It is also announced (in not the best English), in accordance with LINCOLN'S determination to 'run the churches,' that, 'owing to the vacancy of the pulpit of the Presbyterian church of this city, caused by the deportation of its late pastor, the Rev. J. D. ARMSTRONG, D.D., by the action of the Commanding-General, the Rev. C. L. WOODWORTH, Chaplain of the 27th Regiment Massachusett Volunteers, will officiate as pastor until further orders.' We are not surprised to see, as an item of local intelligence, that there was 'quite a commotion at the corner of Commerce and Main Streets, which grew out of the refusal of a sailor (white man) to obey the request of the coloured guard who was taking him to the guardhouse,' for white men are to obey negroes under the new régime. Nor are we greatly startled by the sentence of a military commission which condemns Mrs. or Miss AMY FRANCES CORNICK to be imprisoned for six months at such place as BUTLER may select, and 'at the expiration of that time to be sent out of the Department,' upon the charge of carrying letters through the lines; for war upon women is the favourite means of BUTLER for bringing the South into subjection.

But the New Regime concerns itself with more important matters than the everyday affairs of municipal police and constructive treason. The advertising columns may be given up to general orders, but there is the 'leader' which discusses questions of the gravest purport, and which we may reasonably suppose to be informed by the genius and pervaded by the sentiments of BUTLER himself. And it does so happen that, in the last number of the Regime which we have been so fortunate as to receive, the leader is what, for want of a more appropriate adjective, we must call 'stunning.' It is not long, it is not argumentative nor rhetorical, but it is loud. Bishop BERKELEY once wrote an essay on the virtues of tar-water which concluded with an argument on the Trinity—a somewhat devious line of reflection, it must be admitted. BUTLER'S man, in a much shorter piece of composition, undertakes to record with rapture the capture of the blockade-running steamer A. D. Vance, and rushes into a headlong denunciation of England. To show what sort of feeling the Yankee leaders are endeavouring to excite among the masses of their people towards the people of England, we beg to quote the very brief but very strong paragraph of the Regime. So runs the leader:—

> The captured steamer bears the name of the present Governor of North Carolina. She has been a successful runner. She made nine attempts to get out of Wilmington on this occasion; but the Cuba cornered her, and brought her to. The 'commercial honour' of the 'nation of thieves' will be hurt, upon hearing of the misfortune which has befallen the most successful of their numerous blockade-runners. But it is a little harsh to speak thus of Englishmen; our ancestors; who worship at the same shrine, and own Shakespeare in common with us; and who, with us, on the Fourth of July, thank God that Chatham's language is our mother tongue. If England has not gotten a black eye during the past few years, we do not know the badge of blackguard.

This ebullition of impotent rage would be simply contemptible did it not indicate a hatred of Great Britain already prevalent among the great body of the Yankee people, and sedulously cultivated by designing and unprincipled men, such as are now at the head of affairs in the United States. While Englishmen cannot but regard with concern the manifestations of a feeling which must involve them, sooner or later, in a foreign war, we think they will learn with unmixed satisfaction that BENJAMIN F. BUTLER is their enemy, and detests them with all the malevolence of his bad heart and bestial nature; and they may well apply to him the epithets and the prayer with which Lord MACAULAY concludes his withering memoir of 'BARÈRE of the Carmagnoles:'—

> It was but little that he could do to promote the honour of our country, but that little he did strenuously and constantly. Renegade, traitor, slave, coward, liar, slanderer, murderer, hack writer, police-spy—the one small service which he could render to England was to hate her; and such as he was may all who hate her be!'

The Cotton Famine.

THE distress in the cotton districts is returning with redoubled severity. A generosity unparalleled and universal has mitigated the horrors of two winters. Nothing that money or organisation could do to relieve the suffering operatives was neglected. They, in their turn, believed, for they were assured thereof by their leaders, that the struggle would be short, and that cotton would again come abundantly from the South. The cotton did not come. Then they believed, for the same leaders once more assured them, that cotton would come from other regions of the globe, and that dependence on American supplies would cease. That last hope has been rudely torn away. Charity cannot endure for ever. Poor-rates do not furnish an inexhaustible treasure. The distress in Rochdale threatens to be more severe this winter than at any time during the cotton famine. In Stockport, Stalybridge, and Accrington, the prospects for the coming winter are most gloomy. 7,660 paupers have been added to the relief lists in the cotton districts since September 1, and of these 4,210 are due to the past week. The increase in the number of unemployed was upwards of 1,000 during one week.

Under such circumstances, what is the great representative man of the cotton districts doing? What ray of hope does Mr. COBDEN see in this dark cloud of misery? No one would deny him, even with the pauperism of Rochdale staring him in the face, the ordinary amenities of an affectionate correspondence with the men who are after his own soul. If it pleases him to interchange autographs and photographs with the LINCOLN family, no one can object to such harmless courtesies, especially as the gifts afford an admirable peg on which to hang Mr. COBDEN'S view of the American war. 'There seems,' says he, 'to be something in the modern development of armaments which favours the defence over attack. This must tend to prolong the war, and make the issue depend on the comparative strength of the resources of the contending parties. In this struggle against exhaustion and ruin, the North will be able to hold out the longer, and to this tedious and dreadful process we must resign ourselves.' The operatives of Rochdale know their fate from lips which it would be heretical to doubt. Starvation, idleness, hopeless interminable misery, in order, forsooth, that the problem may be solved of the power of the North to struggle against exhaustion and ruin for an indefinite period of years.

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

Very savage indeed are the Federals about the Confederate incursion into their lines on September 16. The correspondent of the New York Herald writes: 'The rebels can congratulate themselves upon having made the most brilliant and successful raid of the war.' It appears that a body of Confederate cavalry made such well-timed arrangements, that they captured the Federal guard, about 150 men of the 13th Pennsylvania cavalry, and drove away 3,000 head of cattle without molestation. But the loss of beef was not the only or most disagreeable incident of this affair. Several bodies of troops were sent in pursuit of what the angry Lincolnites call 'the cattle-stealers,' and these in some cases managed not to come up with the Confederates, and, when they were unfortunate enough to do so, were driven back with loss. Moreover, the Confederates captured a whole regiment of cavalry. The correspondent of the New York Herald says: 'The First District of Columbia Volunteers were encamped near Sycamore Church, on the road leading to Stony Creek Station, and were surprised in camp with their horses unsaddled, and nearly the whole regiment, including arms and horses, captured. The capture of these rifles will be a great acquisition to the enemy, as they are an effective weapon for skirmish duty, and one in which they are deficient. They will doubtless soon be able to manufacture ammunition suitable for their use.

Sheridan's 'victory' of September 19 appears, the more we hear about it, to be less like a real and more like a Stanton victory. At first it was reported that the Confederates under Early had been badly beaten, and that Sheridan was hotly pursuing the rebels. Next we hear that the Confederate loss was 5,000 killed and wounded, besides 2,500 prisoners—Mr. Stanton sticks to decimals, and always captures the enemy by hundreds and thousands, and never condescends to an odd man or two—and that the Federal loss was 2,000. A day later—that is, on September 21—it was stated that the Federal loss was 3,000 and the Confederate loss 4,500. Now when during this war did the Federals fail to understate their own loss or to overestimate the loss of the Confederates? Moreover it happened on the 21st that, instead of hotly pursuing Early, the Federal commander was binding up his wounds, and had not moved in the pursuit. In short, the 'glorious victory' was reduced to a drawn battle, and we should not be surprised if it turns out that the Federals were worsted. The Confederates were engaged in a movement when they were attacked; they sustained the attack for many hours, and moved away without molestation. Probably it was Early's rearguard that was engaged.

The Confederates have lately taken a considerable booty from the enemy. Besides the arms, horses, and cattle captured in Virginia, we learn that a supply train and two suttlers' trains, with 600 mules and 40 horses, which were going from Kansas to Fort Smith, Arkansas, for the use of the Federal garrison at that place, were captured by the Confederates at Calun Creek.

It is reported that two Federal steamers on Lake Erie have been captured by the Confederates; also that two armed Confederate steamers had appeared on the lake, which were fitted out in a Canadian port. The latter report was discredited in Washington.

It was reported, vid New Orleans, that, on September 6, 5,000 French trooops and some Confederates under Colonel Forde, attacked Cortinas at Matamoras, and that Cortinas was assisted by the Federals. After the engagement Cortinas crossed the river, occupied Brownsville, Texas, declared himself an American citizen, and offered the services of his troops to the Federal Government. Further, it is stated that the French have seized on the Rio Grande several vessels from New Orleans with supplies for Cortinas. This story is altogether improbable. It is true, however, that the Federals cordially sympathise with Cortinas, and have done all they could to aid and abet the enemies of the Mexican Empire.

We elsewhere reprint from the Gallatin (Illinois) Democrat an account of the arrest of the editor and printer of that paper, on August 19, by order of General Paine. After being grossly insulted and kept in filth and privation several days, these men, against whom no charge could be sustained, were taken into the presence of General Paine, who said to them, 'I am going to send you d—d sons of b—s home.' According to a letter in the Daily News signed 'Anti-slavery,' General Paine has been removed from his command. This writer says: 'If General Paine be a bad officer, he does not represent the spirit of the Federal Government, since he is dismissed by it.' Certainly 'Anti-slavery' is a fair representative of the Federal Government—of the Government that pets Butler, Milroy, Turchin, &c., &c.—or he would not think that such a vulgar foul-tongued ruffian as Paine could be aught else than a bad officer.

Scenes of violence have already occurred in the United States ominous of what may be apprehended before November 4. At Pottsville, in Pennsylvania, a Democratic meeting held on September 17, the anniversary of the adoption of the Federal Constitution, was interrupted by a sudden charge of Federal cavalry, the gallant troopers, who had never been in a battle, brandishing their sabres to the great alarm of women and children, many of whom were in attendance. Six citizens of Pottsville were wounded, some of them very badly. One was a returned soldier who had served three years in the Federal army. The Democrats held their ground, and a great riot might have taken place but that the cavalry vanished as suddenly as they had appeared. At St. Louis, Missouri, on September 15, a meeting of the friends of General M'Clellan was assailed by a shower of stones from Federal soldiers, who tore down the transparencies on the stand, and bore off two American flags. These outrages will doubtless be repeated hereafter, and they abundantly indicate the determination of the Lincoln party to carry matters with the strong hand.

There are other indications that the United States will not pass through the ordeal of revolution without the usual accompaniment of civil war. The Democrats are writhing under the yoke of Mr. Lincoln, and avow their intention of opposing force to force if there is any interference with the freedom of election. The New York Daily News of September 21, commenting on the interruption of Democratic meetings at St. Louis and Pottsville by the military, says: 'If the armed hand is to decide the issue, so be it; let the armed hand of the Democracy be prepared for the conflict. If Democratic votes are better than Black Republican, Democratic steel is just as good. God avert the necessity to decide the issue otherwise than fairly and quietly at the polls; but if Mr. Lincoln appeals to violence, meet him at the threshold with the weapons of his own choice. The Peace men, in that quarrel, will prove as ready war men as the readiest.' The New York Herald of September 20 charges the Tribune and the World with 'pursuing the very course to arouse the people to revolutionary proceedings and preparing the way for the scenes of the French Revolution to be enacted in this country.' The Federals may not fight against tyranny, but they are likely enough to fight for the spoils of power.

It is announced that General Fremont has withdrawn from the Presidential contest. Mr. Vallandigham has declared he will vote for General M'Clellan, and the Peace party will, it is expected, follow his example. The friends of Mr. Lincoln, though confident of success, expect a close contest.

The Resident Committee of the National Democratic Convention of the United States has put forth an address to the Conservatives throughout the country, dated at Washington, and signed by Charles Mason, chairman, Thomas B. Florence, Henry W. Harrington, Samuel J. Randall, Jonah D. Hoover, William Flinn, James G. Berrett, and Cornelius Wendell. The address refers to the great difficulty of contending with the overgrown power of the Federal Government, but calls upon all Conservatives to unite themselves together in clubs for effecting the deliverance of their country. It cites the formation of Loyal Leagues in the time of Mr. Pitt to counteract the intrigues of the Jacobins, and draws a hopeful augury of success from the overthrow of revolutionary ideas in Great Britain by the reaction of the public mind during that eventful period. The Committee arraigns the Administration for its well-known flagrant abuses, but is altogether silent on the subject of the future prosecution of the war.

At a meeting of the Board of Police Commissioners of Chicago, held a few days previous to the assembling of the Democratic Convention, some curious facts were elicited on the examination of a special policeman, a German, who had been enlisted by General Turchin in an organisation for the purpose of dispersing the Convention. The Mayor of Chicago, forewarned by these revelations, took efficient measures for the prevention of any disturbance, and the plans of Turchin were consequently not carried into effect. There seems to be no doubt, however, that these plans had been fully matured, and, but for the timely discovery of Turchin's design, might have so far succeeded as to have produced great bloodshed in Chicago, and thus inaugurated a civil war in the Federal States.

In the most recent of those playful and ingenious letters contributed to the Daily Telegraph, under the head of 'America in the Midst of War,' by Mr. Sala, we find the old story of the Prince of Wales having been insulted by the mob in Richmond again repeated. Mr. Sala adduces the story in proof of the statement that 'Southern mobs have always in coarseness and rowdyism far surpassed their Northern brethren.' This is un peu fort. The Prince of Wales never was insulted by a mob in Richmond, and Mr. Sala knows just as little as possible from actual observation of Southern mobs or anything else Southern, as he has never crossed the Potomac. In point of fact, very few mobs have ever occurred in the South at all. Such lawlessness is almost unknown to the Southern people, and that popular violence, such as manifests itself constantly at the North, rarely disturbs the peace of the community.

Mr. Lincoln's lieutenants are very prompt to suppress what they call Northern treason. The arrest of an editor and the suspension of the publication of a newspaper have become such commonplace occurrences that the New York papers give the facts as an item of news not calling for special comment. On September 9, General Lockwood issued an order to discontinue the publication of the Cambridge Democrat, Maryland, because Mr. Barrett, the editor, published an article calculated to encourage the 'rebels,' as well as 'those in our midst who are so far forgetful of their duty as to desire the overthrow of their Government.' According to the testimony of Mr. Lincoln's officers, there is a large disunion party in the North.

On September 21, gold was quoted in New York at 224.

ENGLAND.

An explosion exceeding in force all that experience or records have preserved to modern memory occurred on Saturday morning last, at a distance of about fifteen miles from the metropolis. On the southern bank of the Thames, between Woolwich and Erith, lie the Plumstead marshes. On a portion of this flat tract of land were situated two powder-magazines, one belonging to Messrs. John Hall & Sons, and another to Messrs. Daye & Barker. In the immediate vicinity of the depots stood a few cottages inhabited by the families of the men employed in the superintendence of the stores of gunpowder. The magazine belonging to Messrs. Hall was a new and strong building, about fifty feet square, with two floors, situated close to the river; a jetty projected into the river, and off the jetty lay two barges. In the magazine and the barges together there were at least 1,000 barrels, each containing 100 lbs. of gunpowder. It is not known exactly what quantity was stored in the smaller magazine of Messrs. Daye, but probably there were not less than 20,000 lbs. At about twenty minutes before seven o'clock, from some cause inexplicable, because no one survives who could have offered an explanation, the gunpowder stored in the magazines exploded. It is supposed that the gunpowder in the barges was first ignited, next that in the larger magazine, and lastly that in the depot of Messrs. Daye & Barker. So terrific was the concussion that at Woolwich, distant about four miles from the scene of disaster, it was believed that the Arsenal had been blown up, and there was a rush of panic-stricken people to the works. At Erith and Deptford considerable injury was done to houses and property, nearly every pane of glass being broken. At Chatham and Rochester, distant twenty-five miles from the magazines, the shock was very generally felt; and even at Uxbridge, Windsor, and Teddington, the inhabitants believed that a severe shock of earthquake had occurred. In the more elevated districts of the metropolis, such as Camden Town, Highgate, and Kingsland, the concussion was felt. The spectacle presented at the place itself was marvellous. The foundations of the magazines were torn up, huge fissures in the earth were visible, the cottages were annhilated and all their inhabitants killed or wounded. Fortunately the injury to life and limb was small in comparison with the tremendous nature of the accident. Indeed, as far as can be ascertained, the mischief was limited to the deaths of nine persons and the maiming of as many more. One of the most remarkable effects of the explosion was the rending of the embankment of the river Thames for the distance of 100 yards, and the risk incurred of an inundation of the low-lying districts adjoining the water. However, the tide was out at the time of the accident, and before high water the embankment had been restored to a strength sufficient to withstand the force of the waves. Within twenty minutes after the explosion, Mr. Houghton, a contractor under the Metropolitan Board of Works, hurried to the spot with a corps of 400 navvies. This body was reinforced by a detachment of Sappers and Miners to the number of about 1,500. These were followed by a regiment of infantry and a force of marines. Wheelbarrows were scarce, and the men were compelled to adopt the scheme of the engineers of the army of Xerxes, and, ranging themselves in line, passed lumps of clay from hand to hand. By great exertion a sufficient barrier was formed, and the district saved. On Sunday the Londoners went by thousands down to Plumstead, and the traffic was so great on the North Kent Railway that the last train did not return till after midnight. By road and river also immense numbers travelled down. Indeed, as the events of the last few years have plainly proved, the Londoners have become as greedy of 'sensations' as the citizens of New York, to the benefit of railway companies and penny newspapers, but to the loss of that character for dignified sobriety for which English people were once celebrated.

Londoners are peculiarly fortunate in the possession of a decided excitement at this dull period of the year. Professor Anderson, 'the Wizard of the North,' knows how to make an evening pass most agreeably, and even succeeds in amazing the visitors to St. James's Hall with one marvellous feat. If Miss Anderson relies entirely on her powers of memory for the accomplishment of her task, she certainly has cultivated that docile organ with great skill. To describe minutely, with an accuracy that is almost absurd, some twenty or thirty coins, rings, and similar articles, after one glance, is a considerable achievement; but to decipher inscriptions which are scarcely legible, to detect a flaw in the setting of a precious stone, and to do all this without any idea on the part of the audience that an opportunity of inspection has been afforded, produces in the mind of the spectator the satisfaction that he has been completely baffled. Her skill in spelling 'sesquipedalia verba' backwards is also amusing. But, whether justly or not, the Brothers Davenport insist on astonishing the British public more extensively than either Professor or Miss Anderson. The 'Professor' does not pretend to anything beyond what the known laws of nature permit. By what agency the Brothers Davenport accomplish their feats is not decided. Controversy is still active—

'adhuc sub judice lis est.'

The nature of the performance is, however, quickly told. A number of gentlemen of all shades and professions, men of letters, officers in the army, and artists, meet a quiet party consisting of the Brothers Davenport, Mr. Fay, and Mr. Ferguson. These four individuals are bound to their chairs by cords, the tightening of which is performed by a naval officer, the lights are extinguished, and thereupon from all parts of the room proceed the sounds of tambourine, guitar, trumpet, and bell, instruments which before had been placed on the table; the knees and heads of the audience are touched, a whisking of ropes is heard, and the cord which bound one of the Brothers Davenport is found on the return of light coiled round the neck of a spectator. Other feats are performed such as the disappearance of the coat of Mr. Davenport om the back of its wearer and its reappearance in the p of a spectator. Of course, to give to such performances the title of 'spiritual manifestations,' and to talk ysteriously of agencies unknown to ordinary mortals, ids a charming sublimity to the affair. Unfortunately ie Brothers Davenport have performed in other parts of ie globe, and it is affirmed that in Canada gentlemen ave been found who, repudiating all supernatural agenes, have yet rivalled in success the Brothers Davenport.

THE Metropolitan Medical Schools were opened on Saturday last, and the usual introductory lectures were delivered. The Dean of St. Thomas's Hospital, Dr. Clapton, made some able and pertinent remarks on the treatment f the army surgeons by the authorities. He said that he terms were so unsatisfactory that good men will not ccept them, and the authorities were at their wits' end o devise some means by which to secure indifferent men. There were plenty of good medical men willing to enter he service if the terms were such as gentlemen could ccede to. The Medical Department was, as it were, etween two enemies. Each was willing to grant what he other refused to give. The Horse Guards had no bjection to the Department being paid, but was most ealous of granting any increased rank; the Treasury ould be willing to see every doctor with the rank of a eneral provided he got no increase of pay; and so the oor doctor fell to the ground. Among the older surgeons n the army a great grievance was that they could never eel settled anywhere, and were never consulted as to here they would like to be ordered. There were no ppointments in retirement for the surgeons as there were or the other departments of the army. Then again there as the glaring grievance of an almost total denial of eave of absence. Lastly, there was a positive breach of aith on the part of the authorities in reference to the warrant of 1858 upon the points of seniority, precedence, hoice of quarters, presidency of boards of enquiry, allowances in the way of forage, &c. These concessions, which ooked well enough on paper, were found not to work, and o the Horse Guards cancelled them in practice. The ew generation would not submit to the dangers and iscipline of the army, with many grievances and no onours. The War Office relied on the idea that the profession was overstocked; but, in point of fact, whereas in 1851 the number of medical men under forty years of age was 11,105, yet in 1861 there were only 9,910, and that notwithstanding the increase in the population. The Dean, in the course of his address, mentioned the conduct of Mr. Chaffers, a former student of St. Thomas's Hospital, who, actuated by laudable motives, proceeded to the Southern States of America, in reference to whom the Dean quoted the following extract from the Memphis Appeal:—

We have heard frequent mention of this young surgeon, who will carry back to England a scar in the face made by a Federal sabre at Shelbyville, and many are the gratefully eloquent eulogiums upon his skill from those whom the fortune of war submitted to his knife. He is now acting chief-surgeon of Hume's cavalry division. Since his assignment to duty he has devoted himself to its discharge with an assiduity and untiring faithfulness which reflect the highest credit on him as a man, and with a skill which does honour to the ancient foundation which gave him his degree.

ON Michaelmas Day the liverymen of the City of London were convened in Guildhall to elect from among the members of the Court of Aldermen a magistrate to fill the office of Lord Mayor for the ensuing year. At noon the Lord Mayor, the Aldermen and Sheriffs, the Chamberlain of London, the Recorder, and all the officers of the Corporation went in state to the church of St. Lawrence to attend Divine service. After service the procession walked to Guildhall, and Mr. Beddome, the common crier, made proclamation for all persons who were not liverymen to depart from the hall on pain of imprisonment. On the withdrawal of the magistrates, the Common Serjeant announced the names of the aldermen who had not passed the chair, and who, having served the office of Sheriff, were eligible for the office of Lord Mayor. On a show of hands the choice of the livery was declared to have fallen on Mr. Warren Stormes Hale, alderman and tallow-chandler, and Mr. Benjamin Samuel Phillips, alderman and spectacle-maker. The Aldermen chose Mr. Warren Stormes Hale to be the new Lord Mayor.

IRELAND.

The statistics furnished by the Registrar-General on the agricultural condition of Ireland possess some interest. In cattle there is an increase of 113,078 over the return of 1863, the total being 3,257,309. Sheep have increased by 54,864 head, and number 3,363,068. In horses, for the production of which Ireland has earned a reputation above all other countries, there is an unfortunate decrease to the number of 18,617, the total number now being 564,361. Perhaps a worse feature in the condition of Ireland could not be found. In that country not only the cavalry regiments and the batteries of artillery found animals at moderate rates of marvellous quality, speed, and strength, but any man who desired a horse of unrivalled excellence in the hunting-field looked to Ireland to supply his wants. In them, indeed, there seems to reside an innate love of jumping, a sagacity that never fails in the most awkward situations which the stiffest line of country can create, a pluck absolutely indomitable, a peculiar hardiness of limb and constitution. Then, again, like the fiery and impulsive men who rear him, he has a temper which rebels at the slightest injury, but which knows how to display itself in a noble ardour for victory on the turf, or fame in the chase. The marked decrease, however, shown by the return bears out the truth of the alarm expressed some months ago by Irish breeders; and the commentary on the present condition of horse-rearing which emanated from the sporting Chief Secretary and from Admiral Rous pointed to a gradual drafting of the finest sires, and, what is worse, of the best brood mares, into the haras of the Continent. In pigs, those wonderful animals, whom the Irishman honours as the Icelander does the reindeer, for indeed 'the pig pays the rent,' there is also a decrease of 11,209 since last year, the total number being 1,056,245. Within a period of five years there has been a falling off to the extent of 5,000,000*l.* in the total value of live stock. There is, further, a diminution in the quantity of land in cropping to the extent of 122,437 acres. There were 279,863 acres of wheat, and 1,869,918 acres of oats; of green crops there were 1,475,535 acres. In this connection mention may be made of a speech delivered at the dinner of the Portland Agricultural Society's Show held last week. After some remarks on the necessity of cultivating flax as the rent-paying crop of the country in the north of Ireland, a practical farmer proceeded thus:—'People cried out for "Justice to Ireland," but they should try for justice to themselves, and every Irishman should do something towards developing the industrial resources of the country. Emigration was a stern reality, and he regretted to see so many stalwart fellows passing away from the country. He maintained that the poor people of this country had quite as great trials to undergo as had been encounted by the coloured race of Africa in America What was to stem emigration? If emigration was to be restrained, it could only be by finding employment for all who could work. There was plenty of work to be done in the country; and, until tillage was properly carried out and set about, and the population became what it ought to be, the country would be looked down upon as the outcast of Europe, instead of being, as it ought to be, its garden, and second to none in the world.'

A barrister resident in the city of Dublin has distinguished himself by shooting a bailiff. The latter officer had served a distress on the barrister, whose name was O'Dell, and had also executed the warrant. O'Dell permitted him to perform his duty unmolested, and did not even show any vexation at the occurrence. As the bailiff was leaving the house at even-tide after finishing his task, O'Dell rushed out, and shot at him with a pistol. The ball instantly took effect, and the bailiff fell dead. The barrister thereupon walked to the station-house and gave himself up to the police. He has been committed for trial.

Lord Wodehouse has been appointed Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland in the room of the Earl of Carlisle. In some quarters a wish had found expression that Dublin Castle should be occupied by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, who was considered to be the fit representative of Her Majesty in the kingdom of Ireland. It is certain that, had the office been accepted by the Prince of Wales, the loyal feeling which his presence would have evoked from that noble and warm-hearted people would have amply recompensed the Prince for undertaking the duties of the viceroyalty. Lord Wodehouse was Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs under Lord Aberdeen and Lord Palmerston. He went as Ambassador to St. Petersburg in 1858. He also was Special Commissioner to Denmark. The appointment of his Lordship to the viceroyalty renders vacant the Under-Secretaryship of the Colonies. Inasmuch as there are already four under-secretaries in the House of Commons, that office must be conferred on a Peer.

The sporting community have met with a disappointment, and the respectable world with a signal piece of good fortune. The fight between Mace and Coburn has not come off. There seem to have been two obstacles—first, the activity of the police; second, the difficulty of choosing a referee. It is said that the chosen spot was to be between Goold's Cross Station and Cashel, and it is even affirmed that Coburn appeared in the ring to claim the stakes, Mace being there represented by a protesting agent. Coburn seems to have achieved this portion of his task under considerable difficulties, and to have eluded with some skill the vigilance of the police. Even if the authorities had not interfered, the inability of the parties to agree upon a referee would probably have prevented the fight. It is thought that the money will be returned.

THE CONTINENT.

FRANCE.

The marriage of M. Emile Erlanger, the eminent banker of Paris and Frankfort, with the daughter of the Hon. John Slidell, Commissioner accredited by the Confederate Government to the Court of the Tuileries, took place on the morning of the 5th inst. M. Mocquard, the Emperor's private secretary, acted as best man for the bridegroom; the Marquis de Beaumont and the Hon. James Mason acted as friends of the lady. A distinguished company were present at the ceremony, including some of the best known diplomatists in Paris, as well as a number of Confederate officers in full uniform.

The opinion of which we spoke on the first suggestion of the Empress's visit to the baths of Schwalbach, that it would eventually bring about a meeting between the sovereigns of France, Russia, and Prussia, has acquired fresh force during the past week. The Emperor, they say, is to run down to the country to bring back his Imperial spouse, and the long talked-of interview will take place. The Empress was to have paid a visit to Prince Metternich at his palace of Johannisberg, but for some reasons unknown it has not occurred. Her mode of life at Schwalbach seems to have been so planned as to be contrasted as strongly as possible with the rigid ceremonial of the Tuileries. She was enabled to receive private sociable visits from the Emperor of Russia, the Archduke Stephen of Austria, and the Duke of Nassau. It is related that in one of her walks she encountered Field-Marshal Count Wrangel, the late commander-in-chief in Denmark, and after a short conversation engaged him to dine with her at her villa. On his retiring, Her Majesty exchanged photographs with him. Her Majesty left Schwalbach unexpectedly on the morning of the 3rd inst., and went with her suite to Ludwigshafen; thence she proceeded on the 4th inst. to Baden, where she was received by the Grand Duke of Baden and the King of Prussia.

M. Rouland, lately Minister President of the Council of State, has been superseded in that office by M. Vuitry. He has received in exchange the dignity of senator and Governor of the Bank of France. This appointment has never before been filled by any but a distinguished financier. M. Rouland is sixty years of age, and has never been distinguished during the course of his life as a professional or even amateur man of business. Under these circumstances, we can only admire the benevolence of the Imperial hand, determined to requite the services of a willing if not very successful Minister, even at the expense of the interests of the country.

The Société Hippophage has held one of its peculiar dinners at a restaurant in Lyons. It was attended by a goodly number of professional men, lawyers, veterinary surgeons, and physicians; the latter class, however, fought rather shy of the banquet. The contents of the carte are dilated upon with much gusto by the journals; we need only commemorate the appearance of the following dishes. Clear soup (made of horse), piece of boiled horse, cheval à la mode, beignets de cervelle de cheval, horse-tongue, foie de cheval à l'italienne, horse-steaks, and horse-pie. All these dishes were declared to be excellent. In justice to the cook it is added that the sauces used therewith were of the most marvellous goodness. After dinner the president explained that the subject of their banquet had been a horse of five years old, killed in consequence of an accident which rendered him useless. He disposed of the often-repeated objection against the costliness of such meat for general purposes, by referring to certain statistics, which showed that there were yearly 600,000 horses between seven and eight years old, which might be given up to the cook without injury to the agricultural or military interest. Moreover, could anything be more humane and at the same time more elevating to the sentiments of mankind, than to put to an easy death, and then consecrate to our own nourishment, the bodies of our old and faithful servants? Had the worthy gentleman only been acquainted with that famous New Zealander who demonstrated his filial affection for his grandfather by refusing to enshrine him in any other tomb than his own stomach, his arguments would have been both amplified and savourily illustrated.

A court-martial was lately held at Paris upon one Eugène Housset, of the 30th regiment of the line, for a very remarkable series of offences. His life appears to have been a sort of grotesque parody on that of the Misérable so pathetically described by M. Victor Hugo, with the only exception that he has evidently only himself to thank for his continual falls. Up to his twentieth year he was generally in prison; at that age he enlisted, but before many months were out he contrived to be admitted into hospital; the authorities there were glad to get rid of him, and sent him home for six months to recover his health. The bosom of his family did not long present any attractions to him; he picked up a worthy colleague, got rid of his uniform, and 'loafed' away an easy life, subsisting chiefly upon the community. When he was tired of this, he again went into a hospital; but not finding it sufficiently comfortable, he changed his quarters to another similar establishment. From this, however, he was soon summarily ejected. The cruelty of the action was such as to sour Eugène's temper; he determined to take leave of the world and go into a cloister. He knocked at the door of the Capuchin Friars at Caen, was admitted, and soon donned the robe and cowl under the name of Brother Egidius. His piety was at first exemplary; but the good brothers were distressed to see his holy sentiments fade away like a dissolving view, and leave in their place nothing but a monstrous capacity for eating. The uncongeniality of his temperament doubtless became apparent to himself; for the next step which he takes is out of the monastery again into the wide, wide world, with his wallet filled with divers souvenirs of his late brethren; from one he had borrowed a razor, from another shoes, from a third socks; in short, he had spoiled the Egyptians, as they found out very soon after his departure. Their losses were too great to be borne with Christian patience; application was made to the authorities, and Brother Egidius was arrested. By this time his military and civil offences had accumulated to such an extent, that he was easily recognised as a deserter and thief, and thereupon handed over to the military authorities. When called upon for a defence, he did not attempt to make any; he accounted for his divers changes by saying that he was tired of his former life. The Capuchin brethren were very loth to accuse him, but they were obliged to confess that the disappearance of their property coincided exactly in point of time with the departure of Brother Egidius; he was accordingly condemned to three years' imprisonment. Where but in France could we expect to meet with a rogue so philosophical, or a philosopher of such easy morals?

ITALY.

The Franco-Italian Convention still continues to occupy the attention of the political world. As, according to Mr. Shandy, the history of a man begins some few months before his birth, so the history of a treaty should be commenced some little way before its completion. First it is asked who were the instigators of this sudden and well-concealed move? The Union answers that they were Prince Napoleon and M. Rouher. The Prince is of course deeply interested in Italian politics in right of his marriage; M. Rouher is his intimate friend. Next men enquire what notice the other Powers have taken of it. England, it is said, was cognisant of it; Prince Metternich, the Austrian Ambassador, knew nothing whatever about it, and has, they say, fallen under the displeasure of his Government for his carelessness. It was rumoured that the Austrian Government had formally protested against the Convention, as an infraction of the treaty of Villafranca; and the rumour still obtains to a certain extent, in spite of official contradiction. Another statement is derived from German sources, that the Emperor of the French offered, before the close of the negotiations, to admit the Austrian Ambassador to a share in them, and that his offer was rejected. No doubt some explanations are due and will yet be given to Austria, as the terms of the Convention occupy the same political ground as the treaty of Zurich and Villafranca. The articles of the Convention have been the subject of most vigorous discussion in the European press; the best exposition which we have of them is probably that contained in the despatch of M. Drouyn de Lhuys to the Comte de Sartiges, French Ambassador at Rome. The sum of that despatch may be thus stated: 'Whereas the Italian Government appear at length to be capable of keeping the Mazzinist party in order; whereas they have given up their Quixotic cry of "Rome for our capital," as testified by their now transferring the seat of their Government from Turin to Florence; whereas, under these circumstances, the Pope, being untroubled from without, will be able to keep his own subjects quiet by the help of a moderate army: now, therefore, the troops of France may prepare to evacuate Rome.' Upon this some journals have argued that, if this be true, France has betrayed the Italians, and, under pretence of relieving them from her intervention, has exercised, by the terms of this very treaty, a most mischievous interference. Others consider the premises to be untrue; they do not believe that the Italians will give up the idea of Rome for a metropolis, or that the Pope will be able to keep his subjects in order, and consequently conclude that France has betrayed the temporal power of the Pope. Others again, seeing the dilemma in which the French Government appears to be placed, believe that the treaty means absolutely nothing, that the conditions of the evacuation cannot and will not be fulfilled, and, consequently, that the French troops will not leave Rome. Probably the latter opinion is so far right, that it is not intended to act immediately upon this Convention, but that it will prove a stepping-stone, by which concessions from one or the other party or both may the more easily be obtained, and so an advance may be made towards a practical solution of the difficulty.

There is every reason to believe that the Convention is not yet actually concluded. The Duc de Grammont, in communicating the general nature of it to Herr von Rechberg, excused himself from giving him a copy of the terms on the ground that it could not be considered to be completed until accepted by the Italian Chambers and by the Pope. It is said that there is a secret article attached to the Convention, declaring that the move from Florence to Turin had been contemplated by the Italian Government before any idea of this treaty was conceived, and totally independent of it; and that consequently, as above stated, no evacuation of Rome by the French troops could take place until the transfer of the seat of government had been effected.

After the first unfortunate outbreaks at Turin, quiet has been permanently restored in that city. The municipality and the United Committees of Turin have published addresses to the Government in which they point out that the citizens of Turin are willing to surrender the privileges of a metropolis to Rome, but to Rome only; and that they consider the transfer to Florence as an encroachment on their rights, and the surrender of a vital principle. The captain of the company of carbineers who fired upon the people on the 21st ult., has published a letter in which he positively declares that he never gave any order to fire, and that the explosion which was mistaken by his men for a signal was merely the result of accident. A subscription has been set on foot in aid of the sufferers in the outbreak. Meetings have been held at Naples and Milan, approving of the policy of the Franco-Italian Convention; in both cases the speakers insisted upon the fact that the new capital, wherever it should be, would only be provisional, and still looked upon Rome as their ultimate object. The king has sent an orderly officer to the prefect of Milan to congratulate that city on its dignified and expressive attitude, and to assure him that the Convention should be fully carried out; the latter assurance alludes to the recent assertion that the evacuation of Rome will be made to depend upon the transfer of the capital from Turin to Florence. The Gazetta del Popolo of Florence contains a queer letter addressed by the city of Florence to the city of Turin, in which the personification of the two cities into ladies is almost extravagantly carried out. It says: 'Turin, my dear sister, you perchance imagine that I cannot control my pleasure at being made the provisional capital. If this be a service which I ought to render to my country, why should I not be glad? I shall preserve the pledge with that faith and that love of which you, my courageous and noble sister, have given me an example for so many years.' It goes on to sympathise with Turin in her affliction, and to assure her that the royal family, which she had loved for so many centuries, shall be as well cared for by Florence. The Roman National Committee express unbounded satisfaction at the treaty, and remind their disciples that in two years' time they will be allowed to cast off the galling yoke of their present Government, to give the Church the liberty which she craves, and to annex themselves to Italy. Cardinal Antonelli appears to be quite at his ease on the subject, and declines at present to abate one jot of the Papal pretensions. A demonstration was made in Rome on the evening of the 29th ult., but it was speedily checked by the French police, who effected several arrests. One of the latest acts of the Pontifical Government, and one which is not likely to lessen in any way the bitterness of their opponents, has been the condemnation of six men to imprisonment for periods varying from the term of their lives to six years, on the charge of political conspiracy.

General della Marmora has succeeded in forming a Ministry, not without the powerful aid of Baron Ricasoli, who has given him all his support and influence. The following is a summary of the programme published by the Ministry:—

The new Ministry, in assuming the reins of government, finds it necessary to make known its intentions respecting the political question.

The Ministry accepts the Convention stipulated with France, and at the same time the condition of the transfer of the capital to another locality. It will submit a bill on this subject to Parliament, and will also propose gradual measures of a nature to lighten the loss which will be sustained by Turin without postponing the period fixed by the Convention for the evacuation of Pontifical territory by the French troops.

The Ministry further expresses confidence in the patriotic devotion of the city of Turin and the other Italian populations.

DENMARK.

The betrothal of the Grand-Duke Nicholas of Russia, the Czarewitch, to the Princess Dagmar of Denmark, took place on the 28th ult. His Imperial Highness will remain another week in Denmark to receive the congratulations of the Royal Family.

Prince Frederick Charles of Prussia, the commander-in-chief of the allied forces, will remain in Slesvig during the winter; his headquarters have accordingly been transferred to the Palace of Glücksburg. Two frigates and a squadron of gunboats will be stationed at Flensburg during the winter.

The Gazette of Aarhuus has a significant announcement, which we shall explain below. It states that, as the receipts from Jutland are not sufficient to pay the expenses of the troops, all merchandise coming from the islands of Denmark will for the future be subject to customs dues. At the same time all the Danish journals save two, the Berlingske and the Flyveposten Illustré, are interdicted in Jutland.

GERMANY.

The Conference of Vienna still drags its slow length along without making much perceptible progress. The question of the boundary line between Slesvig and Jutland is still unsettled. Captain Scholler, of the Danish service, has returned to Copenhagen from Vienna, to discuss that point with the Danish Minister for Slesvig. The point in dispute is the small town of Christiansfeld in Slesvig, which is claimed by Denmark. It was originally agreed that a portion of the public property of Denmark should be given up to the Duchies, and the Danes have accordingly proposed to submit to arbitration the question of the amount to be liquidated; this proposal has been declared by the Germans to be inadmissible, and a definite answer on this point was required from Denmark. The Danish Plenipotentiaries were therefore obliged again to send to Copenhagen for further instructions. They hoped to be able to give their reply on the 4th or 5th inst. The repeated delays caused by the exorbitance of the German demands, and the unwillingness of Denmark to concede them, have stirred up the bile of the conquerors. As one of their journals expresses it, they have been obliged to employ every means to force Denmark into a speedy peace, especially that of putting the screw upon the unfortunate province of Jutland. This is the meaning of the announcement mentioned above of a new impost upon Danish merchandise.

The Neue Freie Presse of Vienna publishes an interesting article on the visit of Lord Clarendon to that city. According to the writer of it, his Lordship's mission was almost entirely unconnected with the Dano-German matter, but related more especially to the new aspect of affairs consequent upon the Franco-Italian Convention. He wished to bring before the eyes of the Austrian Government the advantage which they may gain by a departure from their present principles, a recognition of Italy, and a reunion with the great Powers of the West. He especially deprecated all thought of a coalition of Austria, Russia, and Prussia. Such was the general object of Lord Clarendon's mission to Count von Rechberg, and it receives the hearty support of the writer of the article.

The movements of European diplomatists are watched with the same sort of anxiety as, in a smaller sphere, animates the chess-player watching the intricate motions of his antagonist's pieces. Lord Clarendon and Herr von Beust have left Vienna. Herr von Bismarck joined the King of Prussia at Baden-Baden, and was reported to be about to return in his company; but it was whispered that the Prussian statesman will find that a course of sea-bathing at Biarritz in France will be of benefit to him.

SWEDEN.

The visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Stockholm has elicited from another and an equally admirable nation compliments and ovations of which every Englishman may rightly feel proud. Sweden was in a better situation for receiving a royal visitor with a happy face than Denmark, weighed down with political cares and national humiliation. The opportunities also in Stockholm for holding a splendid festival are greater than those of Denmark, and they appear to have been taxed to their utmost, and with complete success, to do honour to the illustrious strangers. The Prince and Princess left Copenhagen on the 23rd ultimo in the royal yacht Osborne; unfortunately, the bad weather which the Prince has so often met with in England pursued him on the sea, and he suffered all the miseries of a thoroughly bad passage. On the 26th ult. they at length reached Stockholm, and were received by the King's brother, Admiral Prince Oscar, who steamed out in the yacht Valkyrian to meet them. An unfortunate accident happened as his boat was nearing the Osborne; one of the crew of the latter vessel, who was preparing to receive the visitors, slipped into the sea and was drowned, in spite of all attempts to save him. This incident deeply affected the Princess who retired to her cabin; but the Prince remained on deck and received Prince Oscar. At 7.30 P.M. the party landed, and were received by the governor of Stockholm and other officials. They were conducted to the carriages which had been long expecting them, amidst the hurrahs of the whole population of the city. The magnificent Norwegian Guards formed their guard of honour; and the Charles the Twelfth Guards, dressed in the costume of the monarch whose name they bear, acted as their mounted escort. Their apartments were in the royal palace had been redecorated for the occasion on a scale of nificence of which we in modern England have no smallest idea. The first act of the Prince on arrivin to telegraph to the Queens of England and Denmark they had arrived safely after a long, cold, and unple voyage. In spite of their fatigues, the whole party ready after dinner to go to the opera, where the Ki Sweden presented his visitors to his people. They greeted by tremendous cheers, again and again repe On the next day the whole party paid a visit to the va points of interest in Stockholm, a town which has servedly received the encomia of all travellers for it ceeding beauty. It was suggested that the Prin Wales should have one day's elk-shooting before he l this country, but as he was to return to Denmark b 2nd instant, it was improbable that time could be f for it.

A dispute has recently arisen between the Swedish Danish press upon the question whether Count Mar ström, the Swedish Foreign Minister, did or did not Denmark to believe she would be assisted by Swede the recent war, and afterwards leave her to bear the b of the struggle single-handed. With reference to subject Mr. Hall, the former President of the Counc Denmark, has published a statement of his correspond with Count Hamilton, Swedish minister in Copenha in 1863, which led him to believe that active assist was to be expected of Sweden. The Swedish Gov ment has thereupon published a despatch from von Manderström, the Swedish Foreign Secretary, d October 6, 1863, which proves that the Swedish cal had always declared its assistance to be conditional or approval of their Chambers of Deputies, and that were never blind to the disadvantages which might from an alliance such as was proposed. One sentenc the despatch distinctly reserves to the Swedish Gov ment the power of drawing back from their engagem on the occurrence of certain events, the nature of w is not mentioned.

A terrible catastrophe has lately happened at Gen One of the large houses on the quay has been burnt to ground, and thirteen of the persons living in it burn death.

BELGIUM.

One of the most remarkable features of the Festiv Independence lately celebrated at Brussels was the sence of a body of English volunteers. They were recei at the station by the chasseurs éclaireurs of Brussel body resembling somewhat one of our own volun corps. They were warmly greeted on their arrival, marched to the Salle d'Orient, where a handsome lu awaited them. After lunch the healths of King Leo and Queen Victoria were drunk with rapturous appla and finally the toast of 'The Ladies,' in compliment our English fashion. It was responded to by the wife one of the English volunteer officers present in a grac manner. Many of the volunteers had the honour o presentation to the King and the Duc de Brabant.

SPAIN.

Queen Christina, the well-known Queen Dowager of Sp who has for a long time been residing in Rome in exile f her country, returned to Madrid on the 30th ult. Majesty was well received by the crowds on her arri and the Madrid journals speak of this event in favoura terms.

The Clamor Publico of the 29th ult. strongly insis on the policy of terminating the war in Santo Domin preserving only the towns of Santo Domingo, Samor and Puerto Plata, and abandoning the rest of the isla This advice may perhaps be modified by the news of 1st inst., according to which the Spanish general in Sa Domingo completely defeated the insurgents in an gagement on August 31, and killed their general, M tinez.

Admiral Pinzon, the commander of the Spanish sq dron in the Pacific, and the perpetrator of the outrage seizure of the Chincha Islands, is to be superseded Admiral Prijera, a man of more moderate and conciliat views. This step is greeted with great satisfaction those who deprecate a needless war between Spain the South American republics.

TUNIS.

The squadrons of the great Powers which have some time been stationed at Tunis have now taken their parture. The loyal garrison of Soussa attempted to make its way out in a sortie, but was repulsed. The insurgents are bringing up all the arms they can find.

MEXICO.

On the 21st ultimo Admiral Bousse appeared at the mouth of the Rio Bravo in the Gulf of Mexico with a squadron of four frigates. Instantly landing a body of 400 men, he made a vigorous attack on the town of Bagdad, drove out the Juarist authorities, and hoisted the French and Mexican flags side by side. From other quarters the accounts are equally favourable; Juarez is hard pressed, but still remains at the head of a few thousand men; he has shipped off his wife and family to New Orleans. The Emperor of Mexico has been making a tour through the country; he has everywhere been received with enthusiasm; his visit will produce lasting effects. The Empress has remained at Mexico, where she has given some general audiences. These were attended by some of the very lowest of her subjects; even Indians were admitted to her presence.

The Mexican Government has forwarded 2,500,000 francs to France in execution of the Convention of Miramar.

The profitable trade which the Yankee shippers have been driving in supplying arms and munitions of war to the army of Juarez—munitions not seldom purchased from a 'cute quartermaster of the Federal army—has been cut short by the energetic remonstrances of the French. One ship, which had gone off from under the very nose of the Custom House, was brought back on their requisition, and its cargo confiscated. Very probably it returned into the possession of the very persons who had before so profitably sold it.

JAPAN.

By advices from this country we learn that two English ships have been fired upon by a battery belonging to the Prince Chosien. The cholera is severe at Shanghai.

THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

We must really suggest that at the next Congress an article should be passed forbidding any countries to civilise themselves, or frame for themselves constitutions, during the next fifty years at least. Without some such wholesome restraint, the foreign news will utterly exceed the limits of every reasonable newspaper, and we shall be driven by the very excess of knowledge into ignorance of what half the world is doing. Here is the King of the Sandwich Islands delivering a speech to his Convention, of which all we need say is, that we wish we could hear a few so much to the purpose in England. In the course of it he proposes to effect, with the assistance of his Upper and Lower House, various constitutional changes of importance. He would make the marriages of the royal family matters of policy; he would erase the clause providing for the alienation of the kingdom—as a point of abstract policy the latter change seems unquestionably desirable, but practically we doubt its importance. Would the kingdom of the Sandwich Islands find a purchaser in the European market? He next proposes to take away the power possessed by an officer called Kuhina Nui of controlling absolutely the acts of a body of which he himself is a member, and in which he has a vote. Then he observes that 'the protracted sittings of the Legislature have been caused by the absence of all direct intercourse between the House of Representatives and the Executive.' This he would obviate by admitting into the House some members of the Cabinet—a lesson which gentlemen at Washington might learn with advantage; he suggests that the representation of the people should be regulated according to population by districts, and finally hopes that they will establish a property qualification for the House of Representatives. Such are the discussions of the Sandwich Islands while Europe is gloomy with suppressed war, and America is writhing in fire and blood.

A Swiss Circular.—The Federal Government of Switzerland has issued the following circular, dated September 29, cautioning against emigration to the belligerent States of North America:—'Many concurrent and well-grounded reports reach us from North America, conveying a very earnest and urgent warning against emigration to that country under present circumstances. The course of the war, with its changeful history, has naturally limited the chances of obtaining a livelihood, and it is consequently most difficult to procure and to maintain an adequate means of existence in that country. The emigrants who are wanting either in influence or in adequate funds often find themselves in a most critical position, which leaves them no other choice than that of entering the army. Amongst them, sad to say, are to be found Swiss, the inability of whose friends to render them assistance, and whose ignorance both of the language and the manners of the country, are taken advantage of by unprincipled men to effect their enrolment and thus lead them to a hopeless and lamentable fate. This warning against the selection of North America by the emigrant as his destination may also be addressed to those whose minds are made up for military service. To these we would recommend great consideration, as it often happens that foreigners who have enlisted are deprived of the greater portion of their bounty by agents, who use every means in their power to defraud young and inexperienced men of the miserable price paid them for the surrender of their liberty. Many cases may be cited which tend to show the justness of this warning in both points of view, more especially as the authorities, however willing they may be, are not always able to afford immediate and adequate help to those who return to claim their assistance.'

Republican Policy.—The Boston Courier says:—'Two-thirds of the United States Senate are Republicans, and, if M'Clellan should be elected, will, it is most probable, act as a check on the further prosecution of the war, unless it be carried on in the Abolition interest. In fact, we are inclined to believe that they will oppose it in any way as a matter of party policy, and it is not at all unlikely that they will sooner favour a recognition of the independence of the Southern Confederacy than a restoration of the Union, by which they would be placed in a hopeless minority.'

LITERARY NOTES.*

Time was when John Henry Newman was one of the chiefest ornaments and most shining lights of the Church of England. He was one of the most distinguished of a class of men whose existence and influence is her peculiar characteristic—who are at once thoroughly devout priests and thoroughbred gentlemen, whose honour is as unquestioned as their piety, and whose scholarship is not the stumblingblock but the mainstay of their faith and that of others. To this class of men, by no means rare among her clergy, the Church owes that strong hold on the most cultivated and enlightened classes of society which is so distinctive of England, and has conduced so greatly to her happiness and stability. Dr. Newman was a great man in the Church—a distinguished divine, a powerful preacher, the acknowledged leader of an influential party. He held a living which, for his peculiar tastes and character, had greater charms than any other could have had, St. Mary's, Oxford, which made him one of the principal religious teachers of the University, and enabled him in no small degree to direct the minds of those who were studying for the priesthood, and influence the future views of the Anglican clergy. In 1843 he resigned all these things; and two years afterwards he was received into the Roman Catholic Church. In his new communion he holds a comparatively undistinguished position. It is only of late that he has been appointed rector of a Catholic University; till then he was no more than the chief of an 'Oratory' containing some half-dozen priests in the very unpleasant town of Birmingham. The most distinguished of English converts has not even received a Roman Catholic bishopric; while, had he remained in the Anglican communion, he could hardly have failed by this time to have taken his seat on the Episcopal bench in the House of Lords. In a worldly point of view, he has given up much and gained little; has gone through much trouble and obloquy to be less than he was twenty years ago. A study of the work 'Apologia pro Vitâ suâ' removes all doubt as to Dr. Newman's perfect candour and spotless loyalty. But the work will not further the interests of Catholicism. The path by which Dr. Newman arrived at Rome is one which few will follow; and most readers will be disposed to think that the strength and soundness of the author's judgment fell very far short of the brilliancy of his intellect and the purity of his heart. His logic is too fine-drawn to convince even where it may puzzle; and his experiences, though they may teach antagonistic churches a little more mutual charity, hardly show any cause or means to soften their antagonism. The book, therefore, may be safely recommended to all but the very young and fanciful. It is admirably written, and most charming to read; it breathes as deep a spirit of toleration as a hatred of latitudinarianism; and it teaches a lesson in charity without threatening a single point of faith. Indeed, it was never meant to proselytise—a task evidently uncongenial to the author's mind. It is personal, not controversial; a spiritual biography, not a theological treatise.

'Archbishop Whately's Memoirs,' the work, we believe, of an Irish Roman Catholic, are very readable, but very bad. Their tone is flippant and offensive; the information they contain ill-digested and incomplete; and the picture they present of the prelate most unfair and repulsive. For his sins and shortcomings assuredly was the Archbishop of Dublin doomed to fall after his death into the clutches of this unscrupulous bookmaker; to be made responsible for arrant nonsense and impertinent absurdities; to figure as the hero of foolish and undignified quarrels; to have indecent jests and brutal outrages fathered upon him, and to be held up to the world as a man not wanting indeed in intellect or in virtues, but of the coarsest manners and the most overbearing temper, unclerical in his speech, unchristian in spirit, ungentlemanly in his conduct—a boor, a bully, and a brute. This portraiture is due as much to the author's bad taste as to his malice. He really wished to make Dr. Whately seem as respectable as it would befit a heretic pastor to be; for Dr. Whately had earned his goodwill by discouraging, to the best of his abilities, all attacks on the Roman Catholic religion, censuring invective, reproving uncharitable imputations, and turning the cold shoulder to controversy. But he did not know how to paint an English gentleman; and he has turned brusquerie into brutality, wit into insolence, and negligence into studied rudeness. To judge by these memoirs, we should suppose that the Archbishop was always in hot water, and generally by his own fault; that he snubbed inferiors, insulted colleagues, and set his superiors at defiance; that he was on much better terms with the Roman Catholics than with his own clergy; and that his conversation was often of a kind wholly unfit for the lips of a clergyman or the ears of a woman. Of Whately's public usefulness we learn little or nothing from this; of his private charities we find some incidental notices; concerning his services to the cause of intellectual freedom and religious enlightenment, only a scattered hint here and there. We do trust that the memory of one of the greatest minds which the Church of England has produced during this century may be rescued from the dishonour of so unworthy a record, and fittingly embalmed by some one whom personal character and intimate knowledge have qualified for that office.

Mr. Masheder's 'Dissent and Democracy' is a work well calculated to promote the purpose which its author has at heart; to awaken the friends of the English Church to a livelier sense of the dangers by which she is threatened, and make them distinctly aware of the strength of her enemies, the policy they are pursuing, and the ends they have avowed. It imputes nothing that it does not prove; and exhumes from the archives of the enemy a full explanation of the real meaning and object of their measures. It contains a history of the war waged by the great union of so-called political dissenters upon the Established Church, and an account of the changes in their strategy. Before the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts the Dissenters asked for no more than complete liberty of worship and relief from civil disabilities imposed on religious dissidence. After the Reform Bill had become law, they organised an open warfare against her existence, proposing openly to rob her not only of her public privileges but of her own corporate property. They fought many a battle on this open ground, and were beaten by majorities increasing as the Conservative spirit of the country recovered from its prostration. Then they gradually changed their tactics. The Anti-State Church Association took the name of the 'Society for the Liberation of Religion from State Patronage and Control' (Liberation Society)—a title which fails to express its principal object, that of delivering the Church from the burden of her endowments, no portion of which are in any sense derived from the State. Since 1850 the policy of this Society, which directs the action of the political Dissenters, has been to attack one by one the outposts of the Church, with the aid of allies who pretend that they desire to surrender the outposts for the better security of the citadel. The avowal of the Liberation Society that it is seeking to undermine the citadel itself—that its object is not to abolish churchrates for the sake of conciliation, or to claim churchyards in the name of peace, but that it aims at the overthrow of the Church through these ends, at the spoliation of her property and the desecration of her edifices—as a test of the real character of the pretended friends of the Church who vote perseveringly at the bidding of her mortal enemies. By bringing its avowal on the one hand and the declarations of thoughtful statesmen as to the justice of churchrates and the nature of tithe on the other clearly before the public; by proving that the spoilers of the Church are robbers of the poor, and that the end of the anti-churchrate party is the complete spoliation of the Church, Mr. Masheder contributes his part to rally round the standard of the Establishment all those who respect the sacredness of property, the rights of the poor, and the institutions of their country.

The Danish war has given rise to a good number of books. M. Gallenga, the well-known correspondent of the Times, and ex-deputy of Piedmont, has written one very interesting work, consisting mainly, however, of the letters already published in the newspaper by which he was retained, and containing more description than information. It is a pen-and-ink sketchbook, rather than a history or a work of travel; and perhaps for that reason is more readable than any book of a political character that we have seen for some time past. 'The Invasion of Denmark' is as neutral in tone as the Times could render it. Mr. E. Dicey's 'Schleswig-Holstein War' carries a German falsehood in its very title. There never was any Slesvig-Holstein, except in the minds of unscrupulous German professors, and the enthusiastic songs of beery students; and certainly the war was in no sense a Slesvig-Holstein war. Slesvig was a Danish duchy, into which German immigrants had gradually intruded, occupying the land and eating out the native Danes in the southern part. Holstein was a German duchy, which the King of Denmark happened to hold by the same right by which William III. is King of Prussia, or Louis II. of Bavaria; and the war was an attempt on the part of Prussia and Austria to outbid each other for German popularity, by stealing for Germany a good harbour on the Baltic. But the political interest of the matter is gone by. What deserves notice is, that all who have had the opportunity of knowing the Danes speak of them with enthusiastic and affectionate admiration. As brave as Englishmen, as patient as Russians, as industrious as Scotchmen, they combine all the enlightened intelligence of the most highly civilised with all the Christian virtues of the simplest people. Hospitable without stint, gentle beyond measure, most courteous in their manners, most irreproachable in morals, of quiet and simple tastes, of generous and ingenuous temper, no people on earth extend so kindly a welcome to the stranger, or win so large a share of his regard. That they are slow to an extreme; slow in movement, slow in learning, slow in taking up the improvements of the age, slow in anger, slow in battle, still slower in retreat—this is the one complaint which every one repeats in every form, the one fault which proves to their delighted visitors that the Danes are human. For the rest, the character of the people, their scanty numbers on a fertile soil (for they are slow in increase as in everything else), their industry, and in the summer months the charms of their climate, seem to render Denmark, in all essential respects, one of the happiest countries of the Old World; a country where there is no severe pressure on the means of subsistence—the general curse of Europe; no passionate, wearing race after riches—the curse of America; where few are poor enough to want or rich enough to idle, and where wealth is diffused very evenly among a contented, happy, and brotherly people. That such a country should be weak enough to be the prey of nations in every way so inferior as Austrians and Prussians, is one of the most painful phenomena of the political world; that it should be left to its fate by kinsmen who could have saved it by a word, had that word been conveyed by the fleets that lay idly at anchor, is one of the most disgraceful and inexplicable scandals that history will record.

Mr. Winthrop Mackworth Praed was one of the most charming minor poets of the age of which Scott, and Byron, and Shelley were the great luminaries. Younger than these, he survived the last of them a few years. His poems are all very graceful; light and airy in their tone, joyous in their spirit, even when tragic or grotesque in their subject; and breathe an air of cheerful good sense and unaffected good humour which contrast strangely with the melancholy mysticism of one of his contemporaries, and the gloomy, half-affected misanthropy which pervaded the poems if not the life of another. Perhaps Praed might have attained higher rank as a poet but for the political aspirations which diverted his energies into another channel, and the early death which cut short a very useful and unusually happy life. He had great facility in versification; and this perhaps led him into that careless irregularity which, without degenerating into slovenliness, prevents his poems from receiving all the meed which is their due. The best and longest of them are simply legends or romances of a mythical kind, told in a lively vein; sometimes allegorical, sometimes moral, sometimes simply fantastic, but all amusing, and generally interspersed here and there with allusions, comparisons, or metaphors drawn from daily life, or common sarcastic saws, which irresistibly provoke a laugh at the most unforeseen moment. Thus a haunted pool is described, in the midst of one of the least humorous and most earnest of these tales—and, in a better known stanza,

The water was as dark and rank as ever a company pumped:

I am alone,
No comrade shares my beaker;
Some lie beneath the churchyard stone,
And some before the Speaker.

Most of the minor poems are vers de société: the very best of such, no doubt, but still written for albums and annuals, and not bringing forth the powers of the poet. But in these, as in all his writings, it is impossible not to discern the heart of a man who could not but be loved, and the mind of one who well deserved the general admiration he received. We are sorry to miss from this collection the first of Praed's poems that ever fell into our hands, and to gather from some ambiguous words in the preface that others also are wanting.

Novels are as abundant as usual. The brilliant style, false sentiment, and bad morality of Victor Hugo have secured for 'Les Misérables' a demand which has made the publishers think it expedient to issue a cheap edition, which will diffuse through all classes the crudities of a work in which rebellion is treated as a jest to be undertaken for a morning's diversion, law as a tyranny, crime as a misfortune, and order and good government as the only real wickedness. With a galley slave for its hero and the police for its evil genius, the novel is perfectly consistent in its philosophy, which reserves for criminals the right of shedding blood, and insists that only the innocent should be subject to capital punishment; which will not allow society the right of self-defence, because forsooth it is society which, by its neglect of duty, made the criminal it proceeds to punish. Frenchmen affirm that M. Hugo's account of the French penal code is as false as the anti-social and anti-nomian morality which he hangs thereon, and we have no doubt that they are right. The work is a tissue of improbabilities in fact and impossibilities in morals; but it has marvellous charms of style and execution, has passages very eloquent and touches exquisitely pathetic, and is worth the perusal of any one who feels himself proof against the moral poison of George Sand and her school, of which M. Victor Hugo is, after all, a mere imitator.

'Mattie: a Stray' is one of the most sensible novels we have read, and offers throughout a direct contrast to 'Les Misérables:' as honest as that is immoral, as true as that is false, as Christian as that is anti-social. Mattie belongs to the same class as the hero of 'Les Misérables,' and is reclaimed by the same means—the denial of her guilt by the person she had robbed; and from that time she works her way upwards in the world, by strict honesty and hard work, to become the guardian angel of him who had saved her, without reproaches against society, with frank acknowledgment of her sin, and with an earnest admiration of the happy homes of honest people which proves her redemption. She is not a persecuted saint, like Victor Hugo's inveterate thief, but a repentant sinner; and she reaches not the sentimental glory of the French ex-convict, but the solid happiness and wellbeing which resolute good sense and honest endeavour do generally achieve in this world, even for those who start from the lowest ground.

A batch of other novels are before us, but we can only mention one or two. 'Wondrous Strange' is what may be called a 'sensation story,' inasmuch as its leading incidents are the murder of an adored wife, and the widower's marriage with the murderess. But a considerable part of the narrative is disconnected from the 'sensation,' and here real taste and feeling are displayed. The chief character in the book—the husband of the murdered lady—is a failure, not for lack of skill in drawing, but because the combinations assigned are simply impossible; the man could not be at once so strong in intellect and so silly, so good and so given up to his passions. A merely clever man may be a fool; a good but weak man may make awful blunders; but neither a merely clever man nor a good weak man could have held the position ascribed to Cuthbert Erle. He must have had strong sense; and this is exactly what fails him in the story. The two daughters are charming; the secretary better than women's men are wont to be. 'Cumworth House' is the story of a woman too good for this world, and a man too bad for her to love, whom nevertheless she worships when he betrays her, and almost invites him to trample on her when she marries him. Otherwise the story has considerable merits, though far inferior. 'The Black Angel and the Star of the South' form between them one incomplete story of the American war, full of wonderful feats performed by Southern heroes and heroines, after the style of G. P. R. James and H. Ainsworth. To those who love tales of impossible adventure and exciting achievement, these volumes are worth the 4*s.* for which they may be had at a railway bookstall. Especially the story of the escape of the Spitfire from New York harbour, will be delightful to schoolboys.

MAGAZINES FOR OCTOBER.*

The magazines for the present month are a decided improvement on those of September, and the cause may, perhaps, be sought in the renewed vigour imparted by the pleasures of the vacation.

Blackwood has an article entitled 'Max Müller's Second Series,' and in it the writer very justly criticises the bold rejection of the bow-wow and pooh-pooh theory. He observes that when words have been resolved into primary roots the roots stare you in the face, and ask some explanation of their creation. That 'there never was an independent array of determinate conceptions waiting to be matched with an independent array of articulate sound' may most readily be admitted, but that we could not think without language, or that the body of language never had an objective existence, is not so plain. After a few reasonable remarks on this part of his subject, the writer launches into the question of spelling. He argues that it is unfair to insist on what is a case of sheer arbitrary memory as a test of education. Perhaps, to a man of decent education nothing is so fruitful a source of irritation as the receipt of a letter abounding in defective spelling. There is such a thing as loving a language for its own sake. Dr. Arnold derived as much pleasure from the study of a map as an artist from the study of a Claude. Similarly, to the eyes of scholars accustomed to critical examination of the nature and disposition of words, a syllable wrongly spelled is as great a deformity as the want of truth in a perspective. The article concludes with some able strictures on the deficiencies of Max Müller when wandering beyond the confines of philology into that field common to the psychologist and philologist—namely, the nature and functions of language itself. In fact, Max Müller is merely open to the universal charge of that vanity which tempts a man to believe that his peculiar sphere of labour is the shadow under which repose all the subjects of metaphysical research.

'The Life of Jesus' is worth reading, because it contains extracts from Dr. Tulloch's lectures on the famous work of M. Renan. The article itself, beyond a little harmless attempt at sarcasm, rather tells in favour of the ideas which it abhors. It implores those whom it attacks not to rob us of the consolations and hopes which religion affords; and why? Not because, in so robbing us, they plunder us of the greatest prize of time and eternity—namely, truth—but because we are weak, and this is a sorry world, and if there is no possibility of a life more worth living than this, then it only remains for us to despair. Again, the article congratulates itself on the steady and loyal adhesion of the broad general mass of the common people, who have no time for discussion, while it contemptuously dismisses the savants to their own doubts and difficulties. Is not this to confess what is equally monstrous and untrue—that religion can only exist in union with ignorance, and is inconsistent with the use of intellectual efforts? With such weapons as these M. Renan is not to be defeated.

'The Public Schools Report' presents a fair picture of Westminster, Charterhouse, St. Paul's, and Merchant Tailors' Schools; but the effect is rather marred by the writer having yielded to the temptation of serving up a sketch of the inner life of the Queen's scholars at Westminster. A boy of an unaccountable temperament, and of a singular unwillingness to rough the small hardships and conventionalities of ordinary school life, and also oblivious of the time-honoured maxim not to be one 'qui dicta foras eliminet,' revealed a long story of horrors to a nervous parent, who thought that the history of his son's wrongs would figure grandly in the Commissioners' Report. Imagination supplied a large proportion of the evidence, but Westminster School was effectually vilified.

The present number contains also 'Memoirs of Richard Whately,' and an article on 'Our Trade,' containing an attack on that friendless piece of legislation, 'The Bank Act.'

Fraser leads off with 'The Decline and Fall of Whiggery,' a subject which affords an opportunity for some detail and argument of a commonplace kind on the subject of the birth and life of the Whig party. The writer evidently regards Whiggery not as a development of a particular line of political faith and action, but as a mere creature produced to meet the exigencies of an historical situation. The conduct of James II. and the existence of William III. produced Whiggery. With such a birth as that, it is only natural that a dissolution should be expected after the lapse of nearly two centuries. To illustrate further the writer's theory, it may be mentioned that the Reform Bill is looked upon not as a step in the steady progress of Whiggery, but as a kind of galvanic activity induced by the conviction that something ought to be done. The degrees of political advancement are simple enough. A Whig is antiquated, a Tory is more antiquated, but the writer, 'an advanced Liberal,' is the correct thing. Indeed, the verdict is that 'the Whigs have failed to understand the exigencies, and have, on each occasion, been wise too late.' That Whigs and Tories are rapidly becoming obsolete is, however, true. At the present moment there is a perfect calm: a few years will probably develope a new set of opposing forces, acting under new titles and operating in distinct methods. In this connection a passage in the article 'A Campaigner at Home' deserves notice. After a remark on the monotony of the ways of the world, even to the playing of 'Don Giovanni' or 'Il Trovatore' ad nauseam, the writer proceeds:—

Even a French revolution has lost its zest by this time. A revolt in Poland is like a novel where the end is visible from the beginning. We know by heart all Lord Palmerston's jokes. The frantic efforts of the Yankee Barnums to get up a sensation piece have failed lamentably: these endless battles on the Rapidan and Rappahannock are dull as ditchwater. Not for the first time have Prussian and Austrian brigands plundered and murdered their innocent fellow-creatures. There is only one mature human soul, I believe, which is insensible to the tedium of the play. Let us honour Earl Russell that is—Lord John that was. He is the oasis in our desert. He was seventy years of age the other day, I am told, and yet no boarding-school girl in all the land writes longer or more gushing letters to her dearest friend. One can understand why his male correspondents, waspish creatures like Bismarck and Gortschakoff, swear when they see his handwriting. But no experience disenchants him. He is never blasé. He clasps the Test and Corporation Act to his heart with the fervour of earliest passion. One does not see how Earl Russell will occupy himself in glory. He cannot well introduce a Reform Bill into heaven, yet if any of the archangels were to presume on their position, it is possible enough that even there we might hear a great deal about close boroughs.

An article 'On the Census of England and Wales, 1861,' is highly interesting. It goes to prove, first, that the rich become every day richer, and the poor every day poorer; second, that the number of paupers receiving relief is close upon one million, besides some thousands of vagrants; third, that the prevalence of the social evil is such that our affectation of national righteousness is absurd. Indeed, the mind wanders away from the picture of want and crime to dream of a State where one old woman represented the pauper class, or another State where, with the exception of a few specimens from the holy city of Boston, immorality was unknown. Alabama is entitled to the one mark of distinction, and the 'Old Dominion' to the other.

A third part of 'Notes on Diplomacy and Diplomatic History' commences with the partition of Poland and ends with the career of M. Guizot. As a justification of the past attack on the power of Russia, and of any future attack on Prussia, it is highly satisfactory. The writer concludes with a moral. He wishes the Parliament of England to interfere between the execution of a preliminary treaty and the ratification. Apart from the inability of a popular assembly to act the diplomatist, the door which would be opened to the practice of any amount of pious fides seems to deprive the theory of any foundation.

The article 'From Auckland to Awamutu' will excite attention in the present state of New Zealand.

The Cornhill in its fugitive pieces is decidedly happy, and contains a pleasing alternation of practical discussion and of the lightest talk.

An article on 'Middle-class Education in England' is more admirable as an enticement to thought than suggestive of sound ideas. Of course the writer neglects no opportunity of having a 'slap' at the public schools. Indeed, the School of Eton, which furnishes the theme of abuse or admiration, and which seems to absorb the undivided attention of every newspaper or magazine article on public schools, has the same kind of fascination to the eye of the Cornhill which a red rag has to the visual organ of a mad bull. That which is already in existence is bad, that which has existed for the space of a century is wretched, but Eton itself is simply atrocious. Such seems to be the creed of the Cornhill. Of course it is of opinion that the sons of our middle-class men—that is, our farmers, innkeepers, tradesmen, apothecaries, office clerks—are very badly educated, and beyond doubt the opinion is not very erroneous. The position, indeed, is rather hopeless. Assuming, for argument's sake, that these boys learn as much as boys at public schools, yet they never acquire 'the spirit and manliness, the health and the self-reliance' of Eton boys. State support and State superintendence are proposed, and the religious objection is rather evaded than overcome by an appeal to the admitted impartiality of the State in dealing with the lower-class schools. These last are, however, of course, day-schools, and the like success might be attained if the boys of the middle class were taught at day-schools. But unfortunately English people have a notion, and a probably well-founded notion, that if a boy is to have spirit, courage, and manliness, together with that peculiar power of self-government which teaches to resist firmly and to yield graciously, he must spend a few years in a world of boys, and not be alternately learning in a class and going out for a walk with his sisters. To the proposition that a Royal Commission of Enquiry should be appointed, there is no great objection. It will develope a few facts and propound a few fallacies; it will give theorists something to read and reviewers something to review. Just as the institution of the Divorce Court proved that the morality of the middle classes was worse than that of the upper classes, so will a Commission prove that the education of the former is inferior to that of the latter. One thing it will entirely fail to do, what every master of every public school declares that the Public-School Commission has failed to do, namely to offer any solution of the particular difficulties which beset the teachers of youth. One of these, and perhaps the chief, is the disgraceful neglect of parents. The powers of memory, to give but one instance, may be rendered prodigious by a skilful cultivation of them in a child. The task of cultivation is not arduous, yet nothing is so amazing as the deficiency of the retentive power in the mass of boys. Of course, this argument may be made to revolve in a circle, for the parents themselves were educated at similar schools. Nevertheless, the remark of an Eton Master made to us is suggestive: 'I can tell, within three weeks after a new arrival, what sort of a mother a boy has.'

'A Visit to a Convict Lunatic Asylum' should not be read by nervous people just before bedtime. The writer pretends to total ignorance of what a lunatic asylum is like, and then comes suddenly on what to him is a very startling method of treatment. He goes to a ball and sees a young fellow dancing with a blooming damsel. To his horror he finds that each of the two has committed a murder. A respectable doctor sings 'Jock of Hazeldean' with considerable success, and turns out to have been a wholesale destroyer of human life. Another gentlemanly individual justifies himself for having killed a poor tax-collector who summoned him for not paying a dog-tax. His friend X——, who introduces him, further enlightens him in a startling manner on the affinity between insanity and crime, and, what is more, on the affinity between bad temper and insanity. Inasmuch as the visitor is a barrister, he may congratulate himself in future on his capability of setting up a good defence for his client, even under the most trying circumstances.

'Madame de Monferrat' is a pretty story, and, what is more, it enables the writer to give vent to his dire hatred of Verdi's music. The 'Traviata' is peculiarly abhorrent to his feelings, but whether on moral or musical grounds is not quite clear.

'Flower Farming' is enough to seduce any one from the easterly winds of October to the charming districts of Nice, Cannes, and Grasse. Indeed, the description of acres of jasmine, orange, violet, jonquil, cassia, and roses far excelling the products of Pæstum,

'biferi rosaria Pæsti'

would transport the imagination, if the writer, besides explaining the art of culture—

'pingues hortos quæ cura colendi
Ornaret'—

did not take care to tell us that after all it is done for money, and not the love of the beautiful. Indeed, all poetry fled on our arrival at the method of absorption by the use of 'butter, grease, and fat.'

Macmillan's Magazine has two very readable articles—one by the editor on that part of the life of Dr. Chalmers which dated from his retreat from the career of a pulpit-orator at Glasgow to the chair of moral philosophy at St. Andrew's, and an article on Tübingen in 1864. Mr. Masson tells an anecdote of Dr. Chalmers which is highly illustrative of the inequality of the powers of the mind. In many respects Dr. Chalmers was a practical man, and his scheme for the relief of pauperism, demonstrated by actual trial to have earned at least the merit of unbounded success, stamped him as a sensible man of business as well as a deep thinker and an eloquent speaker. Yet this lecturer on political economy, this practical reformer of the poor law, this man learned in the whole field of natural and revealed religion, imagined that no better specific could be found for the conversion of a freethinking Italian than a course of study of English works, including, among others, Paley's 'Evidences,' Lardner's 'Credibility,' Butler's 'Analogy,' and Leslie's 'Short and Easy Method with the Deists.'

The article on Tübingen in 1864 points out very clearly the means by which that distinguished university has, at the same time, made and marred an unrivalled reputation in the history of dogmatic theology. There is no institution in England which teaches theology as a science; and the renown achieved by Englishmen in that field of learning has been the result of individual taste and individual exertion. Isolation is the obstacle to success in the English student. The University of Tübingen is the greatest example of the application of the force of combined efforts to the attainment of a purely intellectual triumph. Four years under special theological training by way of preparation for the university, and a more extended period of cultivation at the Stift, produces theological athletes of the calibre of Strauss and Baur. Again, a contempt, not only for the efforts of Anglican divines, but even for the sublime genius of Pascal or Bossuet, has made their most elaborate subtleties resemble the struggles of a great tour de force. At the same time, whether the development has been in the direction of speculative rationalism or Biblical dogmatism, they have acquired an indisputable title, not only to great originality and ingenious criticism, but also to unrivalled erudition.

'Bodies and Souls: a Discursive Paper; with Glimpses of the City of Bath,' is written by a lover of cleanliness and an enemy of sober ideas and good English. His love of cleanliness is so great that he puts on the threadbare text, 'Cleanliness is next to godliness,' an interpretation which we imagined to be the peculiar property of elderly housekeepers and active scullery-maids. He talks of 'getting at men's souls in the way which Providence seems to point out as the true and lawful way—through their bodies.' He calls Edinburgh 'bold and manly' (about as violent a breach of usage as to call a ship 'him'), and Bath 'lovely and feminine,' until we long to see the produce of a union of the two. He evidently is very suspicious about the machinery by which the 'waters' of Bath are heated, for though he laughs at those people 'who seem to believe in the Abode beneath more eagerly than in the Abode above,' he cannot forbear rapturously to exclaim, 'Where can be, what can be, that wondrous and inextinguishable fire which boils this unlimited supply of hot water as it has done for thousands and thousands of years?' 'Wondrous and inextinguishable fire' is perhaps poetical, but 'an unlimited supply of water' is intolerably suggestive of the payment of a water-rate.

'Châlons: The Camp and Fête Napoleon' is principally remarkable for the contrast between the expectations raised by a fine heading and a capital subject and the results of a perusal of the article. The only information which we gathered was that Marshal M'Mahon is a courteous gentleman, and that there is a great deal of dust at Châlons.

The number terminates with what pleaders would call a 'replication' to a 'plea' of the Saturday Review to a 'declaration' of the Rev. F. D. Maurice on 'Bribery at Elections.' Mr. Christie is the author of the 'replication,' and, from the tone of the writers on both sides, the 'rebutters and surrebutters,' if the pleadings arrive at that stage, will probably be highly entertaining. Mr. Christie says, 'The Saturday Reviewer has written for the ignorant and vulgar.' Why, then, does Mr. Christie answer him, unless he aspires to be judged by a similar audience?

THE FEDERAL WAR DEBT AND THE BOUNTIES.

(From the New York World, September 21.)

In estimating the burden of the debt entailed by the war upon us and our posterity, that part of it which arises from taxation imposed on the people of the towns and counties by their direct votes, for the purpose of stimulating enlistments, requires particular consideration, not only because its weight is heavier than is generally supposed, escaping observation by being created in detail both as to amount and locality, but also because its management is controlled by individuals in the several communities, under State laws and county regulations, and because its charge rests directly upon the lands and goods of each farmer and tradesman among them. The United States official represents a remote and indefinite power—the town collector is one's next-door neighbour, and knows everything about the home on which he holds a lien. Let us take an illustration. A senatorial district of New York State, not more than a hundred miles from the metropolis, sent to the war a magnificent regiment, over a thousand strong, and has lately welcomed back its gallant wreck, less than two hundred in number. Many of them enlisted for bounties of $300, raised by vote of public town meetings, the aggregate of which exists as county bonds, legalised by the State Acts of 1863. The Act of 1864 amends and enlarges the scope of the former one, permitting a majority of the electors at a town meeting to vote a bounty, and creating a lien for its payment upon all the taxable property of the county. In some of the towns of this district a public vote has recently fixed the bounty at a thousand dollars, and filled the quota at that cost to property-owners. Now it is to be observed, first, that the noble-hearted farmers of this district have given their own hearts' blood, their very sons and brothers, to the country, and that there is scarcely a house among its secluded hills not darkened by the garments of mourning. Next, that they have patriotically burdened their property with a charge which impairs its value and lessens its income for them and their descendants. And last, that it is not by their own votes alone that they have decided how much of their acres they shall henceforth till as agents for the public creditor; but that it is the majority of the town electors, most of them landless, and many of them destitute of any property, that have sheltered themselves from the draft by aiding to lay this tax upon the real-estate owners. As in this district, so over all the land. It is impossible yet to compute the millions which our high-hearted yeomen have thus bound themselves to pay; but enough is known to show that this addition of county obligations to the national debt will be enormous.

Hood's Legs.—Confederate ingenuity is never at a loss. The head and trunk of a man deprived of one or more limbs will furnish the wisdom and ardour of a perfect Hercules. The means of activity can be acquired by art. A regular service has been organised in the Confederacy for the supply from the most skilful makers in Europe of artificial limbs and members equipped with all the most cunning contrivances that modern ingenuity has devised to render them effective substitutes for living bone and muscle. In the early part of this year an eminent staff surgeon in the Confederate army was despatched to London, and took up his quarters in the neighbourhood of a skilled artist. He came provided with models of the truncated members of a number of Confederate officers, spent several weeks in superintending the manufacture of a number of arms, legs, hands, &c., which were supplied in sets of two or three each, that amidst the perils of blockade-running one at least should reach its destination in safety. On one particular specimen of ingenuity particular care was bestowed, and the surgeon took charge of it himself, sewing it up in a waterproof casing, that it might survive the chance of being thrown overboard to be rescued from the clutches of Federal chasers. This was the identical limb—an 'Anglesey leg,' as it is called—which enabled General Hood to take active service again, and assume the command of the army at Atlanta.

The United States Emigration Company.—We take the following from the New York Daily News of September 17:—'What have we now to offer to the immigrant? What is it that this shrewd Emigration Society proposes by its specious scheme? Why, simply this: to buy men—white men—at the small cost of their passage money to this country in an overcrowded vessel filled with miserable dupes, who sell themselves into a state of slavery. What is the object of this new scheme of enslaving Irishmen? A Christian object surely, since it emanates from the most godly of the godliest of New England. Certainly. The object of the white slave system is to save the precious Massachusetts carcases from death in battle with the "rebels." The object is to lure the emigrant into our free State slave pen, to maltreat him, drug him, starve him, till, under the combined or separate influence of force and fraud, these so-called emigrants are driven by desperation from the slave pen of the North into the bloody slaughter pens of the South. That is the godly object of this American Emigration Company. A better name for it would be the Massachusetts Slave and Slaughter Company.'

A Gallant Rescue.—The Mobile Register of September 8 says: 'A gallant little affair took place near the water obstructions Tuesday night. A picket boat with four men and a negro crew of oarsmen was out on its customary round of duty. The tugboat Gunnison, Captain Thomas Lynch, was on hand to give its help in case of trouble. At about half-past one o'clock, A.M., Captain Lynch discovered from a signal that the boat was attacked by a Yankee launch with thirty men from one of the monitors. He immediately got under way and steered for the scene of the chase, and found the picket boat making its best time, with the launch firing musketry and in hot pursuit. In a few minutes the Yankees reached and captured the boat and had her in tow, and Captain Lynch heard our people calling for help. Lynch had by this time run the Gunnison aground, but kept his engines going to make the Yankees believe that he was after them. Very soon the Yankees cut their tow loose and skedaddled, Lynch sending three shells after them. The captured boat was thus recaptured by the coolness of Lynch.'

A Favoured State.—Massachusetts is truly a highly favoured State. In all other States, volunteers who enlist in old regiments are compelled to serve out their full term without respect to the expiration of the time of regiment; but the Government allows special favours to that State, among which is the important one of allowing all the men to be mustered out when the regiment has been three years in the service. Some of the men have not been six months in the service. This is a scandalous piece of favouritism to that State, and is naturally exciting great indignation in the army.—New York World.

GALVANISING DEAD ENTHUSIASM.

(From the New York Daily News.)

For the twentieth time the Abolitionists would have the public believe the rebellion about to be crushed. 'Short, sharp and decisive' is a worn-out form of expression with which they characterise the military action of the hour. This, they declare in brazen-faced repetition of a dozen such assurances that have proved fraudulent, must, will through all the moods and tenses 'trample treason in the dust.' The powder-burning for the evacuation of Atlanta and the fall of Fort Morgan, was part of a system. The invitation of the people to public prayer for successes that are not only minor incidents of tremendous conflicts, but are to all intents and purposes worthless in relation to the general result, is a piece of the same clap-trap. A systematic effort is being made throughout the wide domain of King Shoddy to astonish us with small triumphs, real or pretended. The authorised news announcing, for example, a mere brush, resulting in General Milroy's retreat, comes to us from Louisville under a circus-bill-heading, announcing 'the enemy's cavalry defeated.' The Black Republican Convention of Syracuse, acting under the same motive, rehash the capture of Fort Morgan and the evacuation of Atlanta; and, in addition to some mention of success that the public has not heard of in Tennessee, speak with affected enthusiasm of the signal victory, as they choose to call it, on the Weldon Railroad!

The Secretary of War plays in these public frauds side by side with the smallest Provost-Marshal that lords it over a country telegraph operator. He deliberately withholds news, as our Washington correspondent shows, touching, for example, the movements of Sheridan. We are thus exposed, under a combination between the censor and the Secretary of War, to every falsehood that may be put upon us in order to help out Mr. Lincoln's vain attempt to give his abolition war the support of popular passion. The horseman who, we were told three weeks ago by the New York Herald, was riding to Early's camp with orders for his immediate return to Richmond, was a creation of the executive combination to deceive. The pretence that the Confederates are retreating from Sheridan, and that they are being followed by that officer in pursuit, is of a piece with the same general plan of imposture. Our military correspondence shows that on the contrary, while Sheridan moved cautiously up the eastern side of the valley of Virginia with the view of threatening Early's flank, he received at Berryville a blow so heavy as to drive him for safety into intrenchments. Immediately afterwards his ambulances were captured; and his communications, for at least the time, cut off. Early is not retreating; and Sheridan is not pursuing.

Forewarned is forearmed. We caution the people against the deliberate intrigue that has been formed for catching their judgment in a whirl of popular passion. The advocate of bloodshed and destruction stands before them on his trial, and seeks to escape their righteous verdict in vain attempts to excite them to frenzy. They have been deceived in the same way too often. The enthusiasm of the masses for a war that has cost them hundreds of thousands of those they loved is for ever dead, and cannot be roused to even a momentary semblance of life, by all the experts of electioneering galvanism.

Slaughter in the Streets of London.—It may startle some of our readers to be told that there is greater slaughter in the streets of London than on all the railways in England and Wales. Nevertheless, such appears to be the case if recent experience is to be accepted as a guide. Every week the Registrar General gives us a return of the metropolitan mortality. Taking the reports for the last three weeks we find that the number of persons killed by vehicles in our London streets was in the first week (ending September 17) seven; in the second no less than eleven; and in the third week (ending on the 1st inst.) seven again—thus making a total of 25. It cannot be supposed that these three weeks stand wholly apart from all the rest of the year, even though we may admit that they afford instances of the maximum fatality. Twenty-five deaths in three weeks would be 433 in the course of a year. Suppose we reduce this by two-thirds, and take the annual fatality at 144 deaths. By so doing, perhaps, we shall keep very much within the mark, the deaths then being less than three per week, instead of more than eight, the number shown by the three weeks referred to. Turning to the last annual report of the Board of Trade we find that in the year 1863 the number of persons—passengers, servants, trespassers, and others—killed on the railways in England and Wales was 129, or fifteen less than our estimated number of deaths from vehicular accidents in the metropolis alone. The number of actual passengers killed on the railways was only eleven, although the total number carried was about fifty-seven times the population of London.—The Standard.

Cotton Trade of the Confederate States.—The Southern States have managed to send from Texas, mostly over Mexico, and from other States to Bermuda, $20,000,000 more cotton than they did last year, and the means now of sending cotton from Texas have greatly increased. The crop of Texas, it is stated, will be larger than ever, reaching 500,000 bales, and a value of $400,000,000, or enough to pay the whole war debt of the Confederacy, has been raised this year, and can be sent over Mexico to market under the imperial protection. It is quite possible that the continuance of the war may be a means of sustaining the price of cotton so that the Confederacy, by having a market over Mexico, may for comparatively small crops realise immense prices. Their cotton has always the preference, and it is better to sell 1,000,000 bales for $700,000,000, than to sell 4,000,000 bales for $200,000,000 as formerly. This seems to be the course that affairs are now taking. It would obviously be ruinous to the markets of the world for the Southern cotton supply to be resumed at the former magnitude, whereas by a gradually enlarged supply, through other ports, the new empire of Mexico would be greatly benefited, and great strength imparted to the southern section of the Confederacy, with growing wealth to the whole of it. This seems to be among the commercial contingencies of a prolonged war.—New York Paper.

Infant Mortality.—From a return made to the House of Commons it appears that 22,757 inquests were held in the course of last year upon persons who had come to their death in some violent or unusual manner. Of this number 6,506 were held upon infants under seven years old, and 3,644 upon children under a year old. Of the former class 1,100, and the latter nearly 1,000, were illegitimate. A frightful prevalence of infanticide is disclosed by such a return, and it is to be feared that the great mortality of infants is an evil which must be reached as much by moral as by sanitary influence.—Times.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

The Index was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, The Index has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. The Index does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, The Index is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of The Index, 13 Bouverie Street, E.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

Advertisements should be sent and Money Orders made payable to J. B. Hopkins, Index Office.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1864.

The Peace Party and the Presidential Election.

The prospects of General M'Clellan are brighter. It is not supposed that he will win, but the warmest admirers of Mr. Lincoln are fain to admit that the election will be hotly contested. When the Peace party rejected the Chicago candidate because the candidate rejected the Chicago platform, there was much joy amongst the loyal people of the North—that is, amongst the Republicans who support Mr. Lincoln. It would be too absurd to suppose that Mr. Lincoln or Mr. Seward is greatly disturbed by the progress of the election. It would be as reasonable to imagine that when Augustus Cæsar gratified his subjects by going through the farce of a periodical election, he was anxious about the result. Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Seward would prefer, and doubtless anticipate, a legitimate triumph; but if Democratic 'treason' should prevail at the ballot-box, it does not follow that Abraham Lincoln will resign his right to reign over thirty-four States. Assuming, however, that the world is to witness, for the first time, a fair popular election, when one of the candidates is the master of legions, it is not to be denied that M'Clellan's chances are improved.

The Peace Democrats will not nominate a candidate, and probably they will vote en masse for General M'Clellan. One reason is that the friends of the General have in a most emphatic manner declared that he is for peace, and that the letter of acceptance was warlike in its tone to conciliate a section of the party who still believe in the restoration of the old Union. M'Clellan is firmly persuaded that the South will come back under constitutional guarantees, but he will not adopt unconstitutional means to bring back the South—that is, he will not seek to restore the Union by force of arms.

These assurances and explanations, however pleasing and plausible, do not constitute the principal reason for the Peace Democrats voting for M'Clellan. The Peace Democrats are intent on putting an end to the war. They are sincerely attached to the Union, and would, if it were possible, restore it by negotiation. But they are opposed to the war, because war cannot possibly reconstitute a voluntary federation of sovereign States. They denounce the war because it is bringing the country to ruin, and because its prolongation threatens to bring about a fresh secession, and must eventuate either in civil war or in perpetuating the despotism that has been developed in the person of Mr. Lincoln. The Peace Democrats would have preferred a candidate pledged to peace, but no such candidate being before the country they will either abstain from voting or vote for a candidate whose election would promote the cause of peace. It seems to them that if M'Clellan is chosen President the days of warfare will be numbered. If M'Clellan redeems the promises made in his behalf, then, even if the war survive the present year, his inauguration in March next will be the signal for sheathing the sword. Or suppose M'Clellan should pursue a different course, and, fired by military ambition, should resolve to continue the war, his election will still strengthen the cause of peace. M'Clellan will fight to restore the Union as it was. Will the Abolitionists support that policy? Assuredly not. Abolitionism has been with some of its followers a genuine fanaticism, with the majority a cloak for covetousness, and both classes will be the bitter opponents of the Administration of a War Democrat. How can a war carried on whilst the Democrats are in power pay New England? How can sincere Abolitionists support a war waged to reaffiliate the institution of slavery to the United States? So, if M'Clellan is elected, we shall hear the old cries, 'Down with the flag!' 'Abolish the covenant with death and hell!' 'Let the Union slide!' and the New Englanders will become what they were before 1860—fierce secessionists. Indeed, Mr. Lincoln's friends have been exceedingly frank in this respect, and have warned discontented Republicans and Unionist Democrats that the rejection of Mr. Lincoln would be the end of the war, that New England would not fight to restore the old Union, and thereby place the Republicans in a hopeless minority. So, then, if a Democratic President is elected, whether he be for peace or war, the Republicans will in that case be for peace. Moved by this consideration, the Peace Democrats have determined to do their best to defeat Mr. Lincoln.

But the Republicans have gone further than to assert that they will not support the measures of a War Democrat. They are resolved, if M'Clellan is chosen in November, that he shall not have the choice of peace or war. Before his inauguration they will proclaim an armistice and conclude a peace. They know the power of the sword. They know how the war has enabled Mr. Lincoln to trample on the rights of, and to tyrannise over, the whole nation. They will not allow 'a Northern traitor'—that is, a Democrat—to seize upon such power. Therefore the Peace men will support M'Clellan, since his return is likely to eventuate in an immediate peace.

We will not attempt to estimate the chances of the respective candidates. There is yet a month before the day of election, and many events may occur in that time to affect the result. Already the occupation of Atlanta and the naval victory of Farragut are seen in their true proportions. It is clear that neither event improves the military position of the North, or holds out a prospect of subjugating the South. The victory of Sheridan turns out to be a drawn battle, if not a defeat. The raid in Grant's lines manifests the strength of Lee and the comparative weakness of his adversary. The enforcement of the draft disgusts the native population with the war, for the cost of foreign mercenaries is very heavy, and the supply is failing. A Confederate victory, or continued inactivity on the part of the Federal commanders, would do much to make the war unpopular. It is consequently vain to speculate on the prospects of either candidate. Both are confident; and if Lincoln has the best chance now, there are many probable contingencies that may give M'Clellan a majority on the 4th proximo. Whether the popular vote can unmake in 1864 the thing it made in 1860 is another question. If Mr. Lincoln is defeated and gives up his office, it will not only be the first instance of his observing the oath he took at his inauguration, but it will prove that he has more virtue and less power than we think he has. If the Democrats are determined to oppose force to force, the game of Mr. Lincoln is over, for civil war in the North will stop the war against the South; and the war against the South being ended, the people will be able to restore peace at home.

The reelection of Mr. Lincoln will be adverse to immediate peace, but the war will be carried on in a different manner. The Northern finances and the Northern recruiting grounds cannot sustain another four years' war on the scale of the last four years. The war will languish, and, if it is continued, it will be so, not in the hope of conquering the South, but for the purpose of keeping the North in subjection. The Confederate States would be glad of an immediate peace, but a prolongation of the war will do them but little injury compared to the injury which it will inflict upon the United States.

Blockade and Capture.

The Association for the Promotion of Social Science, if not altogether free from absurdities, among which may be ranked its somewhat pompous title, is nevertheless a sufficiently respectable and highly useful institution. It serves three valuable ends. It enables crotcheteers to obtain a hearing for their views, and exempts them from the irritation of neglect and the honour of social persecution: it is, in fact, a safety-valve for theoretic enthusiasm. It is also a neutral ground for the impartial discussion of questions which must, one day or other, give rise to political measures, and which are thus ripened and settled before they come into the hands of Parliament and are incurably confused by being made the watchwords and stalkinghorses of party battles. And, thirdly, it allows the free and full 'ventilation' of ideas which are unsound indeed, but so plausible that, if not thoroughly discussed and sifted in this or some similar manner, they would gain a dangerous hold on public opinion without ever being fairly encountered and debated. We should rank among the third class what its friends would place in the second—the proposal of Mr. Ashworth of Manchester for the reform of the laws of maritime warfare.

That proposal is, that private property should no longer be liable to capture at sea by the public enemy, and that commercial blockades should no longer be permitted—a logical consequence of the former, since the purpose of commercial blockades is the capture of private property, whether belonging to or intended for subjects of the enemy; a practical consequence, as otherwise the effect of the law would be that a strong naval Power may capture while a weak one may not. But the right of seizing contraband of war, and of blockading by sea a place also besieged by land, or blockading in the attempt to take a fortified port, would still be left to belligerents. It would be necessary to the practical working of this plan that 'contraband' should be strictly limited to munitions of war; otherwise this exception might be made the means of defeating the rule.

In support of the proposed innovation it is argued that private property on land is, by the law of nations, exempt from hostile confiscation, and that there is no reason why a different rule should prevail at sea. Capture of private ships and cargoes is a relic of the piratical character of ancient maritime warfare. Blockade bears a similar character, and involves this further inequity, that it inflicts on neutrals an injury always considerable, and sometimes sufferings as great as are endured by the blockaded country. While the great maritime Powers maintained the rule that 'the enemy's goods are not covered by the neutral flag,' the right of capture was a very valuable instrument of war; for it enabled them to destroy all or nearly all commerce by sea between the enemy and the outer world. But now 'free ships make free goods,' and you can no longer intercept his commerce by capture, if he carry it on under a neutral flag. Capture strikes only at his shipping, not at his trade. Blockade, indeed, retains its power of intercepting his trade by sea. But this power is of comparatively little value now that the vast improvement of land carriage has made it possible with great speed and little cost to transport merchandise from a neutral port to an inland mart of the belligerent five hundred miles away. Maritime Powers, then, can derive comparatively little advantage from the rights of capture and of blockade. And, on the other hand, these rights may be exercised by others greatly to the disadvantage of such Powers, whether as belligerents or as neutrals.

England especially is liable to suffer by the present state of the law. She has parted with the right which made her navy so terrible a weapon against a foe—the right of seizing enemy's goods wherever found. She can only capture enemy's ships; and only one enemy with whom she is likely to be engaged has any considerable number of merchant ships to lose. The experience of the American war has proved that half a dozen swift cruisers can so effectually terrify shippers and injure shipowners, by inflicting a heavy rate of war insurance on the enemy's marine and cargoes carried under his flag, as practically to suspend the carrying trade of the greatest of maritime Powers. Granted that in any future war England will sweep her enemy's merchant and fighting navy alike from the sea, yet she will not be able to prevent six or ten Alabamas from scouring the seas in his service. And these few cruisers will effectually shut up our ships in port, not because they will capture so many, but because every one who ships a cargo under our flag will have to pay a war insurance; and therefore all will choose a neutral flag in preference. By the right of capture, then, we shall suffer more than we can inflict in time of war, simply because we have more to lose than anybody else in the way of carrying trade, and each belligerent will lose all he has. Then as to the right of blockade; if once we should lose the mastery of the sea, no Power on earth could suffer so much in so many directions as we might do by a commercial blockade. Such a blockade would starve us even in these islands; not merely deprive us of tea and coffee, sugar and wine, but actually put us on famine rations of bread and beef. On whom could we inflict so much by the strictest of conceivable blockades?

Even as neutrals, we suffer by the present law.

Whenever there is a rumour of war in Europe, shippers—even English shippers—in China and India, and other distant quarters, prefer to ship under another flag. 'England may be involved in this war before our cargoes reach their destination, and if so they will only be safe under some other flag than hers.' This feeling, in 1859, operated as a premium upon American shipping. How much we may suffer as neutrals by a foreign blockade, we have just been severely reminded.

Mr. Ashworth and the shipowners whom he represents, then, argue as follows:—Civilisation, consistency, and English interests require the immunity of private property from capture at sea and the abolition of blockades. Consistency and civilisation require that a barbarous practice, discontinued on land, should cease at sea. English interests require that we should labour to abolish practices which greatly injure us in a commercial, and do not greatly aid us in a military, point of view. We propose to answer these arguments, and suggest one or two other points.

And first of English interests in time of peace. They suffer, like those of all neutrals, by blockade. They suffer, as those of all belligerents in posse, by the law of capture. But the latter injury is much less serious than might be supposed. England has so enormous a share of the shipping of the world, that no nation could take much of its carrying trade from her except the Americans. When all Swedish, and Spanish, and Greek, and Portuguese ships were loaded, there would still remain enough for English ships to carry. The idea of the shipowners in 1859 was that America was a permanently neutral nation, and that, by virtue of that secure and permanent neutrality, she would steal from us our carrying trade. The fear was reasonable, but the cause is now removed. For the future, the United States are as likely, in a series of years, to be at war as we are. And the nations which may expect to be more frequently neutral than England have not among them all a merchant navy capable of taking from her any considerable part of our carrying trade. The alarm, therefore, lest we should be seriously injured as the carriers of the world in time of peace by our liability to go to war, appears chiefly chimerical.

Then of our interests in time of war. We need not take into account the idea of our being worsted at sea and blockaded at home. If such a thing be possible, it would mean for us nothing less than destruction, from which no alteration of maritime law could save us. While we are a Power at all, we shall be the first of maritime Powers; and in that capacity blockade is a weapon in our hands, not in our enemy's. Capture, again, is not likely to be so effectually used against us as is supposed. The case imagined is that we have shut up or annihilated the enemy's fighting ships, and are assailed only by a few swift cruisers, depending on their speed for safety. Surely we could protect our merchantmen in a great measure against such vessels by organising our heavier commerce into convoys, defended by steam men-of-war, and sending mails and the like in armed vessels capable of beating off any cruiser sufficiently light to escape the pursuit of our navy? This is no doubt a dreary and costly prospect, but it is far from presenting the picture of utter ruin which our prophets of evil paint for us. So much for defence. Now as to weapons of aggression. Whatever blockade and capture may be worth, they form the chief part of our armoury, and we ought not lightly to part with them. Against any nation even of the second rank we could hardly maintain an offensive war by land. We could hardly land more than 50,000 men anywhere; and even a second-rate Power could, in self-defence, muster much stronger forces than this. Our means of offence, then, are blockade, capture, and the bombardment of seaports and dockyards. It is by these alone that we could punish an insult or revenge an encroachment without the support of military allies. It would be absurd, then, to abandon two of the three. Grant that we made a great mistake in blunting the second weapon by the Convention of Paris, yet let us keep what remains of it. Grant that there are some nations that could not be greatly injured by blockade, because they have easy land communication with neighbours, as France, Prussia, and Austria; yet this is true only in a limited degree of Spain (if Portugal were our ally), of Italy, of Russia. On any of these an effectual blockade would inflict severe injury. It would tell with still greater effect on Sweden and Norway, on Chili, on Brazil, and on the United States. Those who deny the efficacy of a blockade to injure the possible enemies of England seem to have confined their views to France.

Let us add that blockade and capture serve, in one set of cases, the purpose of war; i.e. when a strong Power wishes to coerce, without injuring, a weak one. Whether such coercion be just or unjust is not relevant to the question; just or not, surely it is a gain that it should be gentle and bloodless. We have coerced Greece and Brazil by the use or menace of these rights; had we been precluded from blockading Rio or seizing Brazilian vessels, it would have been necessary to repeat the tragedy of Kagosima. To renounce our milder weapons of offence would force us, in all such cases, to that kind of coercion which so reluctantly we practised at Copenhagen in 1807, which no ordinary need could possibly have excused. It is not always that humanitarian proposals tend to promote humanity.

Passing to more general arguments, we doubt whether Mr. Ashworth's proposal is any better supported by these than by those national considerations we have just discussed. Do civilisation and consistency require the abolition of the rights of maritime warfare? War is waged for purposes of coercion; can there be any milder form of coercion than that of blockade and capture on the high seas? Again, is it not consistent with civilisation that the evils of war should be brought home to the conscience and feelings of those who make war? It has pleased Providence that England should know nothing of those evils, save in heavier taxation and the blood of her soldiers. But if those nations that are eager for military glory are not to feel the evils of war in anything that touches them nearly, is not this an encouragement of war? Does not the true interest of civilisation demand that in one way or other the peoples on whose will in almost every country war now depends, should be made sensible of its existence, and suffer by its progress? Blockades serve to bring home a sense of the evils of war to the hearts of those who make it; they apply coercion directly to classes that have a powerful influence in determining the time and terms of peace. And certainly few operations of war are less cruel and less unjust.

Nor is there anything inconsistent with the practice in vogue on land in that which prevails at sea. A blockade is virtually a partial siege of the entire country, and its usages are in nowise more severe than those of a siege. The capture of private property at sea is somewhat more indiscriminate than the usage of the most civilised nations in warfare on land; but it inflicts less suffering than even the quartering of an invading army on the people, when that invading army is in strict discipline; and it is infinitely less cruel than the mildest proceedings of Wrangel in Denmark or Benedek in Piedmont. The advocates of the change are simply mistaken in their idea, not perhaps of the law, but of the practice on land.

But the conclusive objection to the proposed innovation is that it would never work. It calls upon belligerents only to fight with buttoned foils at sea, while they fight with sharpest rapiers, or it may be with poisoned daggers, on land; and to such a restraint, when their blood is up, no human beings—and Governments are human—will submit. Consider the practical consequences that would, during the last five years, have flowed from this change in the law. While Prussian Generals were robbing the peasants of Jutland of their subsistence and the tradesmen of their wares, Prussian vessels would have passed untouched through the midst of the Danish squadron, laden perhaps with the spoils of Danish subjects. While German invaders interdicted trade between Jutland and the isles, Denmark would have been forbidden to close the mouth of the Elbe against the trade of Hamburg. Is it to be conceived that men with blood in their veins would have submitted to a restraint so purely technical? Could neutral Powers have pretended to enforce a distinction so manifestly unjust? Look at America. The United States would have been bound to allow the South to export yearly to England cotton worth 30,000,000*l.* sterling; and thus to provide a fund in Europe by means of which anything that she desired to purchase, from a cannon to a navy, might have been bought, and secresy paid for at a price which might almost have commanded it. They would have been obliged not only to let cotton go out free, but to let wine, clothing, coffee and sugar, ice and medicine, salt, everything the South most wanted except arms and powder, go in free; and arms and powder would have run the gauntlet as they have actually done. Is it conceivable that a nation desperately in earnest, prepared to spend two hundred thousand lives and two hundred millions of money per year in prosecuting the war, would have consented to tie up its hands in such restraint as this, and strike only with padded gloves precisely where the enemy was most vulnerable? Again, is it to be supposed that the Confederates—seeing cities burned, homesteads levelled to the ground, cattle and property plundered, negroes kidnapped, women and children driven out to perish of hunger and cold, or worse evils than these—should have allowed any law to restrain them from lighting up the ocean with the burning ships that carried the flag of marauders and incendiaries? The mere mention of these consequences of the Manchester doctrine of maritime neutrality is enough to reduce it to a palpable absurdity. No one can deny that these are the very simplest and first consequences of that doctrine; no one who has any notion of the strength of human passions, or any sense of retributive justice, will for a moment admit that a doctrine which would require such abnegation on the part of nations infuriated by wrong and exasperated by conflict can ever form a practical part of international law.

It may be worth observation that, so far as the South has any interest in this question, her interest would seem to coincide with ours and with the existing law. True, she has suffered much through the blockade; but it has failed to weaken her constancy or impede her Government in the prosecution of the war; while the Alabama and her consorts have inflicted more injury on the Yankees than any other Southern weapon could have done. Only through the law of maritime capture can the real authors of the war, the Puritan savages of New England, be made to bear any part of its burdens. When this war is over, the future interest of the South will be still more clearly evident. The development of Mexican prosperity and the gradual improvement of Texas will establish a communication with the outer world independent of Confederate ports, and neutralise the effect of any future blockade; while in the right of maritime capture the Confederacy will retain a sharp and heavy weapon wherewith to avenge herself on any future invader of her territory—a weapon which the countrymen of Captain Semmes will ever be too wise to break.

The British Soldier.

It is impossible, in making our observations on the Belvedere catastrophe, not to advert in terms of the highest admiration to the conduct of the military, not only with respect to the efficient assistance afforded, but also to the heartiness with which it was given. Periodically the snarling calumny goes round that every Englishman enlisted into the army is a man spoilt for all reasonable service to his country. The error, which owes its birth mainly to the prejudiced sophisms of the Peace party, is connived at, and to some extent fostered, by the military authorities, who are glad to prove, even at the price of truth itself, that every veteran had better remain in the service than return to the pursuits of civil life. It is, we repeat, a calumny; and if there are men who, from an easy trustfulness in the wisdom of others or an inaccurate and superficial observation of facts, are inclined to think the contrary, let the events of Saturday last convince them of their mistake. Let us glance for a moment at the occurrences of that fearful morning. A terrible disaster had happened; a no less terrible one was imminent. The wall which protected the adjoining plain from the inroads of the river had been burst asunder, and a breach of 100 yards long yawned menacingly. A message was instantly sent to Woolwich for assistance; the garrison, alarmed by the explosion, were already on the alert. The bugles had hardly time to sound before upwards of 1,000 men were ready to give their aid in the extremity.

Six hundred of the 5th Fusiliers, four hundred engineers, artillerymen, and marines, composed the forlorn hope who were to storm this 'imminent deadly breach,' not to destroy but to save. Colonel Hawkins, their commander, quickly scanned the scene of the disaster. With a practised eye he saw the full extent of the evil and the only possible chance of safety. In a few minutes every man was at his post, some using the shovel, others passing the clay from hand to hand along lines stretching from the excavations to the embankment. 'The facility with which every man found his place showed the unmistakable superiority which marks the operations of a carefully trained and disciplined body of men even in labours which they may be seldom called upon to perform.' Such is the opinion given by the correspondent of the Standard in his graphic description of the catastrophe. No less favourably does he remark upon the catlike activity, the determination to surmount all obstacles, and the general heartiness of the soldiers' work. We need not repeat the rest of the tale; it has been already heard and commented upon elsewhere. How the relentless tide rose hungering to re-envelop in its embrace the wealthy plains which had once been its own; how the soldiers battled with its advance, raising their rampart inch by inch to stem the ever-rising flood; how it had wellnigh broken through the wall in its fierceness, but was straightway beaten back again into sullen subjection, until at last, wearied with its efforts, at the appointed hour it retired, discomfited by the vigour of its human adversaries. Such is, in a few words, the history of the soldiers' deeds at Belvedere. Let us give all honour where honour is due—to the promptness and sagacity of the commanding officers, and to the readiness with which the railway company gave their aid in transporting the troops. After credit has been given to all others who deserved it, our chief thanks are due to the carriers of the clay and the wielders of the spade for averting from us a second great calamity.

We do not notice these events in order to drag out of them a compliment to the British army—far be it from us. On the contrary, had the French, the Italian, or any other properly constituted army been there in the place of English troops, we should have expected the same results. We simply wish the slanderers of our army to observe that the British soldier is both morally and physically capable of doing the fiercest work that can be assigned to him. Indeed, it would be strange were it otherwise. A country labourer or a handicraftsman is enlisted: already enured to hard work, he thrives upon good and plentiful food, and improves his muscular power by a reasonably severe course of drill. When he has finished the daily work required of him, he may, and in old times often did, waste his time and his health in idleness and dissipation. But the old times are rapidly passing away; reading-rooms and gymnasia are becoming common in the service; and many a garrison town could, on a short notice, produce an exhibition of manufactures similar to, though smaller than, that which this year was the honour of Aldershot. A British soldier is now a magnificently trained thoroughbred animal; he is also rapidly becoming a well-taught reasonable man. With the muscular education which is given to him, he may go forth into the civil world as an invaluable labourer. When the habits of obedience naturally engendered in him by the drill are thoroughly matured by the schooling which it is the interest and duty of the authorities to provide for him, he will become a model citizen.

From another point of view the British soldier is a distinct species of the genus humanum: he has his own form and manner of performing every action of his life; a practised eye can detect him under the most complete outward disguise merely by the fashion in which he fills and smokes his pipe. Traditions are handed on and conformed to by generation after generation of soldiers, just as they are in our public schools. This peculiarity has been noticed and magnified by those who desire to vilify the soldier; they adduce it as an evident sign that he is set apart, and therefore for ever unfitted for practical usefulness. Such a notion only requires to be set down in black and white to be exposed in its utter folly. We firmly believe that the only serious obstacle which can impair the civil usefulness of our soldiers is that, having been taught to depend on superior orders before proceeding to any action, they may feel at a loss and somewhat helpless when the guiding power is withdrawn. We need only see this difficulty to learn to obviate it; let a soldier thoroughly understand the orders given to him, and he will do his work equally well whether he has on a red coat or the more pacific waistcoat of the navvy.

With these ideas of the usefulness of a military life, we can look forward with unalloyed satisfaction to the time when the armies of the Confederacy shall be disbanded, and the victorious soldiers turn their swords into ploughshares. To their individual characters the war need have been nothing but an unmixed benefit; having already been educated up to the average of the country, they required only to learn that ready obedience to the details of the law which cannot be better inculcated than by a thorough course of military discipline. The day will come when the Federal States, overrun with hordes of marauders, half soldiers, half brigands, will look with envy upon the Southern citizen who can see his rifle hanging peacefully over his hearth, and remember the salutary lessons which he learned while he carried it.

A Paid Prophet.—A pleasant correspondence enlivens the columns of the Daily News, wherein Mr. F. W. Newman communicates an extract from a letter from Mr. William Whiting, Solicitor to the War Office in Washington, which Mr. Newman considers may prove of interest 'as showing what a Federal official thinks of the military prospect.' What Federal officials think on the issue of the war is of small interest to anybody, and we question whether Mr. Newman himself can place any faith in their prophecies; if he does, it will only show how a mind eminently sceptical may receive as truth the wildest vaticinations. The extract is remarkable only for the refreshing piety of the Solicitor to the War Office at Washington (a city in which this crowning grace of character is sufficiently rare), and the sweetly hopeful reliance he manifests in Divine Providence, whose purposes he seems so thoroughly to comprehend. After expressing his confidence that Mr. Lincoln will be re-elected, and by 'the permanent establishment of his war policy' will restore the 'dignity and power' of the Government 'on the basis of universal freedom' ('fine words—we wonder where he stole 'em')—which phrase, Mr. Newman tells us, Mr. Whiting emphasises in his MS. 'with a dash'—the Solicitor goes on to predict a peace 'founded on justice and the inalienable rights of man.' It is difficult to understand how peace is to be secured by 'the permanent establishment' of a war policy; but Mr. Whiting knows, we have not a doubt. 'When the civil war, the most terrible dispensation of the Almighty, shall have purged away slavery and all national crime,' &c., &c., says Mr. Whiting, all these fine things he foretells shall come to pass; but if the American war is to go on until it purges Washington of its sin in high places, New England of its Free-love licentiousness and infidelity, Pennsylvania of its peculation, and New York of its hydra-headed immoralities, justice and the inalienable rights of man must wait some time before they can be accommodated.

THE LIVERPOOL BAZAAR.

To the Editor of The Index.

Liverpool: October 3, 1864.

Sir,—The Bazaar which is to be held in this town on the 18th of October in aid of the Southern Relief Fund promises to be a great success. It has been decided to fit up the stalls in a style worthy of the splendour of St. George's Hall. To each State in the Confederacy a stall or set of stalls will be allotted, and the ladies to whom will be committed the care of the stalls will vie with each other in an honourable emulation for the supremacy of their own particular State in abundance of saleable articles and in magnificence of decoration. Contributions are pouring in from all quarters, from the Confederacy, from Canada, France, Switzerland, and even India. The ladies of Nassau, in spite of the terrible affliction which has befallen that region, have sent a second contribution in money, making with the former donation a sum of 1,000*l.* It is to be hoped that all in whom a recollection of the terrible sufferings endured by the gallant soldiers of the South have excited a mingled feeling of admiration and sorrow will strenuously aid as contributors to, or purchasers at, the Bazaar.

No one who has a just appreciation of the noble pride of the people of the Confederate States, of the energy of the Administration, of the unselfish generosity of the non-combatant portion of the inhabitants, of the boundless resources of that rich and powerful country, will commit the error of regarding this offering for the relief of the wounded heroes of the Southern army in the light of a gift of pitying charity to the people of the Confederate States. It is to be regarded, first, as an act of kind and Christian generosity, done in obedience to that law which bids us to do good unto all men; second, as a tribute of admiration and sympathy, apart from all political sentiment, for the bravery, the devotion, and the patient endurance of the Southern army.

CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Manchester: October 5, 1864.

Almost simultaneously with an ominous report of a renewed increase of distress, particularly in Rochdale, there appears in the Manchester Examiner, reprinted, it seems, from one of the New York papers, a characteristic little note recently received by the Hon. James M. Scovell from the M.P. for the much-suffering borough above mentioned. The approaching winter, says the report, threatens to be a severe period of distress for the operatives of Rochdale. But what of that, says Mr. Cobden, if only in the great American struggle 'against exhaustion and ruin' the North 'will be able to hold out longer than the South?' Nearly 4,000 'hands,' says the report, are already completely out of work, being an increase of considerably more than 1,000 since last month. But we must resign ourselves, says Mr. Cobden, to the 'tedious and dreadful process' now going on for the settlement of the American quarrel, a process more 'tedious,' because in the modern development of armaments (Mr. Cobden loq.) there seems to be something which 'favours the defence over attack,' so that 'whichever side is the assailant' seems to be pretty sure of being unsuccessful, and a state of things that (again Mr. Cobden loq.) will make the issue depend on the comparative strength of the resources of the contending parties, and must therefore tend indefinitely to prolong the war. It is not clear at present, adds the report, how this large number of paupers is to be employed, or even maintained, during the ensuing season; especially if, as is too probable, that number eventually includes not only the great majority of all the cotton hands (nearly 7,000), but a larger proportion than before of the woollen operatives upon a further rise in the price of wool. Truly a sorry prospect: and perhaps it was polite as well as characteristic that Mr. Cobden, in writing to Mr. Scovell, should exclude from his sheet of notepaper anything half so disagreeable. What matters it if three-fourths of the 'virtually represented' portion of the honourable gentleman's constituents starve, so long as the North doesn't cease fighting? They for their part must resign themselves to the 'tedious and dreadful process' made necessary by the modern principle which, according to Mr. Cobden, 'favours the attack over defence;' while Mr. Cobden, for his own part, will go on penning little military disquisitions meant to be encouraging, and rejoice at the 'amiability' shown to the younger members of his family by Abraham Lincoln, in indulging their wish by sending over to them the Presidential autograph.

But, aside from Mr. Cobden's sillily-published missives, whether warlike or civil, there is serious cause for apprehension, if not alarm, in the rapidly-growing symptoms of returning distress throughout the manufacturing districts. To avoid the suspicion of accidentally over-stating the case, let me quote two or three short extracts from the Guardian and from Mr. Cobden's favoured organ, the Manchester Examiner:—

The distress in Rochdale (says the Examiner) threatens to be more severe this winter than at any time during the cotton famine. Owing to the mixed nature of the trade, some of the cotton operatives have been enabled to find employment at the woollen mills, this branch of business being comparatively brisk the past two winters. Already, however, one woollen mill has commenced running short time, and others are expected to do the same. The applications for relief, both to the local committees and the Board of Guardians, have considerably increased during the past week. This has also been the case at Ashton-under-Lyne.

And on the following day the same journal was even more disheartening:—

Returns before us from Stockport, Stalybridge, and Accrington and district, all show a falling off in employment, and a corresponding increase in the applications for relief, both to the guardians and to the local committees. Some of the relief committees in this district have no adequate funds to meet even urgent cases; and altogether the prospects for the coming winter are most gloomy.

The Guardian upon the same serious subject has the following:

The return of pauperism in the cotton manufacturing districts, published by the Poor-law Board, shows a very large increase this week. Since the commencement of September, 7,660 paupers have been added to the union relief lists; and of that number, 4,210 are due to the past week. Nineteen unions 'have more paupers.' The largest accessions took place in the Ashton-under-Lyne union, 400; in the Blackburn union, 360, in Manchester, 520; in the Preston union, 760; and in the Stockport union, 370. Nearly half the new additions to the pauper ranks last week were adult able-bodied (1,796); and that class is now swollen to 21,400. The out-relief disbursed by the guardians was 36*2l.* in excess of the expenditure for the third week of September.

As a sample of the weekly rate at which the distress is increasing, take the following returns just made up in Preston. It was officially reported at yesterday's meeting of the Board of Guardians that in the Preston union there were 2,555 cases, representing 6,476 persons who have been relieved during the week, at a cost of nearly 400*l.* As compared with last week, these figures show an increase of 235 cases, 600 persons, and 21*l.* in expenditure. At present the guardians have in their service 500 able-bodied men. The local cotton trade returns made yesterday show that 8,917 operatives were working full time, 1,280 five days a week, 749 four, 5,227 three, 130 two, and that 11,112 are totally unemployed. The number of mills closed is 25. The increase in the number of unemployed is upwards of 1,000 during the week.

At Blackburn, also, affairs wear a very unfavourable appearance, and the operatives are showing some signs of restlessness. On Monday evening about 2,000 of them assembled in the market-place to discuss the means to be taken to provide themselves with the 'common necessaries of life,' many of them asserting that they were actually starving, though exceedingly willing to take any kind of work. An operative named Christopher Marsden was appointed chairman. He said the object of that meeting was to elect deputations to wait upon the corporation to induce them to find employment under the Public Works Act. Several speakers addressed the assemblage, and resolutions were unanimously adopted in accordance with the object of the meeting. It was stated that the Relief Committee would sit to-morrow (Thursday) to hear all applications for relief, it being the first meeting for that purpose since May last.

Professor Goldwin Smith certainly acted prudently in withholding from purely Lancashire readers his long-threatened pamphlet addressed to 'A Whig Member of the Southern Independence Association;' but it may be doubted if he has been decently careful of his reputation in relishing his half-prepared concoction expressly for the Yankee palate, and serving it up seasoned, ad gulam recipientis, with the corsecot of 'buncomb.' The affair, I perceive, has been published in Boston; and a review of it—which reads half like the Professor's too—lays waste nearly half a page of the New York Tribune. Dating from Lancashire, it will not be foreign to the matter if I say that, during the past year, I have been among thousands and tens of thousands of our factory operatives in multitudinous public meetings, who not only understand the American question far better than Mr. Smith appears to do, but of whom it is entirely within compass to say, that very many of them would be quite competent to refute so much of the learned Professor's argument as their homely English self-respect did not bid them treat with contempt.

A meeting of working-men was held a few evenings ago in the assembly rooms, Wigan, to take into consideration their prospects during the coming winter, in view of the continuance of the American war. Mr. Ralph Leigh, manufacturer and cotton spinner, presided on the occasion. The speeches, which were exclusively those of working-men, were strongly in favour of recognition of the Southern States, as a matter of right to the Confederacy, and the only possible means of alleviating the distress in the cotton districts. Some difference of opinion was expressed in the earlier stages of the proceedings, but after a long and good-tempered discussion all opposition was withdrawn, and the several resolutions were passed unanimously, or at all events without contradiction. I have been informed that the factory operatives of Wigan contributed upwards of 10,000 signatures to the Peace Address to the People of the United States. This, too, was in addition to a numerously-signed list supplied by the local gentry and manufacturers in that district. The M.P.s for the borough (General the Hon. James Lindsay and Henry Wood, Esq.) are equally well known as sympathisers with the Confederate cause.

THE AMERICAN QUESTION IN GERMANY.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Frankfort-on-Maine: October 2, 1864.

The quota of the journals favourable to the Confederate cause has been augmented by the Globus, a geographical review under the editorship of Dr. O. Andrée, a scholar of great merit, and whose acquaintance with the Northern States of America is considerable. Dr. Andrée resides at Dresden, and the journal in question is published at M. Meyer's Bibliographical Institute at Hildburghausen.

The twelfth number of the sixth volume contains an article written by the editor, and has for its title, 'Sayings and Doings in Yankeeland.' The summary of this article contains the following passages:—'Three thousand millions of debt and three million soldiers in three years—Fraud practised towards the State creditors at New York—Repudiation—Heaps of taxes; inland tax, encumbrance of inheritances—Police tribulations.'

The above is an analysis of this remarkable article. In the Northern States, one tie after another is being broken in rapid succession, and even the most short-sighted observers in Europe clearly perceive to what result these affairs are now tending. A general bankruptcy appears to be inevitable. During the past three years a debt of more than 3,000,000,000 thalers has been contracted with Prussia. The paper money has lost two-thirds of its value. In July last, the Minister of Finance finding himself to be $86,600,000 in arrears for the payment of the troops and for supplies furnished for purposes of the war, appealed to the nation for a loan of 200 millions—a sum, be it observed, very like in comparison to a sprat in a whale's belly. In this wasting and reckless war—a war which a blind fury and a fanaticism maddened to frenzy wages against the South, which fights for its self-government and its independence—nearly 3,000,000 men have been called to arms by the North, and yet in July last the Confederates approached Washington.

According to certain official communications made to the Congress, the Washington Government has expended upwards of $150,000,000 in enlistment expenses, and a large portion of its armies is made up of European mercenaries, the Northerners preferring to free themselves from the obligation of fighting by the payment of $300.

In the State of New York, wholesale cheating has been already practised towards the State creditors. The two legislative chambers declared (notwithstanding the entreaties of the Governor that they should refrain from committing so grave a fraud) that the interest of the loan should not be paid in cash, as stipulated in the contract, but in paper money (greenbacks). Thus the creditors receive a third part only of the sums due to them.

The political liberty and the fundamental laws of the Federal Constitution are trampled under foot. The Provost-General exercises an arbitrary power over the tribunals, and confiscates or interdicts at his will every journal whose principles he disapproves.

Extracts are then given from the New-Yorker-Staats-zeitung of July relative to the situation of affairs, to Mr. Lincoln, the inland tax, &c. M. Andrée's article thus concludes:—'This will suffice for the present. We regard it as our duty to publish proceedings and opinions respecting which the lackeys of Mr. Lincoln who furnish the German press with New York and Washington correspondence are cautiously silent.'

I enclose an article that lately appeared in the Cölnische Zeitung, which has produced considerable impression here, and a translation of which published in your columns will fairly bring before your readers the progress that the Confederate cause is making in Germany, hitherto the stronghold of the Federals.

THE AMERICAN WAR.

(From the Cölnische Zeitung.)

The following is a translation of the article referred to by our Frankfort correspondent:—

The old Union is out of joint, and the right man for its re-adjustment has not yet been found—neither will he be found. And, notwithstanding the censure to which we may expose ourselves, we venture to affirm that the breach which during past years has been formed between the Northern and Southern States, will not easily be bridged over. Neighbourly and friendly feelings, coupled with alliance, may easily be reestablished; political union never—at all events but for a short period. In this matter numbers do not decide. The confusion of the North is greater than it ever was, and the South is more than ever determined to fight to the last. But however loudly passion may rage, and however great human endurance may prove, still human power ultimately finds its limits; and though on both sides the arm may fall helpless and exhausted, still the victory is with those who fight, and not with those who seek for conquest.

Whatever may be still hidden from us in the future, we take the present appearance of things as a certain indication that sunny days are not in store for the North. The seat of war still occupies the same position, and we may with truth say, that during the last two years little change of any kind has been effected. Continual and desperate fighting, but no progress. Impetuous attacks are made and repelled, and the combatants then return to the positions which they before occupied. Washington is now more seriously menaced than Richmond; invasions by the Confederates in Maryland are not uncommon; Grant lies before Petersburg and Sherman before Atlanta, both unable to effect anything. The principal harbour-towns of the South, Wilmington in North Carolina and Charleston in South Carolina (against the latter of which a useless siege has been directed for more than two years), Mobile in Alabama and Galveston in Texas, are still held by the Confederates. The single exception is that of New Orleans, whose capture was effected by a bold stroke made by Admiral Farragut. The pretended subjugation of Louisiana by the conquest of New Orleans, and the pretended opening of the Mississippi in favour of the Northerners by the occupation of Port Hudson and Vicksburg, have proved to be a deception.

The hero of New Orleans, Admiral Farragut, one of the most resolute and successful combatants of the Union, attacked Mobile some time since, and performed deeds of great valour. Nevertheless, Mobile has not yet fallen—or, at least, it had not fallen at the time when the last news arrived.

Mobile, which before the outbreak of the war was, according to the United States census, the third greatest export town in the Union, is situated on the right bank of the river of the same name, occupying the innermost corner of the Bay of Mobile, about sixty English miles below the confluence of the Alabama and the Tombigbee, near that part where the Mobile stream flows into the bay. At this point is the termination of the Mobile-Ohio railway. The chief article of trade here, formerly, was wool, but other articles, in considerable quantity, were exported for foreign and home use. A better military post than this is not to be found in any part of the Gulf of Mexico. The high land on the western side dries quickly after rain, and at Spring Hill, a few miles distant from the town, is a fountain of clear cool water, from which the town is supplied by means of pipes conveyed beneath the ground. The Bay of Mobile extends from the Gulf of Mexico, and is about thirty English miles in length and twelve miles in breadth. It is connected with the Gulf by two straits, formed by the interposition of the Island of Dauphin which lies between them. The western-most strait is not navigable for ships drawing more than five feet of water; that on the east side, between the island and Mobile Point, has twenty-two feet of water, which diminishes in its depth a short distance beyond that place. In the neighbourhood of the upper end of the bay is a bar, formed by a shallow bank beneath the water, which stretches across the bay, and on which there is a depth of eleven feet of water only. The lighthouse of Mobile Point is situated on the east side of the entrance to Mobile Bay in lat. 30° 11′ 48″ N. and long. 88° 0′ 30″ W. Within the bay, a little to the south of the town of Mobile, is Choctaw Point lighthouse. Fort Morgan is situated on the western side of Mobile Point, on a small tongue of land which stretches out into the Gulf in the form of a crescent. Fort Gaines lies on the eastern end of the Island of Dauphin, at a distance of about three miles and a half from Fort Morgan. The anchorage for shipping is on the inner side of the Island of Dauphin, and is twenty-eight miles distant from the town. The nearer the town is approached the shallower does the water become. There is, however, a canal, leading to the Dog River bar, of sufficient depth for the navigation of ships drawing from ten to twelve feet of water. At this place the mail packets often find it difficult to pass; and from thence to the town there is a depth of water varying from nine to twelve feet. When, however, a strong wind blows from the south or east, the water is driven up from the Gulf, so that at high tide its depth is increased to ten or fifteen feet.

It is held in the Southern States that Mobile could not be easily taken by a fleet alone, as, owing to the shallowness of the water, vessels would be prevented from approaching sufficiently near to the town; the assistance of a land force, and one of considerable strength, would be also necessary to effect its capture. Troops are, indeed, now sent from Pensacola to Mobile, but their numerical strength is inconsiderable.

Thus much for military matters. In order to place before the reader a general view of affairs as they at present stand, the following observations are taken from a private letter, written by a German residing in the North of the Union:—

'The hope entertained that the American war would be soon brought to a close, and the reestablishment of the Union effected by the superior strength of the North, has unfortunately not yet been realised, nor does it seem at all likely, so far as appearances go. The small success hitherto achieved by the North must not be attributed either to a deficiency in military skill or to a want of zeal, but to the difficulties experienced by the troops resulting from a want of union among the Northern populations relative to the object of the war, to the incapacity of a democratic Government, wanting in dictatorial power, to quell a rebellion of so gigantic a nature, and lastly, to the acknowledged inability of the present Government.

'It is the unanimous opinion of several European officers, who have served on both sides, that the American soldiers are not excelled in courage, intelligence, or the endurance of fatigue, by those of any other nation in the world; and, generally speaking, the Northern soldier may be regarded as superior in these qualities to a soldier of the South. On the other hand, the Southerners may boast of more skilful officers, as also of better discipline. The reason of this difference, which indeed shows itself in the Administration as well as in the army, arises from the circumstance that the Southern Government has hitherto been aristocratic, that of the North democratic. These facts give the key to American affairs in general. The majority of the Southern population are governed by the minority of rich slaveholders, who exact from them a mute submission to all their commands. These men, therefore, being free from all the cares which are involved by labour, are in a position either to devote their attention to administrative pursuits, or, by a course of preparation in the three military schools established for the use of the regular army, or the West Point Academy (the North, be it remarked, possesses no schools of this kind), to fit themselves for the military service. If a Southerner be ambitious of political distinction, he has nothing to do but to get himself elected, as magistrate or town councillor, with the view of ultimately becoming a senator of the United States; should he give proof of aptness for his office, he may hold it as long as he pleases. Further, should he entertain a passion for military distinction, he immediately becomes captain of some militia company, exercises himself in fencing and in the chase, applies himself to the study of military works, and sets off to Europe in order to make himself acquainted with the military organisation of the Continent.

'It is quite otherwise in the North. Here, as is well known, we have but little landed property. A man who aspires to independence, and who is desirous of obtaining it in a legitimate way, must devote himself to some commercial or industrial pursuit; and, indeed, those professions which in other countries are regarded as so different from commercial pursuits, such as theology, medicine, law, art, &c., have here, more or less, a mercantile tinge. In politics, however, there is no money to be made; at all events, it cannot be made honourably, for the appointments do not extend over two years, whilst for every office there are at least a hundred candidates, who, on the expiration of the term, again present their applications. These office-hunters, for the most part, consist of briefless barristers, who are without employment, and who make use of every conceivable means to gain their object.

'Hence arises this very marked difference, that whilst political employments in the South are regarded as respectable, in the North they are despised. Should a war break out, then this same class of demagogues immediately make a rush after military employment, each seeking, in a barefaced manner, some office commensurate with his political rank; and although ignorant of the mere alphabet of military science, the Government is generally foolish enough to gratify their demands, lest by refusal they should become its enemies. For example, supposing one of these people to be a member of the Legislature, he is then immediately presented with a colonelcy; should he be a member of the Congress, he is made Major-General; and this to the prejudice of a hundred well-trained officers who are infinitely better qualified to fill such appointments.

'In these ranks are to be found those people to be found who have had some experience in military routine, and who are therefore capable of filling inferior posts, whilst those of a more important character are intrusted only to officers of the regular army. Hence it follows that whereas during peace the Union has been ruled by Southern statesmen, so now in war the Southern army, owing to its superiority to that of the North in discipline, numbers, and equipment, may well continue to hold its ground, nor can it be conquered save by the gradual extirpation of the whole of its people capable of bearing arms.

'In their President, Jefferson Davis, the Southerners possess a skilful, sharp-sighted, and most energetic man, whilst in Lincoln we see a man of mean acquirements, who, before his election to the office of President, was a simple attorney in a small town in the West, and who since his appointment to office has played the part of an unprincipled wriggling jester, engaged solely in reckoning the probabilities of his reelection. And can it be that he is again named a candidate for the Presidency? Yes; not by the people, however, but by his immense troop of servants and officers, whose situations would probably be at stake were Lincoln to be succeeded by a man determined to put a speedy end to the war. The present condition of affairs, thanks to the imbecility of the Government, is a truly desperate one. The 2,000,000 soldiers furnished by the people, and who, under skilful guidance and proper discipline, might have achieved wonders, have melted like butter in the sun; the millions of money assigned to the treasury have flown away like water through the Danaids' sieve. The enormous taxes and the high price of all articles of food have already ruined numerous tradesmen and private persons; for example, many of the West, where the burden of the war is the most heavily felt, especially as the harvest this year, on which many there depend, has been so unfavourable. Articles of common consumption are selling at triple their usual cost. Flour, which formerly sold at from $5 to $6 the barrel, is now sold at from $11 to $12; butter, which was sold at 12 cents the pound, now sells at 35 cents: the price of wood has risen from $3¼ to $8; sugar, which formerly sold at 12 cents, is now sold at 35 cents; coffee, which could formerly be purchased at 20 cents, now sells at 60 cents, &c.'

Surely the war has produced trouble and misery enough, and during the past three years the Americans may be said, with Macbeth, to have had their fill,'and more than their fill, of horrors. At least, one is disposed to think so. Nevertheless, no signs of a cessation of these horrors are apparent. For what can human effort and reason avail, where passion, a low sense of honour, and grovelling selfishness hold their sway?

FIFTY MILES SOUTH OF MACON.

(EXTRACT FROM A PRIVATE LETTER.)

August 12, 1864.

Last Saturday week Mr. N—— came home from Indian Springs, a place forty miles north of Macon, leaving his two daughters at the Springs. He stayed a day in Macon, and heard many rumours of Yankees being expected there, but did not believe them, there are so very many false ones; so we were not at all uneasy at the time of danger, though we had a false alarm afterwards. It seems on that very Saturday there was fighting all day in East Macon; it was attacked, the Yankees imagining it would be easily taken, but not carried. General Johnston was in Macon. Every one did his best; the old men and schoolboys went out to fight, the convalescents in the hospital showing them how. Stoneman commanded in this raid 7,000 men; they destroyed the bridge over the Oconee river of the Savannah and Macon Railway, and a road bridge as well, but were driven back out of Macon in the evening. General Wheeler's cavalry (Confederate) just then arrived from Atlanta, pursued them, took about 1,000 prisoners, and among them Stoneman, who had boasted he would sup in Macon, but did not probably expect it would be as a prisoner. Mr. N——'s Virginian cousin, who is living in Macon with her daughters, refugees from Mississippi and Upper Georgia, had her share of the troubles. Her elder son-in-law was lying wounded at Atlanta; the second was brought in wounded in Saturday's fight, apparently dying. His wife fell ill from the shock. But generally the Southern women do not give way; they think themselves happy to have the chance of nursing their 'own' at home, whatever that home may be. I know one very wealthy lady, who, having lost everything, instead of repining, set to work and earned enough by making artificial flowers of feathers to buy her husband a horse.

Indian Springs is on the way to Macon, and the ladies there expected the raiders. The gentleman who was their sole protector gave us a lively picture of his perplexities. He wished to bring his charge away, but he found that the Government had seized every vehicle; not even a wagon was to be had. Luckily for the ladies, the Yankees left Indian Springs rather on one side (not coming nearer than six miles), in order to cross the Ocmulgee at the most convenient place. They robbed and burned all the way as usual—a factory among other buildings. We heard nothing of all this till midday on Tuesday, for the train never runs on Sunday, and no newspapers came on Monday. On Tuesday morning at daybreak a messenger galloped up to say that the line was cut between us and Macon, and that Mr. N—— was to go to the station with his gun; there were said to be raiders at Hawkinsville. The only other white man, Mr. M——, who was at home on sick leave, went too, leaving us ladies to be protected by two boys of fourteen and twelve, Willie N—— and Peter M——. These boys were most anxious to accompany their fathers, but were persuaded they would be of great use at home. Mrs. N——, not thinking it worth while to attract observation unnecessarily, took down the Confederate flag Willie always has flying on his log-hut. We ladies sat for many hours thus, feeling the Yankees very near indeed. But it was a false alarm; at 1 P.M. the gentlemen returned with the news I have detailed above.

The Federal Slave Trade.—The following is taken from the New York Herald:—'Surplus Recruits Offered.—Watertown, New York, September 8, 1864. For the benefit of localities wanting recruits, I can state that there are four hundred surplus recruits over our quota in the barracks at Sackett's Harbour, and they can be credited to any locality in the State on the payment of eight or nine hundred dollars for each.—John H. Conkling, Chairman of Board of Supervisors of Jefferson County.'

THE ELECTION AND THE CHANCES.

New York: September 18, 1864.

The opposition to M'Clellan within the Democratic party is rapidly subsiding. All idea of active efforts against him is given up by the most determined Peace advocates. The consultations among them, which have been quite active, have resulted in the general agreement not to make or encourage a new nomination. The remaining question among the most impracticable is whether they shall give their votes to M'Clellan at the coming election or not vote at all. Seymour, of Connecticut, and Fernando Wood, of this city—and, indeed, most of the leaders of the uncompromising Peace men of the Middle and Eastern States—have not only publicly acquiesced, but have advised their friends to vote for the ticket, upon the single ground that it is necessary, first and above all things, to displace the Lincoln Administration, before it is worth while to debate upon what shall be done by its successor; and there is no way in which this can be accomplished but by voting for General M'Clellan. The orators at the great meeting in Union Square on Saturday evening condensed the argument in a few telling words. Platforms and candidates are nothing of themselves. What is wanted is success; unless we have a change of rulers, we all perish together. If we beat Mr. Lincoln, we may begin to hope. Let us strike him down first, and not quarrel about the kind of weapon which comes to our hand for us to do it with. When we have got the power to do something, there may be some sense in disputing about what we shall do.

The force of these appeals was already manifested in the immense multitude which gathered in the Square, where they were addressed from ten different stands, who shouted in one place for M'Clellan where they were told by one orator that there never would be peace until the rebels were subdued by force, and the Union must in all events be preserved 'at all hazards;' and in another vociferously applauded the sayings of an orator that Mr. Lincoln had justified the resistance of the South, and that, until his policy was altogether reversed, 'the South will never cease fighting, and never ought to cease fighting,' and then gave three cheers for M'Clellan.

Perhaps the most remarkable speech, as reflecting truly the political character of a large mass of the Opposition, was that of Fernando Wood, who has been the most powerful leader of the Peace men of this State, and was a member of the Chicago Convention. He said, with amazing frankness, that the platform and the candidate of the Convention were not in harmony with each other; but, 'for paramount reasons connected with success, it (the Convention) deemed such a contradictory position reconcilable with good policy.' He proceeded to contend that there was nothing in the terms of General M'Clellan's letter of acceptance which bound him to carry on the war against the public sense of his supporters; and argued that it would be impossible for M'Clellan, when elected, to carry on the war if he should wish it. Hostilities must cease, by moral and political necessities, and the Union must be sought by the old agencies or be lost for ever. I note this as a manifesto for the most influential of the Peace men of New York, explanatory of their reasons for the support of General M'Clellan. They are such as will give him the bulk of the Peace vote. The temper of great masses of the people is so excited against Mr. Lincoln, that they do not scrutinise closely the consistency of the reasons assigned for combining men of opposite opinions against him. This temper, and the alarms which prevail of deadly peril to their own liberties, are suppressing all sense of inferior discords, as a storm at sea sometimes quells a mutiny in the ship's crew.

Unquestionably the M'Clellan demonstration was a magnificent display of popular enthusiasm in this city, and was the more significant because it was attended numerously by merchants and bankers, men of property and substance, citizens who do not usually take part in elections, and some very prominent men who in the beginning were zealous in sustaining Mr. Lincoln. It is an encouraging omen for a large majority for M'Clellan in the city of New York, and gives the sanguine confidence in carrying the State in November.

But calm observers must not overrate these popular ebullitions. They meant something more than they do now, when elections were free, and were decided by the usual agencies of peace. But it is not now that the power of parties, in such a contest as this is to be, can be judged by the comparative strength of their paper resolves, the vehemence of oratorical displays, or superior parading in processions, transparencies, and gun-firing. The value in elections of the popular reaction against Mr. Lincoln which seemed to break out so universally on the selection of General M'Clellan as his opponent, has been tested in two elections in the States of Vermont and Maine, held since the nomination. There is scarcely a perceptible decrease of the party strength which gives Lincoln these States. In each State his friends elect the Governor, both Houses of the Legislature, and all the members in the next Congress. The Democrats had previously one representative in Maine. This they have lost, and the general result is the effective addition, by the transfer of this vote, of two to the already large majority of Congress which the Democrats must overcome in the coming elections in order to enable them to give any effect to those promises of repealing the proscriptive laws which they denounce as making the restoration of peace impossible.

But the Administration does not intend to permit itself to be beaten at the elections. The stake is too mighty to be surrendered while there are any possible means for retaining it, and its means are enormous, compact, and used with audacious and unscrupulous will. It has unlimited powers of corruption, and wields all the tremendous energies of a military dictatorship. The Administration controls the means of living for an immense swarm of officials—an army in time of peace, doubled in number and trebled in zeal by the necessities and hardships of war—making a disciplined corps of pensioned electioneering agents, working day and night for their bread, with which no volunteer association of men can well compete. It has also the handling of a thousand millions of dollars for annual receipt, and again for annual expenditure, out of which the favourites of Government make rapid fortunes. Capitalists throng around to compete with each other for the favour, and whole classes become dependants or expectants, and clamour and pay for the support of the system and the war. It is on this resource that the Administration party relies for the corruption fund by which elections are to be managed, and there is little disguise in the manner they avow and carry out the purpose. Copies have been heretofore published of the circulars sent by the postmaster of this city to the various postmasters in the State, requiring each of them to transmit to him a specified sum, according to the value of the office, to be used for election purposes. The following is of a different class, showing that the system of levying contributions to help the election of Mr. Lincoln reaches to all those who furnish anything to the Government as well as those who are directly employed by it. It is addressed to a dealer in medicines from whom the Government has been buying drugs, and on that contract it establishes a claim to tax him for the benefit of the party in power.

'Rooms of the National Union Executive Committee,
'Astor House, New York, September 15, 1864.
'(Private.)

'Dear Sir,—Your name, with others, has been handed to me as having been employed by the Government in furnishing supplies to the Medical Department of the army during the past year. I take it for granted you appreciate the necessity of sustaining the Government in its contest with the rebellion, and of electing the Union candidates in November, the only mode of carrying the war to a successful close and of restoring a peace which shall also restore the Union.

'I trust you will have anticipated the application now made for a contribution to the fund which we need for organising and carrying on the Presidential canvass. The amount of this contribution I of course leave to yourself. Please remit whatever you feel inclined to give in a cheque, payable to my order as Treasurer of the National Executive Committee. I respectfully ask your immediate attention to this matter, as the need of funds is pressing, and the time for using them is short.—Your obedient servant, 'H. J. Raymond, Chairman.'

This is no local call by obscure partisans. The Committee in whose name it is issued is the Committee appointed by the Baltimore Convention which nominated Mr. Lincoln. The Chairmond, Mr. Raymond, is the editor of the Daily Times of this city, the recognised leader of the party of Mr. Lincoln in the press, and the same gentleman to whom public rumour assigns the post of Minister to France in the event of Mr. Lincoln's success. The letter lays bare the means by which the Administration party expect to raise an enormous election fund. The resource is equal to the most exorbitant demands. It is computed that a poor 5 per cent. on all who receive pay in some form and make profits from Government directly or indirectly, would amount to $50,000,000. Half that sum is attainable if the heads of the party are such as to exact it. Whatever is wanted will be had. In the competition of the purse the advantages of the Administration are immense, and American politics are full of examples of the free use of money and its influence in deciding great results. It is a fact, as notorious as anything can be, which has never been brought to a judicial investigation; but everybody believes, because the facts were as openly talked of at the time as the state of the weather, that the October election in Pennsylvania, preceding the Presidential election of 1856, which determined the result of the November election in favour of Buchanan, was carried for the Democrats by the use of money raised in New York City to determine the course of some saleable politicians who had little organisations to dispose of. The agent in that transaction was Jno. W. Forney, who is now Secretary of the United States Senate, proprietor of two Lincoln newspapers, and manager for Mr. Lincoln in Pennsylvania. Even in this land of popular purity the purse is mighty, and its whole weight in this contest will be summoned without stint or scruple to defeat General M'Clellan. Secondly, the army, in the hands of the Administration, has become a great electioneering machine- first by the control it has established over the votes of the soldiers, and next by its use of the soldiery to constrain the votes of others.

The Democrats were largely moved to the nomination of M'Clellan by the persuasion that it would be a successful appeal to the votes of the soldiers for a favourite general against an unpopular civilian; but it will prove, I think, but a feeble reliance against the energy with which the M'Clellan vote in the army will be steadily repressed by the Government. The intimidation began long ago in the frequent dismissal or systematic persecution of officers who expressed political opinions adverse to the Administration. More than two years ago there was issued a special order (No. 110) from the War Department, giving a list of dismissed officers with the causes of their dismissals. The following is a true extract:—

'War Department, Adjutant-General's Office,
'Washington, March 13, 1862.
'(Special Orders No. 110.)

'By direction of the President, the following officers are hereby dismissed the service of the United States.

. . . . . .

'Lieutenant A. G. Edgerly, Fourth New Hampshire Volunteers, for circulating copperhead tickets and doing all in his power to promote the rebel cause in his State.

'By order of the Secretary of War,
'L. Thomas, Adjutant-General.'

The offence of Lieutenant Edgerly thus described was simply that when home on leave he was active as a citizen at the polls. At the same election, the Administration sent home a large number of New Hampshire Republican soldiers, expressly to be in the State to help the Republican ticket. The three United States officers at the Military Academy at West Point, who insisted on their selection of General M'Clellan as the orator at the Battle Monument ceremonial this summer, have now been one after the other displaced or disgraced, and it is felt throughout the army that not to be politically in favour of the Administration is to be marked for neglect and persecution. With the exception of two or three officers too high in position to be touched, or too necessary to be spared, the friends of M'Clellan are either silenced or retired out of prominent positions. All the pressure of military discipline, enforced where the rule of the superior is the supreme law and touches every private soldier in his daily routine every hour of his life, is brought to direct the political action and constrain the votes of the army. We have it already averred that a company of men who hastily expressed their joy at the nomination of M'Clellan were abruptly marched out to a field of double toil and exposure, and such actions are not at all improbable in the class of pothouse politicians who have obtained commands in the army. Under these obstructions it is not likely that any very strong vote will be cast for M'Clellan by the army, even though it be much larger than was cast for Democratic candidates at the last elections. The army vote was nearly unanimously for the Lincoln candidates, in most cases superfluously, for they were already largely ahead on the House vote.

The use of the army vote to constrain the votes of citizens, and to control the elections within the States, is another formidable danger, against which the Democrats are provided with nothing for defence but appeals to the resentment of the people, and deeply muttered threats not to be bound by an election which shall have been carried by such means.

Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri are examples of States whose most recent elections were carried for the Administration by the action of the military agents of the Federal Government intruding upon State authority, directing State politics, proscribing opponents, and driving them away from the polls. Military terrorism has ruled the elections in those four States directly, with the help of martial law proclaimed in two of them, Kentucky and Missouri. The Chicago Convention recorded its apprehension of a renewal of these proceedings and a renewed success in its third resolution, by declaring them to be a 'shameful violation of the Constitution,' and resolving that a repetition in the approaching election 'will be held to be revolutionary, and resisted with all the means and power under our control.' But they omitted to enumerate what those means and power are, and how they would be applied in order to resist the 'revolution.'

The audacity of the Administration has gone a step further in the attempt to control by intimidation the votes of States wherein there has been no armed rebellion at any time, but which are proscribed because their population is suspected of a disaffection towards the Administration which might affect its electoral vote. In the military district composed of the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan, the two States of Indiana and Illinois are ordinarily Democratic. For two years the Republicans have been forming party associations under the name of Loyal Leagues, of which one of the articles of agreement is, that each man should fully equip himself with arms. Morton, the Republican Governor of Indiana, at the same time organised a voluntary State militia, to be called the Home Guard, who were supplied with arms by the general Government. Democrats organising themselves into companies under the law were refused the arms, so that the Home Guard and the Loyal Leagues are mere Republican associations armed at the Government expense. Lately it was pretended to be discovered that Democratic associations were importing arms for themselves. An arbitrary and lawless seizure was made of the arms which were the grounds of the suspicion; and General Heintzelman, the United States commander of the Military Department, has prohibited the bringing into any of the States of his department of any kind of implement or munitions of war, except by the written permission of the military authorities. It is not difficult to see how this intimidation of one party, by leaving it without the means of self-defence while the other is fully armed and equipped and assured of the support of the army in any case of difficulty, will affect the results of voting where an election might otherwise be doubtful. The chances are that the weaker and defenceless party will stay away from the polls, and the Administration obtain a triumph without the necessity of employing directly the force which will have effected the object.

I know the Democrats are protesting valiantly that they will not submit to this, that it is revolutionary, and will be resisted at all hazards. It may be so; but the question rises again, how, and at what point? These are after-questions. I make this recapitulation now of the vast means which the Administration has for controlling elections in order to estimate the probable chances which exist for displacing it, its capacity to secure the number of electoral votes, cast with the forms of an election, which will give it that title of legality that can only be overthrown by a revolutionary seizure of the Government, constituting civil war, in the North.

The aspects of the case seem to me, at this time, to be decidedly favourable to the success of Mr. Lincoln. He cannot be defeated but by a thorough, practical, efficient, enthusiastic organisation everywhere, of which, through all the vapouring and speech-making, I do not yet see the signs, and with means which I cannot imagine them capable of finding.

The number of electoral votes to be contended for is 231, of which 116 make a majority. I include the five votes of West Virginia, because the law of Congress, which undertakes to regulate the manner of determining this election, recognises West Virginia as a State. It will be another question if that vote, cast by a State unconstitutionally torn away from the State of Virginia, shall become important in the result.

In the light of all the recent elections, Mr. Lincoln is sure of the thirty-nine votes of the six New England States. I know the Democrats say they have a chance for Connecticut, which they contended for last year with a Peace Democrat and were beaten, and again this year with a War Democrat, and were further beaten still. But it is idle to speculate on chances. The six New England States must, in all fairness, be allowed to Mr. Lincoln, with thirty-nine votes.

By the same rule of calculation, taking the results of the last elections as the basis, and estimating the power of the Administration to repeat its system of operations successfully, the Border States may be set down as most likely to vote for Mr. Lincoln. These States are Delaware (3), Maryland (7), West Virginia (5), Kentucky (11), and Missouri (11)—37 votes more. The Democrats say they are going to wrest some of these States from Mr. Lincoln. But it is not disputable that he is in full possession now, and with great means for keeping them.

There are seven other States—viz., Kansas (3), California (5), Minnesota (4), Iowa (8), Wisconsin (8), Michigan (8), and Oregon (3)—in which the Administration ticket has been successful at every election since Mr. Lincoln's accession. In one or two small ones the tickets have been mixed, but at no election has a Democratic or mixed Conservative ticket been successful. Reasoning on the same rule of probabilities, Lincoln has much the better chance for these 39 votes than M'Clellan.

Mr. Lincoln therefore goes into the canvass with six New England States and seven Western States—78 votes, which have never failed to be cast for his party since it was organised at Chicago in 1860—and with five Border States having 37 votes which he holds absolutely at his disposal. Here are already 115 of the 116 votes required to elect him, for which he has a resource in New York (33), which, at the last general election, gave nearly 30,000 majority for his friends; Pennsylvania, which gave the same party over 15,000 majority; and Ohio, which gave them over 100,000 majority.

Indiana (13) and Illinois (16) gave Democratic majorities at their last general elections. New Jersey (7) is the only State which voted against Lincoln at the elections, and it has consistently voted against him at every election since.

By this review of the political status of the several States as they were at their last previous elections, it will be seen that Mr. Lincoln has vastly the advantage in the settled preferences of Republican States; and by his control over the suffrages of the Border States, amounting to 115 votes, and that of the remaining States, only one with 7 votes is positively, by the same standards of judgment, to be assigned to M'Clellan. Of the remaining States, all are more or less debatable, and all of the larger ones must be carried for M'Clellan to give him a chance of success. The carrying of either of the three largest—New York, Pennsylvania, or Ohio—by Mr. Lincoln would enable him to dispense with several of the smaller, and make the disputes about legality therein immaterial in their effect on the general issue.

These are the present data of the problem, and I give them to you as material to aid you in tracing out the course of this campaign. They may be changed by sudden events or unexpected combinations. The air is full of portentous warnings of both. But, as things now stand, the success of Mr. Lincoln in obtaining the number of electoral votes necessary to a reelection is the thing most probable. What may follow in the event, and the processes by which it will be brought about, is a graver question, not to be discussed in the close of a letter already too long.

The Treasury Department has suspended the usual weekly publication of the condition of the finances. The last statements have shown a rapid increase of arrearages for unpaid requisitions; and, from the disappointment in the income anticipated from the new tax and tariff bills, which leaves no resource but in the expansion of the currency by further issues of greenbacks, the public debt is growing at the rate of nearly two millions a day—a state of things which the Government thinks it expedient to conceal as far as it can. There is semi-official promise in some of the papers that the reports will be made monthly—that is, there will be one more report made before the election. We shall see whether a way will not be found to evade this undertaking. The condition of the finances will not bear inspection; but, while the canvass is going on, the Administration presses will maintain every day that all things are doing well, and it is 'copperhead' disloyalty to doubt it.

ARREST OF AN EDITOR BY GENERAL PAINE.

(From the Gallatin County [Illinois] Democrat, August 30.)

On Friday, the 19th instant, as we were sitting quietly in our office attending to our own business, our office was surrounded by a squad of soldiers, under command of Lieutenant J. E. Chapman of the 139th Illinois. The lieutenant, with his men, rushed into our office, and told us that he was ordered to arrest us and take us to General Paine, then at Casseyville, Kentucky. We remonstrated with the lieutenant, telling him that he certainly had no authority to arrest us and carry us out of the State; that my wife was lying dangerously ill; and that, under the circumstances, we would beg him to take our parole of honour to report at Paducah at any designated time; but all to no purpose. Myself and printer were hurried aboard some transports (some seven in number), then lying at the wharf loaded with soldiers, whose ostensible purpose was to effect the arrest of myself, printer, and E. F. Armstrong. After we were placed aboard the transports, we were all placed under strict guard, and were soon on our way to Paducah. Arrived there Sunday morning, we were taken ashore and paraded through the principal streets, evidently to the delight of those that had us arrested, and to the negro soldiers particularly, who seemed to have special orders to taunt us with opprobrious epithets. We were finally brought before one Major Bartling, Provost-Marshal of Paducah, who, without any ceremony whatever, ordered us to the Military Prison. We were then marched through the streets to the prison, and, arriving there, were thrust into the prison (amid the yells and taunts of negro soldiers), containing some fifty or sixty persons—some citizens, some guerillas, some rebel soldiers, some deserters from the Federal army, some negro soldiers, and some for stealing, &c. Here we were kept in filth and privation until 10 o'clock Tuesday morning, when we were called for and taken into the presence of General Paine, who hailed us with 'I am going to send you d——d sons of b——s home.' Here ended the whole affair, adding but another to the great list of public wrongs done to private citizens by those who had solemnly sworn to protect and defend them. General Paine told us we were charged with being a member of the Sons of Liberty. This was the only charge against us—which was not substantiated—and our release followed as a matter of course.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

Wednesday Evening.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

The money market within the last few days has become slightly easier. Previous to the 4th of the month the applications for discount were rather heavy, both at the Bank and in Lombard Street; but since then there has been much less pressure, and quotations out of doors are gradually declining. The worst of the failures, through the Leeds Banking Company, are believed to have been worked out, and though occasionally other suspensions may be reported, the mischief created by that gigantic suspension is believed to have been pretty well exhausted. Trade is not so sound as could be wished, because of the speculation in cotton and the decline in produce. But it is still hoped that the year will terminate without any great addition to our mercantile disasters, since the markets altogether are in a sensitive position. Still it must be confessed that with the late overweight of securities in circulation, a decline even in some of the best must take place, and complaints are made that several of the Banks and Finance Companies are refusing further advances. The terms for first-class paper are about $8\frac{3}{4}$ to $8\frac{7}{8}$ per cent., and as we are approaching the payment of the dividends, some are sanguine enough to expect a reduction in the official minimum. At the Stock Exchange the rates for short advances are from 5 to 6 per cent.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The improving aspect of the bullion market continues, and the influx of gold is not now much affected by the withdrawals from the Bank to supply foreign wants; but this is mainly to be attributed to the high rate of discount. The amount sent into the Bank this week has been 344,000*l.*, whilst the withdrawals have been only 10,000*l.* The arrivals of specie this week have been very limited, comprising only 66,800*l.* from New York, 9,396*l.* from the Brazils, and 3,067*l.* from Alexandria, making a total of 79,263*l.* The shipments to the East by the present mail amount to 110,033*l.*, the proportion of silver being 103,132*l.*, and of gold 6,901*l.* The quantity to India is 55,977*l.*, to China 31,579*l.*, to Singapore 16,750*l.*, to Alexandria 4,200*l.*, and to Point de Galle 1,527*l.* The packet for the West Indies took out 7,430*l.*, of which 2,000*l.* was in gold and 5,430*l.* in silver. The silver market remains very quiet: for bar there has been very little demand, and the price is unchanged. Some Mexican dollars have been disposed of for China at 60*d.* per oz., being a decline of $\frac{3}{8}$d. as compared with previous sales. The only gold ship at present advised from Australia is the J. E. H., with 44,000*l.*

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The more satisfactory aspect of monetary and commercial affairs within the last two or three days has had a most beneficial effect upon the English funds, and a rather extensive business has been transacted at gradually improving rates. To-day the market opened with a very buoyant aspect, at a further advance in Consols of $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., but the rise brought forward sellers, and there was subsequently a relapse, but prices closed firm, Consols being $88\frac{1}{2}$ to $88\frac{5}{8}$ for both money and account, which, as compared with this day week, is an improvement of $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. Exchequer bills are also firmer, the March issue being 7*s.* to 3*s.* dis., and those of June at 18*s.* to 10*s.* dis. In the foreign stock market business has again become more active, but the transactions, comparatively, have not been so extensive as in the other departments. Prices, however, for most of the leading descriptions continue to improve, though the transactions have not been extensive. The chief changes comprised an advance of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in Mexican, $\frac{3}{8}$ per cent. in Spanish Passives, $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. in the Certificates, and the same in Greek. Turkish remain very steady at previous quotations. The closing prices this evening were, Greek stock at $23\frac{1}{4}$ to $23\frac{1}{2}$, Mexican at $27\frac{3}{8}$ to $27\frac{5}{8}$, Spanish Passives at $31\frac{1}{2}$ to $31\frac{3}{4}$, Ditto Certificates at $13\frac{7}{8}$ to $14\frac{1}{8}$, Turkish Six per cents. of 1854 are $90\frac{1}{2}$ to $91\frac{1}{2}$, and those of 1862 70 to $70\frac{1}{2}$.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The business transacted in American Government and Railway securities has again been to a fair extent, but in the majority of instances prices have a declining tendency. The brokers are still very shy of this class of investments, and under the circumstances any extensive dealings in them cannot be expected. The sales this week have comprised United States of 1881 at $44\frac{1}{4}$, $43\frac{1}{8}$, 43, $43\frac{1}{2}$, $43\frac{1}{2}$, $43\frac{1}{8}$, $43\frac{1}{2}$, 43, and $43\frac{1}{2}$; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York section, first mortgage, at 75; do. do., second mortgage, at 68, $67\frac{3}{4}$, and $68\frac{1}{2}$ ex div.; do. do., Pennsylvania section, at 76, $73\frac{1}{2}$, and 73 ex div.; and Illinois Central, $100 shares, all paid, at $48\frac{1}{2}$, $48\frac{1}{4}$, $49\frac{1}{2}$, 50, $50\frac{1}{4}$, 51, and $50\frac{1}{2}$.

CONDITION OF THE CROPS.

The Department of Agriculture at Washington has issued a report on the condition of the principal autumn crops on September 1. We subjoin some extracts from which it will be seen that the crops are below the average, and that they have been considerably injured.

Corn.—Below the common average condition, such as seen in the crop of 1862, are: Michigan, $3\frac{1}{2}$ tenths, or 35 per cent.; Maryland, 3 tenths; Kansas, $2\frac{3}{4}$ tenths; Missouri, $2\frac{1}{2}$ tenths; New Hampshire, New York, New Jersey, and Nebraska Territory, 2 tenths each; Maine, Indiana, and Ohio, $1\frac{1}{2}$ tenths each; Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Kentucky, 1 tenth each; Pennsylvania and Illinois, $\frac{2}{3}$ of a tenth each; West Virginia, $\frac{1}{2}$ of a tenth; while Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Delaware, and Iowa, are a full average. The returns show that the injuries are greater than the condition is below an average.

Tobacco.—Below the average condition are: Missouri, $3\frac{1}{2}$ tenths, or 35 per cent.; Nebraska Territory, 3 tenths; Michigan, $2\frac{1}{3}$ tenths; Rhode Island, New Jersey, Maryland, Delaware, Kentucky, Ohio, and Indiana, 2 tenths each; New Hampshire, New York, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, Kansas, and West Virginia, 1 tenth each; Illinois, $\frac{1}{2}$ of a tenth; whilst Massachusetts, Connecticut, Iowa, and Minnesota are a full average. The injuries to this crop are greater than their condition is below the average.

Sorghum.—Below the average condition are: Michigan, $2\frac{1}{2}$ tenths, or 25 per cent.; Wisconsin, 3 tenths: New York and Kansas, 2 tenths; Indiana, $1\frac{2}{3}$ tenths; Maryland, Ohio, Illinois, Iowa, and Nebraska Territory, 1 tenth each; Illinois, $\frac{2}{3}$ of a tenth; New Jersey, $\frac{1}{2}$ of a tenth; whilst Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Kentucky, and West Virginia are a full crop. The injuries to this crop also are greater than their condition is below the average.

Cotton.—Below an average condition are: Kentucky, 3 tenths; Massachusetts and Delaware, 2 tenths each; Illinois and Missouri, 1 tenth each; and Kansas and West Virginia are a full average.

Potatoes.—This crop has suffered more than any other, for, in addition to the injury from drought, the potato bug has committed very great depredations in the Western States. Below the average condition are: Missouri, $5\frac{1}{2}$ tenths, or 55 per cent.; Michigan and Nebraska Territory, 5 tenths each; Maryland and Kansas, 4 tenths each; Indiana, $3\frac{2}{3}$ tenths; New Hampshire, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, Kentucky, and Iowa, 3 tenths each; Maine, Delaware, and Illinois, $2\frac{1}{2}$ tenths each; Ohio and Wisconsin, $2\frac{2}{3}$ tenths each; Pennsylvania, 2 tenths; Connecticut, $1\frac{3}{4}$ tenths; Massachusetts, $1\frac{1}{2}$ tenths; Vermont, $1\frac{1}{2}$ tenths; and Minnesota and West Virginia, 1 tenth each. This crop has also sustained injuries greater than the condition is below the average.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

This stock, in common with most others of a speculative kind, has suffered a heavy fall; the price at one time touched 58, but recovered again to 65. To-day the market is again flat, and we quote $62\frac{1}{2}$, $63\frac{1}{2}$.

TENDERS FOR BILLS ON INDIA.

The biddings for 30,00,000 rupees in bills on India took place to-day at the Bank of England. The proportions allotted were:—To Calcutta, 17,65,000, rupees; to Bombay, 12,00,000 rupees; and to Madras, 35,000 rupees. The minimum price was as before, 1*s.* $11\frac{1}{2}$d. per rupee on Calcutta and Madras, and 1*s.* $11\frac{3}{4}$d. on Bombay. The applications within the limits amounted to 77 lacs. Tenders on Calcutta and Madras at 1*s.* $11\frac{7}{8}$d will receive about 69 per cent., on Bombay at 1*s.* $11\frac{7}{8}$d. about 37 per cent., and all above these prices in full.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

The railway share market, in sympathy with the other departments, has greatly improved within the last two or three days; not only have the dealings considerably increased, but prices have as rapidly advanced. In nearly all descriptions prices have risen, and the market closed with a further upward tendency. As compared with last week, there has been an improvement of 4 per cent. in Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, and Metropolitan; of 3 per cent. in London and North Western, Midland, and Birmingham and Derby; of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in Lancashire and Yorkshire; of 2 per cent. in London and South Western; of 1 per cent. in Great Eastern, Great Northern, Great Western, West Midland (Oxford), North Eastern (Berwick), do. do. (York), and North Staffordshire; of $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. in South Eastern, and of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in East Anglian, London and Brighton, and North Eastern (Leeds). On the other hand there has been a decline of 1 per cent. in Edinburgh and Glasgow, and Great Southern and Western. Foreign shares have been rather more quiet, but prices have slightly improved in most instances. Indian and Canadian descriptions have been more in request, at advanced quotations.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES, &c.

At the ordinary general meeting of the Crystal Palace Gas Company, a dividend was declared at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum on the preference capital, and 10 per cent. on the ordinary capital of the company, both free of income-tax.—At an extraordinary general meeting of the Egyptian Trading Company the report of the directors was adopted, and a dividend at the rate of 2*s.* 6*d.* per share free of income-tax declared. At the first ordinary general meeting of the shareholders of the Land Mortgage Bank of India, the report of the directors was unanimously adopted. The chairman said he attributed the limited success hitherto achieved to the prevalence of the high rates which had unexpectedly ruled for exchange in India on London, which had prevented the raising of money on debentures. On the other hand, he showed that the bank stood high in public estimation, and was becoming more and more known in India. The first annual meeting will be held in April next, when a dividend will be declared. At an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders of the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China, held to-day, a very satisfactory statement was presented and accepted. It showed that the undivided profit from the previous half year was 13,064*l.* The profits for the six months ending June 30 amounted to 68,022*l.*, being at the rate of nearly $18\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. A dividend at the rate of 15 per cent. per annum free of income-tax was declared, leaving a balance of 26,544*l.* to be carried forward.—At the half-yearly meeting to-day of the Great Western Railway of Canada, the report, which was unanimously adopted, showed that the receipts on capital account during the half year amounted to 1,138*l.* 19*s.* 10*d.*, and the total receipts to July 31 were 5,218,356*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.* The aggregate expenditure to the same date amounted to 5,074,004*l.* 5*s.* 7*d.*, leaving a balance to the credit of the capital account of 144,352*l.* 9*s.* 7*d.*

MERCANTILE SUSPENSIONS.

The following mercantile suspensions have been announced during the week, viz.:—Messrs. Ogle & Co., East India merchants, of Great St. Helen's, with liabilities extending to about 500,000*l.*—Messrs. Early & Smith, of Houndsditch, export clothiers, with about 100,000*l.* liabilities.—Messrs. Hall & Jones, of Liverpool, in the sugar trade. The debts and liabilities are put down at 500,000*l.*—Messrs. Walker, Cotesworth, & Co., of Liverpool, in the cotton trade. Liabilities between 500,000*l.* and 600,000*l.*—Mr. Julius Mendel, of London, commission merchant, with 40,000*l.* liabilities.—Messrs. Westall Brothers, of Manchester, commission merchants and manufacturers, with liabilities to about 100,000*l.*—Mr. Solomon, of Old Change, in the drapery trade, with liabilities reaching to about 60,000*l.*

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

The produce trades continue in the same state of inactivity as noticed for some time past. If anything, the tone during the last day or two has in several departments been firmer, with rather more enquiry on the part of buyers, but there has been no recovery in prices, and no extension of business worth naming. Imports during the week have been moderate only, and clearances from warehouse have somewhat increased, but stocks are well kept up, and in many cases are in excess of those of last year at this period. The grain markets have acquired a stronger bearing, the recent heavy importations of foreign produce having been to some extent worked down, whilst the farmers have shown a disinclination to bring forward supplies at present prices. Purchases are, however, made in the same cautious spirit as they have been for some time past, and, whilst firmer, the markets are still inactive. Cotton has gone slightly dearer yesterday and to-day, partly under the influence of light arrivals and partly on advices from Alexandria quoting an advance there. As a consequence, the principal improvement has been in Egyptian. The provision trades in general have remained steady. In American bacon purchases are confined to short middles, rib in, at 44*s.* to 45*s.* per cwt. Mess beef has given way 2*s.* to 2*s.* 6*d.* per cwt., but is more saleable at the decline. American butters meet a good demand, and are very firm in price, 86*s.* to 112*s.* per cwt. according to quality. Cheese is also in good demand at full prices. In petroleum there is not a great deal passing, but rates are maintained, American refined being quoted 2*s.* per gallon on the spot, and 2*s.* 1*d.* last three months. Crude remains at 17*l.* 10*s.* per tun. Scarcely any variation has taken place in the value of oils, the trade in every description remaining extremely quiet. The tallow market has exhibited increased heaviness and prices have receded 6*d.* per cwt. for both immediate and future delivery. The metal market shows no indication of improvement. Stagnation is general, and relieved only at intervals by forced sales at reduced prices. The selling has been principally in Scotch pig iron, which has suffered rather a decided fall, the quotation this afternoon being 54*s.* 6*d.* cash. Spelter is quoted nominally 23*l.* 10*s.*, and foreign tin 98*l.* per ton. Gums of most kinds are rather easier in price, but without any important depression. Cutch has receded to 22*s.* and 22*s.* 6*d.* for good Pegu. Public tea sales have progressed steadily, with a moderate demand. Sugar has further given way 6*d.* per cwt., but the enquiry is rather more active at the close. Coffee maintains its value, and the demand keeps pace with supply. Jute is more in request, and at the sales to-day prices in some instances showed a recovery of 10*s.* to 20*s.* per ton. In drugs and chemicals the variations have been trifling. Soda crystals continue to sell freely at 4*l.* 15*s.* ex ship.

Liverpool, Wednesday, October 5.—There is not much improvement to notice in the state of our cotton market, though the tendency is, if anything, slightly better. Business, however, continues greatly depressed in consequence of the general stagnation of trade in the other departments and the continued high value of money. In the early part of the week some sales were effected at very low figures, even as compared with previous rates; but it is thought, now that confidence is partially restored, an improvement may be looked for. American cotton has been in rather more demand this week for export chiefly for New York, and to a moderate extent to the trade; but the offers being large quotations have rather declined. The sales this week have been again but moderate, amounting to only 26,000 bales, of which 10,500 were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year up to the present time have been 1,980,136 bales, and to the same period in 1863 they were 1,913,479 bales. There have been imported this year 1,769,654 bales, against 1,172,592 last year. The trade have taken this year 1,214,695 bales, and to the same period in 1863, 1,022,144 bales. The exports this year so far have been 420,116 bales; last year they were 347,488 bales. There have been taken on speculation this year 332,815 bales, and in 1863, 506,297 bales. The estimated stocks at the present time are 412,467 bales, and at the same time last year they were 193,060 bales. The latest quotations were, for American descriptions, 23½d. to 26d.; Pernambuco, 23½d. to 26d.; Maceio, 21¼d. to 21½d.; Bahia, 21¾d.; Egyptian, 14¾d. to 25¾d.; Smyrna, 13¼d. to 14d.; Surats, 10½d. to 19d.; Madras, 14¾d. to 15d.; Bengal, 10d. to 10¾d.; Scinde 10¼d. to 10¾d.; and China, 13d. to 14d.

Business at Manchester continues very depressed, but a slightly improved feeling has prevailed within the last day or two, in consequence of the generally better state of financial affairs. The gloom caused by the recent failures appears to be passing away, under the impression that for the present the worst has been seen. There has been rather more business doing in shipping yarns, but still there is no stability in prices, which continue very depressed. Nevertheless, there is more disposition on the part of spinners to effect sales, some showing an inclination to accept lower terms than ruled a week ago, but others refuse to deal except at an advance. In home trade yarns there is but little doing, buyers showing no disposition to operate with freedom. For the little business done, spinners, however, have obtained rather increased rates in some few instances, but the improvement is far from general. In cloths there has been more business doing than for some time past, but there has been no improvement in prices; in fact, most of the transactions have been at rates lower than those previously quoted. Stocks have been greatly reduced, but there is sufficient pressure to affect prices unfavourably. There are now so many mills standing, or working only short time, that the produce offered is not more than one third to one half of the usual supply. The latest quotations were for $\frac{7}{8}$ Grey Printers, 6s. 9d. to 13s. 7½d., according to quality; $\frac{9}{8}$ Grey Madapollams, 5s. 9d. to 8s. 9d.; $\frac{9}{8}$ Grey Printers, 9s. to 16s.; $\frac{5}{4}$ Grey Shirtings, 10s. 9d. to 22s. 6d.; Water Twist, No. 20, 1s. 8d. to 2s. 4d.; No. 30, 2s. 1d. to 2s. 7d.; and No. 40, 2s. 7d. to 3s. 1d.; Mule Twist, No. 20, 1s. 6d. to 2s. 1½d.; No. 30, 1s. 8½d. to 2s. 4d.; No. 40, 1s. 11d. to 2s. 7d.; No. 50, 2s. 2d. to 2s. 10d.; No. 60, 2s. 5d. to 3s.; No. 70, 2s. 8d. to 3s. 2d.; No. 80, 2s. 10d. to 3s. 4d.; No. 90, 3s. to 3s. 6d.; and No. 100, 3s. 3d. to 4s. The actual decline in prices during the past month has been, in cloths, about 2s. per piece on $\frac{7}{8}$ Printers; 1s. 6d. to 2s. on Madapollams; 1s. 9d. to 2s. 6d. on $\frac{9}{8}$ Printers; 3s. to 4s. on Indian Shirtings up to 7 lbs.; and 4s. to 5s. on the heavier weights; 3s. to 4s. on Figured Shirtings; 9d. to 1s. on Jacconets; 9d. to 1s. on Mules; 1s. 6d. to 2s. on T Cloths; 2s. to 4s. on Long Cloths; and ½d. to 1d. per yard on Domestics. Yarns have declined about 7d. to 8d. per lb. for India counts; about 4d. to 5d. per lb. on the lowest descriptions, already comparatively cheap a month ago; and as much as 9d. to 11d. per lb. on the fine Bolton counts.

It is intended to hold a Bazaar in St. George's Hall, on the 18th inst., in Aid of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund. Many Ladies, in addition to those named, have promised their active aid.

The suffering of the Southern Prisoners of War in sickness, wounds, and deprivation of every comfort of life; the multitudes of widows to whom nothing remains and of orphans unable to help themselves - form an amount of woe, which some who are blessed here with abundance and peace have felt a desire to alleviate.

Efforts have already been made, and not without success, through reliable friends in the Northern States, but unhappily the field is so wide that aid is now required to replace the means already provided and exhausted.

It is hoped that you will not refuse your assistance in this work of humanity. The Committee will be glad to hear in what form you will aid them, if disposed to do so, and will attend at once to any suggestion with which you may oblige them.

REGULATIONS TO CARRY INTO EFFECT THE ACT TO IMPOSE REGULATIONS UPON THE FOREIGN COMMERCE OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES, TO PROVIDE FOR THE PUBLIC DEFENCE, APPROVED FEBRUARY 6, 1864.

I.—As to the Sea.

1. The owners of any vessel intending to sail from a Confederate port with a cargo consisting in whole or in part of cotton, tobacco, military and naval stores, sugar, molasses, or rice, shall, before the lading on board of any such articles, file with the collector of the port from which the vessel is to sail a copy of her register, with a declaration of the names of the owners and officers thereof, the place of their birth, and of their residence for the preceding year, together with the port or place to which the said vessel proposes to sail. The said declaration shall also set forth the quantity and value, in Confederate currency, of the cargo proposed to be taken out, as also the consent of the said owners that one-half of the tonnage of the said vessel may be employed by the Confederate Government for its own use, both on the outward and homeward voyage, at the rate of freight hereinafter mentioned. The collector shall submit a statement as to the owners and officers to the military commandant of the port; and if he shall not object to their loyalty, or to the sailing vessel, for reasons of military necessity, the collector shall grant a permit for the lading of said vessel, one-half for account of the owners, and one-half for account of the Confederate States.

2. Before the said lading shall be completed, the owners of the vessel shall execute to the Confederate States a bond in one-half the value of the vessel, with security deemed adequate by the collector, conditioned that she will pursue the voyage designated, and that she will return with reasonable despatch to a Confederate port, after her outward cargo shall be discharged, with a cargo consisting one-half of articles not prohibited by the laws of the Confederate Government, and the other half of such articles as the Government shall offer for shipment from such port, at the rate of freight hereinafter mentioned.

3. Each shipper of any portion of the cargo proposed to be laden on board the said vessel shall, before the lading thereof, make application to the collector for a permit to lade the same; which application shall declare the articles to be shipped, and the quantity and value thereof in Confederate currency, the port of destination, and the name of the consignee. A permit shall then be granted by the collector, if the application is deemed satisfactory. The lading shall be had under the inspection of a revenue officer, who shall be charged with the duty of seeing that the goods laden conform to the permit.

4. Before the completion of the lading on board, or the granting a clearance, each shipper of any portion of the cargo shall execute and deliver to the collector a bond to the Confederate States, in one-half the value of his shipment in Confederate money, with security deemed adequate by the collector, with condition that at least one-half the net proceeds of said shipment shall be invested in goods or articles not prohibited by law; and said goods or articles shall be shipped by the same or some other vessel to the Confederate States within sixty days from the unlading of said cargo.

5. The freight to be paid by the Confederate States on all cotton and tobacco shipped from a Confederate port shall be fivepence sterling per pound, payable on delivery at the port of destination, in coin or sterling exchange. Return freight shall be at the rate of 20*l.* per ton, payable on its delivery in a Confederate port, in cotton, at twelvepence sterling per pound for middling uplands, and at a proportionate price for cotton of other qualities; or, at the option of the Government, in specie or sterling exchange. In calculating the ton of freight by weight, 2,240 pounds shall be allowed; by measure, forty cubic feet shall be allowed.

6. The rates of freight for articles other than cotton and tobacco shall be adjusted at the same relative rate, and payable in the same way.

7. The Government reserves the right to limit or prohibit the shipment of rosin, turpentine, or any manufacture thereof, whenever deemed dangerous to its own shipment.

8. Upon the completion of the lading of the vessel, and before receiving her clearance, there shall be delivered to the collector, in addition to the usual manifest, another, setting forth the names, ages, and description of the officers and crew, and of every passenger intending to sail in her. The said last-mentioned manifest shall be delivered to the commandant of the port, who shall thereupon cause the entire vessel to be searched; and if satisfied that the parties on board are persons who may safely be permitted to leave the Confederacy, and that the passengers have the proper passports, he shall certify the same on the manifest, and return the same to the collector; whereupon, and not before, a clearance shall be granted to the vessel, and she shall be permitted to sail.

9. The owners of each vessel, and of each portion of a cargo, sailing from a Confederate port, shall be allowed to take up their respective bonds by producing to the collector the certificate of the proper agent of the Confederate Government at the port of delivery, setting forth the particulars, showing that the said party has complied with the obligation of the said bonds so far as the same was practicable; and the collector, upon being duly satisfied, shall be authorised to surrender the said bonds.

10. Nothing in these regulations shall be so construed as to conflict with the proviso of the law which declares 'that nothing in this Act shall be construed to prohibit the Confederate States, or any of them, from exporting any of the articles herein enumerated on their own account,' nor shall a bond be required of a State in any case.

11. The penalties of all bonds executed in conformity with these regulations shall be recoverable in full, on proof of breach of the conditions of the bond, and without proof of any damage suffered by the Confederate States in consequence of such breach; and all bonds shall be executed in such form as to give effect to this regulation.

12. Vessels sent into the Confederacy for the purpose of exporting cotton received in payment of any Confederate bond or obligation, shall be subject to these regulations only so far as relates to such portion of the tonnage, if any, as may remain vacant after the lading of the cotton received in payment as aforesaid.

13. Whenever any vessel shall bring into the Confederate States an entire cargo for account of the Confederate States, the owners of the said vessel and the shippers of her cargo shall be relieved from the bonds previously given to invest and bring in one half of the net proceeds of her outward cargo; and the certificate of the agent of the Treasury Department, at the port of lading, that such cargo was duly shipped in pursuance of the regulations, shall authorise the collector to cancel and surrender the said bonds.

J. A. Seddon, Secretary of War.

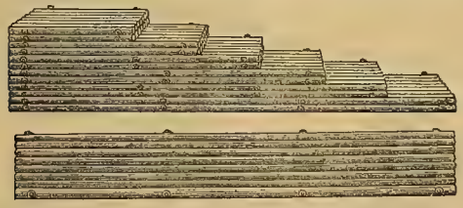
DUNCAN'S PATENT RATAN CANE SPLINTS.



THESE Splints are introduced and recommended to the Faculty for the great advantages which they possess above others,—viz., their comfort, coolness, and durability, as well as the facility with which they may be applied to the fractured limb.
As cleanliness is an important consideration, these Splints possess that quality pre-eminently, as they may be readily washed without the slightest fear of injury.
They are especially adapted to the constant usage of the General Hospital, and the movements of an Army on Service, as they cannot easily be injured. For Colonial practice they are recommended for the same reason.
They have been submitted to, and have received the approbation of, the Principal Medical Officers of the Army Medical Department.
The Splints cannot be injured by moisture; and are manufactured either with or without pads.

The Situation of the South.

'ALL with one voice about the space of two hours cried out, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians."' Likely enough, the silversmiths prevailed for a time, and the multitude were persuaded that Diana was a real god, and that ST. PAUL was an impostor. Clamour will often drown the voice of reason. We doubt not that the hoarse shouts of victory proceeding from those who fear that peace in America would put an end to their profitable trade, have led some persons to suppose that the South is about to pass under the Yankee yoke. Wonderful credulity! Wonderful that any person can believe that the smallest of mice has brought forth the biggest of mountains. On September 1 the North was sick of the war; after four years of tremendous effort it was confessed that the South was unconquered; the cry was for M'CLELLAN and peace; Mr. LINCOLN was deserted by many of his prominent supporters; the New York Herald, the ready exponent of the popular sentiment, demanded an armistice; the Federal Generals were urgent for reinforcements, but the Administration postponed the draft; and gold was at 260. On October 1 gold in New York had fallen to 190; the old talk of Southern subjugation was renewed; LINCOLN was the favourite candidate; loyal contractors ceased their croaking and thanked God that there was no chance of peace interfering with their profits. Why this change? Has Richmond fallen? Has Mobile been captured? Has Charleston surrendered after a five hundred days' siege? No; not one of these events, which might have palliated, though it could not justify, the Northern enthusiasm, has happened. Two reasons are assigned for the ecstasy of the North. General SHERMAN is in Atlanta asking and waiting for reinforcements, with a Confederate army in his front and a Confederate force operating in his rear. General SHERIDAN, with 40,000 men, has at a cost of 5,000 men forced EARLY, with 20,000 men, to retreat to a fortified position. Such are the achievements that Mr. LINCOLN's loud-mouthed prophets declare to be the immediate forerunners of the conquest of the South. So they said after the fall of Nashville, after the fall of New Orleans, after the fall of Vicksburg; though, after all these reverses, the South has, with dauntless resolution and with undiminished strength, chastised her insolent, boasting enemy. It is irksome for us to answer such folly, but it is a duty from which we must not shrink. The mendacity of the Federals does not hurt the South. It signifies not to the Confederates that Mr. LINCOLN for electioneering purposes thanks the Almighty for bogus victories. But Mr. LINCOLN's prophets do not labour in vain. Through their European organs they ensnare many victims. The Federal Administration wants men and money, and the one is procured in Ireland, and the other in Germany, by aid of the audacious misrepresentations of Mr. LINCOLN's European organs. Whether our warning be heeded or not, it is incumbent upon us to expose the fraud. Moreover, in the interests of peace we are bound to set forth the true state of the case; for our silence might be construed into an admission that the task of subjugation is not hopeless, and so we might do harm to the cause of peace. We are aware that our sensitiveness in this respect will be called pusillanimity, just as the frankness of the Confederate authorities, who will not lie and call defeat victory, is referred to as evidence of despair. But we never have concealed, and never will conceal, our desire to see this vain and bloody war ended. We are not War-Christians, and we could not enjoy the carnage, even though we could coin every drop of blood into cents and dollars.

Frequent changes of fortune are characteristic of all wars, and though in the present American war it will be admitted that the balance of success is heavily in favour of the Confederates, their success has not been uninterrupted. Look at the campaigns of the past spring and summer. In Florida a Federal army was utterly routed. On the Red River BANKS was signally defeated. In vain attempts to get to Richmond GRANT sacrificed a hundred thousand men. Against this what are the vaunted triumphs of the Federals? But we are not going to compare the military performances of North and South. Victories in the field and the capture of cities do not always presage a final triumph. If they did, the Netherlands would not have escaped from the dominion of Spain, and the United States would still have been appendages to the crown of England. It is a happy omen that the South has been so fortunate in war, but her independence rests upon a surer foundation than even the triumphs of her military genius and her devoted heroism. The North has not merely to conquer the Southern armies, but also the Southern people. It has failed to do the first, and the latter is a task the like of which has never yet been accomplished.

It will not be denied that the North has been at her best and the South has been at her worst. The North has put forth all her strength, and in four years has accumulated an oppressive debt and fearfully depleted her fighting population. In 1861 she had abundance of money, abundance of men, a navy without an opponent, and the Administration was permitted to disregard all rights and laws in order to push on the war. On the other hand, the South was taken at a fearful disadvantage. The young Confederacy was without an army and without arms. She was cut off from the markets of Europe. In her vast territory there was not a gun factory, not a rolling mill, not a powder-mill. As yet her iron mines had been unexplored; as yet no saltpetre had been collected in the country. Nay, even in the common necessaries of life the Confederacy was deficient. She was without clothing, and by a barbarous edict she was deprived of medicines. Look at the Confederacy of to-day. In 1861 she was the most dependent, now she is the most independent, nation on the face of the earth. Now, if the blockade were indeed effective, and the South completely cut off from communication with the rest of the world, the Confederates could continue the struggle. Necessary food they have in abundance, and articles of luxury they have learned to do without. Soldiers and civilians are comfortably clad in homespun and long cloth, the production of Southern cotton mills. Patriot armies in the South are not so gaudily arrayed as the mercenaries of Mr. LINCOLN, but they are as well furnished with weapons and ammunition. The North has been at its best, and the South at her worst.

What has the North done? Military critics who doubted not the ultimate triumph of the South, were of opinion that the Federal armies would march through the Confederacy and occupy the principal towns of the South without much opposition or difficulty. Very different indeed has been the result. Except New Orleans and Nashville, no large town in the South has been taken. Richmond, Charleston, Savannah, Mobile, and Wilmington have not been conquered; yet all these places are comparatively accessible to the forces of the enemy. The Mississippi River is closed against commerce, in spite of the gunboats of the Federals. In Louisiana the enemy holds New Orleans and a few plantations. Texas is almost free from the invader. The Federals are represented in Arkansas by a solitary garrison. Altogether the invader holds less Southern territory now than he did in 1863. But if the North has not been able to overcome the South with unimpaired resources, how will she do so with a crippled treasury and a diminished army?

It may be asked if the South has not suffered as well as the North, and if she has not less means to oppose to the impaired resources of the enemy. Where is the evidence of Southern exhaustion? Is she in want of arms and ammunition? Certainly not. Is she in want of food and clothing? Even the partisans of Mr. LINCOLN cease to prate about the South being starved out. Are the Southern armies less numerous? They were never stronger, they were never so strong as at present. There has been a terrible loss of life, but it is not an exhaustive loss. Does any one suppose that the casualties on the Southern side—we mean the killed and those too severely wounded to resume service—are equal to one thousand a week? Now, a reference to the Southern population tables will show that the number of males annually attaining the military age is 80,000. The accessions to the army are greater than the most exaggerated estimate of losses. The Southern armies, then, cannot be weakened by the continuance of the war on the scale of the last four years, and the North cannot increase its war power.

We have said that the North has to conquer not only the armies but the people of the South. Now, the North has not yet acquired a yard of Southern territory. The Federals have held New Orleans for more than two years, yet they have made no way in the State of Louisiana, and if the Federal troops were withdrawn there would not be a ghost of Union feeling in New Orleans. What would become of Unionism in Kentucky, Tennessee, and Maryland, if the Federal forces were withdrawn? It is only by force of arms that Mr. LINCOLN can maintain 'loyalty' in the North; he has utterly failed in a single instance to convert by force of arms a town or village of the South to Unionism. What follows from this? If the whole South is to be kept in the Union, it must be garrisoned as well as overcome. But that cannot be done. If the Southern people will not submit—if they will contend to the last—they cannot be subjugated. 'True!' exclaims the War-Christian; 'then we will exterminate the people of the South.' That, too, is an impossible task. The experiment of exterminating a people has been tried under far more favourable circumstances, and has invariably and completely failed. But in vain are all the lessons of the past. History perpetually repeats itself. The actors are different, the costumes are changed, the stage is new, but the plot of the drama is the same. The worst follies of the Governments of the Old World are repeated by the Government at Washington. When the colonies revolted from the mother-country, the colonists learned how invincible is a resolute people, inhabiting a large country, against apparently overwhelming numbers. But the lesson is forgotten; and now we find the North trying to conquer the South, though the numerical odds are not nearly so much in her favour as were the odds in favour of England in the contest with her colonies. History abounds with examples of subjugated nations; but there is no example of a united people falling under a foreign dominion.

In writing on this topic we are somewhat in the position of the village pedagogue who endeavoured to prove to a thick-skulled clodhopper an axiom of Euclid. What can we do for those who dispute the logic of facts? After four years of war the South has larger armies in the field than at any former period. Does this point to her speedy subjugation? After four years of war the North occupies less Southern territory than she did after two years of war. Does this indicate the immediate conquest of the South? After four years of war the North has not brought a hamlet within the Union. Does this indicate the coming submission of the South? The North has solicited the South to come back to the Union on her own terms, and the South has refused all such overtures. Does this hold out any hope of the restoration of the Union? Recruits in the North are becoming scarce and dear, the finances of the North are becoming more and more deranged, the people of the North are becoming more and more divided. Do these things promise a more triumphant prosecution of the foreign war? Humanly speaking, the task undertaken by the North was an impossible one, and the events of the war and the present situation demonstrate the impossibility.

The war may go on for months and perhaps for years. It may be that the Northern Government will be strong enough to force its subjects to replenish its armies, and that the fiat of bankruptcy will not stop the war. But the South has nothing to dread on account of her independence. It is sorrowful beyond expression that more names are to be added to the long list of martyrs to the cause of Southern liberty, but that liberty will not be crushed by the madness of the North. It is the North that will suffer most by the prolongation of hostilities. A few weeks hence it will be seen that the present ecstasy is as unfounded as the former jubilations over the discomfiture of the South. Surely the hour is at hand when the Lincolnites will not be able to dupe Ireland and Germany, and rob the one of her sons and the other of her money. Surely the hour is at hand when even the people of the North will see things as they are, and will refuse any longer to be the tools and victims of New England politicians and loyal contractors.

Northern Repudiation.—The New York Herald of September 27 has an article to show that repudiation is the fiscal policy of the Republican party. It says: 'Will the people elect as President a man whose policy, and that of his party, is repudiation? The record of Mr. Lincoln and his party, since they came into power in 1861, has been consistently that of repudiation. For example, the Indian annuities are paid in greenbacks, in open violation of treaties wherein the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged that they shall be paid in coin. The recent Indian outbreaks were mainly caused by this unjust act on the part of Mr. Lincoln, and the expense of putting down the Indians will cost millions of dollars and the lives of many valuable citizens. In Pennsylvania the Republican party adopted repudiation as its fiscal policy, by passing a law to pay the interest of the State debt in greenbacks, instead of gold coin, in open violation of the special contract of the loan, ratified by a State law at the time the money was loaned, that the principal and interest should be paid in gold coin of the United States, or in London or Paris. The Republican party did the same thing in the State of New York, in open violation of the New York State laws, which recognise no money but gold and silver. These facts, and the continued enormous issues of paper money by the Administration and national banks, favour the opinion entertained now by many intelligent and influential Republicans, that nothing can save the country from disgraceful repudiation if Mr. Lincoln is re-elected.

The War in Virginia.—The New York World gives the following estimate of Federal losses in three years' war in Virginia:—

Pope's campaign—killed and wounded	20,000
Fredericksburg " "	20,000
Chancellorsville " "	22,000
From the Rapidan to the James	80,000
From the James to the mine	30,000
Under Butler	10,000
In the Shenandoah	30,000
Total	212,000

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

Advices from Virginia, received through the Federal newspapers, represent that General Ord's corps of the army of General Grant advanced upon the Confederate lines on the north side of James River on the morning of September 29, capturing, according to one telegram, a strong line of intrenchments in his front, together with 15 guns and 100 prisoners, and according to another taking the fortifications of Chapin's Farm with 15 guns and 200 prisoners. There is some confusion here, which becomes greater when the two statements are compared with the latest telegram of all, namely, that 'on Thursday (the 29th) the Federals were within five miles of Richmond, and General Burnham was killed. One division of the 18th Corps suffered severely.' Chapin's Farm is nine miles below Richmond, and we can only reconcile these conflicting reports by supposing that after the capture of Chapin's Farm—if indeed that point was taken by General Ord—the Federals advanced four miles along roads strongly defended, fought a serious engagement, and were signally defeated. The defeat is probable enough from the Federal admission as to the 18th Corps, but the place where it occurred is matter of doubt. Simultaneously with these movements, General Birney is stated to have advanced on Deep Bottom and carried some important works on the New Market Road. The following day, so General Butler reports, an assault of the Confederates, in three columns, near Chapin's Farm, was repulsed, which gives us additional embarrassment in comprehending the situation. The Northern accounts are the more difficult to understand for the reason that they give their own names to localities in Virginia. We know of no Fort Morgan on James River and no Junction Hill in the region around Richmond, yet Birney is reported as having arrived at the one and Ord as having taken the other. On the south side of James River General Warren claims to have carried the Confederate lines on the right, and General Meade is said to occupy a position at Poplar Grove. The indications are that all these reported successes of the Federals are preliminary to an approaching general engagement between Generals Lee and Grant, of which the result may be of very great importance.

The operations in the Valley of Virginia, again, are not very clearly stated in the telegrams. It seems tolerably certain that on Monday, September 26, four days after the fight at Fisher's Hill, Early repulsed Sheridan at Broom's Gap, and pursued him for six miles to Port Republic, and, we may infer, yet further; for on Thursday, the 29th, according to the Federal account, Early was compelled to fall back to Port Republic, so that he must have advanced beyond that point. Sheridan's cavalry, under Torbet, destroyed a considerable quantity of property at Staunton and Waynesboro', but retreated upon Harrisonburg, fearing to attack a Confederate force stationed at the Blue Ridge Tunnel for its defence.

General Forrest is operating successfully in Sherman's rear in North Alabama and Tennessee. At Athens he captured 1,300 prisoners, 2 guns, and a large quantity of stores, and afterwards destroyed the bridge over the Elk River and thirty miles of the railway between Athens and Pulaski. From Pulaski he passed through Fayetteville to the railway connecting Nashville with Bolivar, a link of the Nashville and Chattanooga line, a considerable portion of which he rendered unserviceable, and then fell back upon Fayetteville. He took two trains on the Chattanooga railway, and destroyed the trestle-work and bridge at Elkhorn. General Rosecrans was sent out to oppose him, but, fearing a flank movement on the part of Forrest, retreated to Nashville. It seems quite clear that all Sherman's communications with Nashville are cut off.

Great alarm had been excited among the Federals in Missouri by the advance of General Price with a force estimated at 30,000 men. Generals Kirby Smith and Shelley, it is stated, were acting in cooperation with him. General Price, after occupying successively Mineral Point, Pilot Knob, and Potosi, was marching upon St. Louis. General Rosecrans had called upon the people to take up arms, and all business at St. Louis had been suspended.

Late news from Texas represents the condition of the country as most gratifying. The cotton crop is large, and the grain crops are exceedingly favourable. The Houston Telegraph says: 'The wealth of corn produced this year in Texas is something wonderful. From all accounts the most overwhelming crop has been produced—enough to supply the State two years.' There were no military movements. General Magruder has been placed in command of the district of Arkansas. General Walker has been put in his place at Houston, Texas, and General Buckner in command of the district of West Louisiana. Brigadier-General Slaughter takes command of the line of the Rio Grande, and of the road from the mouth of that river to the mouth of the Colorado.

The Charleston Courier of September 22 reports that the Federals had kept up a brisk fire on the city for three days. The only casualty was breaking down a shed and injuring a little child.

The sad duty which the progress of the war in America imposes upon us with melancholy frequency of announcing the death of Confederate officers in battle, now calls on us to announce the loss of two generals slain in the recent battles between Sheridan and Early near Winchester. General Robert E. Rodes, who fell commanding a division, entered the military service as Captain of a Tuscaloosa company in 1861, but soon became the Colonel of the 5th Alabama Regiment, and rose rapidly from this position to the high grade of major-general. He was a native of Lynchburg, Virginia, and a graduate in the Class of 1848 of the Virginia Military Institute. Conspicuous for his gallantry on many fields, and bearing two honourable wounds, he was greatly beloved by his immediate command, and was justly esteemed as one of the most gallant and accomplished officers in the Confederate army.

Brigadier-General A. C. Godwin, who was also among the killed mentioned in the despatch of General Lee, was at one time Provost-Marshal of Richmond, and went into the field as the colonel of a North Carolina regiment. He had been promoted for good conduct to a brigadier-generalship but a short time previous to his death.

The report that Cortina had occupied Brownsville, on the Rio Grande, and raised the Union flag, is denied in the correspondence of the New York Herald from Brazos Santiago, under date of September 13. Some fighting had occurred near the field of Palo Alto between the Federal Major Noyes, commanding a mixed force of United States troops and Mexicans, and the Confederate General Ford, with unimportant results, when the combatants retired to Brazos Santiago and Brownsville respectively.

Mr. Blair has ceased to be Federal Postmaster-General. On September 23, Mr. Lincoln wrote to him: 'You have generously said to me more than once that whenever your resignation could be a relief to me it was at my disposal. The time is come. . . . In the three years and a half that you have administered the General Post-Office, I remember no single complaint against you in connection therewith.' Why should it be a relief to Mr. Lincoln to get rid of this faithful Minister? In some quarters it is asserted that Mr. Blair is kicked out to please the friends of Mr. Chase. We believe the immediate cause of Mr. Blair's dismissal was the new compact between Fremont and Lincoln. There has been a long and bitter feud between the Blair and Fremont factions, and it is worthy of note that, the day after General Fremont publicly withdrew from the canvass for the Presidency, Mr. Blair was summarily turned out. This is one, but not the only, reason of Fremont's return to 'loyalty.' On the occasion of a lady applying to Mr. Lincoln to release some political prisoners, he said, 'Oh, those are Seward's prisoners. I cannot "boss" in this business.' The President very earnestly though vulgarly defends his position. He is only the titular master of the White House. Whether the members of his Cabinet are agreeable or disagreeable, he cannot retain or dismiss them except at the bidding of the wirepullers whose puppet he is. The resignation of Mr. Blair is not of much political importance. It indicates, however, that there is a split not only in the Republican party, but also in the ranks of the Lincolnites.

The new Postmaster-General is Mr. William Dennison, of Ohio, the son of the projector of the well-known Dennison House Committee. He was at one time a Whig, but became an Abolitionist. In 1859 he was elected Governor of Ohio. When the war broke out his name became notorious in connection with 'tin cup' contests and other peculations in the organisation of the State militia. His friends declare that he was slandered, and that the charges were invented by members of his party who did not obtain offices or contracts.

General Fremont has withdrawn from the Presidential contest. In his letter to the Cleveland Convention Committee, he says:—'In respect to Mr. Lincoln I continue to hold exactly the sentiments contained in my letter of acceptance. I consider that his administration has been, politically, militarily, and financially, a failure, and that its necessary continuance is a cause of regret for the country.' But he will not oppose Mr. Lincoln, because men were not found willing 'to make public a dissatisfaction and condemnation which could have rendered Mr. Lincoln's nomination impossible;' and as 'united the Republican party is really sure of success, divided the result of the Presidential election is at the least doubtful,' General Fremont will vote for the continuance of an administration that 'has been, politically, militarily, and financially, a failure.' It is a question of party, not of the welfare of the country. If the Democrats came in, Fremont and his friends would not be rewarded out of the Federal treasury for their loyalty and their philanthropy.

As General Fremont has withdrawn, there is not an anti-slavery candidate for the Presidency of the United States. The New York Herald says: 'Lincoln cares as little about the negro as M'Clellan does. Seward shows no more sympathy for him than Vallandigham does. Grant does not seem to attach any more importance to his existence than does Sherman, who, in clearing Atlanta of its population, gave the negroes their choice of either going South with their owners or rendering military service to the United States. And, strangely enough, the same supreme indifference on the question of negro slavery seems to prevail as completely in the rebel as in the loyal States. The only real question now is, that of a united or of a divided republic.' The reason is sufficiently obvious. The South did not secede to preserve an institution that the North was and is willing to uphold and support; and the North does not fight for emancipation, but for subjugation. The North is willing to support slavery if the South will reenter the Union—the South will not give up her independence on any condition.

A correspondence is published between Generals Hood and Sherman on the subject of an exchange of prisoners, man for man, which General Hood proposed and General Sherman accepted, but subsequently receded from, declaring that he would not accept Federal soldiers whose terms of enlistment had expired in exchange for Confederates held by him. This declaration is wholly unjustifiable, as being in direct conflict with the terms of the cartel originally agreed upon between the two Governments, and it must certainly be taken as indicating a heartless indifference on the part of the Federal commander to the sufferings of men who have fought well for the cause of the Union. Several days after this correspondence a special exchange of 2,000 men was negotiated between the two generals, and 700 Federals had been delivered up under its provisions.

Wall Street was agitated by a report that Vice-President Stephens, Governor Brown of Georgia, and General Sherman were about to negotiate a separate peace for Georgia. Very great is the gullibility of Wall Street, and so possibly some persons half believed that Vice-President Stephens and Governor Brown were capable of such treachery and folly, and that the people of Georgia would consent to be handed over to the Yankees. It is now said that Sherman has made peace propositions, and that Governor Brown has referred him to the Confederate Government. The whole affair is only one of Mr. Lincoln's electioneering dodges. At the beginning of the month the Peace party was in the ascendant, and Mr. Lincoln was desirous of conciliating the Peace party in case of need. Therefore, Sherman was instructed to open some kind of negotiations. The whole affair was doubtless arranged in Washington.

The fluctuations in the price of gold in New York have been violent, and business has been completely unsettled. The quotation on October 1 was 190.

ENGLAND.

The great handicap of the year was fought out at Newmarket on Tuesday last with more than usual excitement. With ninety acceptances of the weights as imposed by Admiral Rous, and with, as the result proved, a net stake of 1,765*l.* to be won, interest was raised to a considerable pitch. Neither in the present year was there that overwhelming superiority of any one horse at the weights which last year brought the name of Lioness into prominence, and destroyed the whole importance of the race. The Cesarewitch Stakes—a free handicap of 25 sovs. each, 15 forfeit, and 200*l.* added—is open to all horses of the age of three years and upwards. The course over which the race is run being in length two miles and two furlongs, with but one gentle turn, is the finest running ground in the world. On the one side of the famous Devil's Dyke lie two miles of ground, and on the other a like expanse—the whole constituting the celebrated four-mile course, over which the heroes of old have fought for the 'Whip' and 200*l.* with all the zeal which a Derby can evoke. Now-a-days, owners and trainers shrink from exposing valuable horses to such exertions, yet even the peasants of the neighbourhood can tell how Stockwell and Kingston, each carrying 140 lbs. weight, raced from end to end of the four miles as though the distance was a trifle, and the fate of the world hung on their prowess. The two middle miles and a few additional yards of this four-mile course constitute the running ground for the Cesarewitch. At no portion of the course is there any rise or fall in the plain of any note, but in the last 200 yards there is a decided incline, down which the horses descend before breasting the final rise which terminates with the winning-post. In fact, the race for the Cesarewitch ends at the same place which marks the finish for the Two Thousand Guineas Stakes, and experienced observation loves to mark how the flashy jades stop as the final slope is attained. On Tuesday, twenty-nine horses appeared at the starting-post for the event, and of these Gratitude, four years, with an impost of 6 st., was made the favourite, at the odds of 100 to 30. 9 to 2 was betted against Mr. William Day's Mail Train, three years, 6 st. 10 lbs., who came to Newmarket from Woodyeates armed with a reputation fit for the winner of a dozen great handicaps, and who was the favourite with that part of the sporting community who have a small bet on every big race, never see above one contest in the year, and scarcely know a horse from a bull. 100 to 15 were the odds against Thalestris, four years, 6 st. 2 lbs.; 100 to 7 against Mr. George Craven's Planet; 100 to 6 against the Brewer, a horse who must be about a dozen years of age, and who vainly essays at equal weights to beat animals of tender years; and 40 to 1 against Mr. Harry Hill's Ackworth, three years, 7 st., a weight perhaps rather greater than the antecedents of the horse could justify. Immediately on starting the Brewer made play, with Mail Train and the illustrious Tomato at his side, Thalestris and Gratitude lying in the same line at an interval. Before even a mile had been traversed three or four animals, such as Roly Poly, King Charming, and Charmian, were hopelessly beaten. Until the bushes were reached, that is, within 400 yards of the winning-post, the order of the leaders was maintained, the rest of the field, with the exception of the three hopeless ones, lying well up. At the bushes, however, Mail Train, Gratitude, Thalestris, Planet, and Dr. Syntax came to the front, and here Mail Train and the Doctor hung out evident signs of defeat, and, swerving across the course, nearly succeeded in penetrating the crowd of spectators on the hill. Gratitude was leading by three parts of a length, and loud were the shouts for the victory of the favourite; Thalestris, however, struggled on with great gameness, and, catching the favourite on the ascent of the hill, won a terrific race by a head. Mr. Hill's Ackworth, who, in spite of his impost, came with a gallant rush, finished about three-quarters of a length from Gratitude. Mail Train was fourth and Planet fifth. The winner, Thalestris, is the property of the Earl of Coventry, and is by Kingston out of Virago, the famous mare who, as a three-year-old, won twelve great races for that great sportsman, Mr. Padwick. After the termination of her career she was sold for 1,000*l.* as a brood mare, and she has bred foals to Orlando, the Flying Dutchman, and Stockwell, with a failure in results which has puzzled all the breeders in England. Indeed, one of the slowest horses that we have ever seen was her offspring by the Flying Dutchman. Gratitude is the property of Mr. Wybrow Robinson, and is own sister to Limosina, who, strangely enough, ran second for this same race last year. She is by Newminster out of Charity by Melbourne. On the same day the race for the Clearwell Stakes was also contested. The race is open to two-year-olds with a subscription of 30*l.* each. For it thirteen colts and fillies came to the post, of whom Count F. de Lagrange's Gladiateur, by Monarque of Miss Gladiator, was made the favourite at the odds of 7 to 4, with 3 to 1 against Captain White's Joker. The ring was right in its estimate, for the French horse won by a length, Joker was second, and Lord Hastings' Pantaloon was third.

The monthly report of Mr. Maclure, read at the meeting of the Executive Committee at Manchester, showed that on September 24 the number of operatives working full time was 212,520; short time, 102,047; and out of work, 135,821. The figures for the month of August were 299,229, 59,074, and 102,090, respectively. According to Mr. Farnall's report, there was an increase of persons receiving relief in 27 unions of 12,209, as compared with the number in the month of August. At the meeting of the General Committee, the report stated that 114,000 persons were now receiving relief in some form or other. The funds in hand were as follows:—The Central Fund, 118,623*l.*; the Cotton Districts Relief Fund, 55,995*l.*; the Liverpool Fund, 35,575*l.*; altogether, 210,193*l.* Sir J. Kay Shuttleworth, while holding that increase in the distress, though likely to be yet more severe, would not be prolonged, urged strongly upon the meeting that the funds in hand were not more than adequate, and that great caution and economy were necessary. He admitted that even if the distress fell for a period it would again rise at intervals with renewed force.

The Blackburn Relief Committee have published an exhaustive report of their proceedings from December 1861 to June 1864. The following is the summary given of the industry of the town before the American war, a perusal of which will give a fair idea of the manner in which the existence of Blackburn and similar places was bound up in the cotton trade:—

The population of the borough in 1861 was 63,126, and of this number it was estimated that 24,854 were directly employed in spinning or weaving cotton, and that an additional 3,000 were engaged in occupations immediately dependent upon the cotton trade. For each worker it may be fairly assumed that there is at least one dependent—an aged parent, a wife, or a child—thus making upwards of 55,000 persons whose welfare depended upon the prosperity of one trade. From the number of spindles and looms then in Blackburn we obtain a proximate estimate of the weekly earnings, and the extent and value of the yarns and cloth produced:—

Weekly Wages.

1,006,422 spindles, at $\frac{3}{4}$d. per spindle	£1,677
31,072 looms, at 5*s.* 3*d.* per loom	8,146
Wages for the preparation connected with the spinning department	1,677
Wages for same in weaving department, 31,072 looms at 1*s.* 9*d.*	2,715
Weekly wages of cotton operatives	£14,215
Added to which 3,000 mechanics, engineers, &c., at 25*s.* per week	3,750
Making a total amount of weekly wages of	£17,965

Weekly Production.

With American cotton at 6*d.* per lb., and cloth prices at 1*s.* per lb., which are about the average for ten years previous to the cotton famine for shirting qualities, the length and weight of cloth, and its average value, we assume as follows:—

31,072 looms, using each 45 lbs. of yarn per week	1,398,240 lbs.
31,072 looms, producing each 260 yards of cloth per week	8,073,720 yards
1,398,240 lbs. of cotton cloth, at 1*s.* per lb.	£69,912

The report next proceeds to detail the exertions made to relieve the distress. At the end of 1861 there were 471,636 spindles and 7,315 looms unproductive, and 5,757 workpeople unemployed. As time went on things became worse, until the number of persons in receipt of relief in various forms rose to 32,000. Independently of the expenditure for clothing, fuel, and on account of the infirmary and public kitchens, the actual sums of money distributed by the Committee amounted to 60,798*l.* 3*s.* 1*d.*, and by the Board of Guardians to 50,423*l.* 17*s.* 1*d.*, making a total in 127 weeks of 111,222*l.* 0*s.* 2*d.*

The mediation of Lord Leigh in the difficulties of the colliers' strike has hopelessly failed. A mass meeting of 4,000 colliers took place at the close of last week to hear the statement of the deputation with whom the Lord-Lieutenant of Warwickshire had been in communication. It appeared that the delegates had been twice received by his Lordship and treated by him with the greatest courtesy. On the third visit Lord Leigh said that the miners ought to make some concession. They, in answer, offered to go to work for a fortnight on the reduced terms with a promise of an advance after that date. To this proposition, however, the employers would not agree, but desired that the men should work for a month at the old rates. The delegates consented. This proposition, therefore, was made by Lord Leigh to the masters at the Hen and Chickens Hotel in Birmingham, where the masters were assembled in one room and the men in another. Lord Leigh, after conferring with the masters, proposed to the delegates that they should induce the men to resume work. On a refusal Lord Leigh, it is affirmed, offered the two delegates 10*l.* each to persuade the men. They refused the bribe, and thereupon Lord Leigh called the deputation fools, and fanatics, and madmen, said that they were the cause of all the distress, and that but for them the men would have gone to work. It was then resolved that the strike should continue until the masters sent for the men as a body, or published their intentions in the Birmingham Daily Post.

On Monday the colliers met in great force at Bilston. Detachments of men marched in, with bands at the heads of the columns, from all the neighbouring townships. They were followed by policemen to the number of 150 armed with sabres. At the meeting speeches were held denouncing Lord Leigh, and pledging the men to continue the strike till the masters gave way. The 80th Lancers are stationed at Birmingham, and horses are kept saddled day and night. A regiment of volunteers has also been kept under arms in Bingley Hall ready for emergencies. One instance has occurred of what are called strike outrages. An attempt was made to blow up the house of a collier who had gone to work at Lord Dudley's mines. The man and his family were at the time asleep. The roof of the cottage was blown off, but no one was injured.

General John Reeve, Colonel of the 61st Regiment of Foot, died last week. He entered the army in 1800 as ensign in the Grenadier Guards. He served in Sicily in 1806 and 1807, and with Sir John Moore in 1808 and 1809; was present at the battle of Corunna, and subsequently served in Walcheren and Cadiz. He was present at the passage of the Bidassoa, at Nivelle, and Nive. He served in the campaign of 1815, and fought at Quatre Bras and Waterloo.

The troop-ship Urgent arrived on Monday at Portsmouth from Quebec, and St. John's, Newfoundland, with the second battalion of the Scots Fusilier Guards on board, under the command of Colonel Stephenson.

Fraud and bankruptcy have been accustomed to go hand in hand, and just as the Leeds Banking Company has been hurried to speedy ruin by the operations of a forger, so now a respectable firm in the city of London has, by the fraud of the chief clerk, suffered a similar misfortune. Mr. A. Salomons, of Old Change, stopped payment last week, and the suspension is attributed to forgeries and defalcations to the amount of 40,000*l.* by a man who for twenty-five years had served in the establishment, and latterly had filled the confidential position of cashier. This individual had left his desk for a few days' recreation. His prolonged absence created suspicions, which a letter of confession amply justified. The forger is believed to have gone to Liverpool; and though a warrant has been issued for his apprehension, it is not improbable that he is already far on his voyage to New York. His name is James Allen Thornley, and in his letter of confession he states that he had engaged in extensive speculations to recover losses sustained on account of a brother. Up to the end of 1862 he had abstracted 7,500*l.*, and in November 1863 his plunder had grown to 25,000*l.* He committed the forgeries by tracing the writing over the genuine bills. Within the past month large sums had been paid for differences. The forger had a considerable amount open in Spanish stock, and hoped by holding on to receive by the Spanish Passives and Certificates a sufficient sum to retrieve his position.

Everyone who has laboured under the idea that the great ship of war the Royal Sovereign was intended to take the sea, to form in line of battle with the Channel fleet, or even to cruise off the coasts, will be disappointed on learning that her vocation is that of 'a floating battery for harbour defence, capable of being sent to any port in the Channel, but not adapted to the performance of more active operations.' She has now been attached to the Excellent as a tender, Captain Osborne, the first lieutenant, and the complement of men required for further experiments and ordinary management only being retained. Probably some explanation will be offered by the Government of the merits and faults of the ship as disclosed by her trial trip. There is a strong belief in the skill of Captain Cowper Coles, and in the truth of his theories; but inasmuch as all England looked upon the Royal Sovereign as a sea-going ship, an account of her capabilities will be awaited with much interest.

Another member of the system of railway bridges destined to connect the southern lines with the northern bank of the Thames, and eventually with the eastern, northern, and western lines of railroad, has been completed. On October 6, the directors of the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company, with Mr. Cubitt, the engineer, and Mr. Kennard, the contractor, passed in a trial trip train over the new bridge at Blackfriars, and across the new viaduct in Earl Street to the station above Ludgate Hill. The bridge is 939 feet long and 56 feet wide. The weight of the iron in the bridge is 3,000 tons. Three hundred men and boys were employed on the work of making the bridge for eight months.

Sir Moses Montefiore has attended by special invitation a meeting of the Court of Common Council convened in Guildhall, to receive the resolution which was passed in April last, tendering the thanks of the corporation for the signal services rendered by him to the cause of humanity in having undertaken missions to various countries in relief of oppressed communities, especially for his journey to Morocco, whereby he obtained from the Sultan the relief of the Jewish and Christian inhabitants from all disabilities. The resolution was presented to him emblazoned on parchment, and splendidly framed, and the gift was enhanced by an address replete with eulogy delivered by the Lord Mayor. It will be remembered that the venerable Baronet is now eighty years of age, and that he served the office of Sheriff in the year of Her Majesty's accession.

On Tuesday, the Right Hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer arrived in Bolton, and was received by the mayor and civic authorities. The town clerk read the address of the corporation, and Mr. Gladstone replied in a speech of considerable length, dwelling principally on the distress in Lancashire and the admirable attitude of the working-classes. On the following day Mr. Gladstone opened the People's Park at Farnworth, near Bolton. Mr. Gladstone is to visit Liverpool and Manchester towards the close of the present week.

IRELAND.

The conviction that the cultivation of flax in Ireland will be highly remunerative is gaining ground rapidly. At Cork, last week, a flax market was opened, at which nineteen loads of unscutched flax from the districts round Cork, and 140 stone of mill and hand-scutched flax from Limerick and the neighbourhood of Mallow and Clonakilty were offered for sale. On the following day the Cork Flax Spinning and Weaving Company held their first meeting on their new premises at Blackpool. The chairman, Mr. Maguire, M.P., explained at considerable length the operations and purposes of the company. The capital was 60,000*l.* in 6,000 shares of 10*l.* each. Mr. Maguire stated that in Ulster there was an increase within the last two years of 70,000 acres in the breadth of flax grown. He thought that for a generation cotton would not recover its position, and for twenty years flax would not be as low-priced as it was six years ago. The Americans would be obliged to impose a tax on the exportation of cotton in order to meet the enormous cost of the war, so that cotton would not for some time displace flax. After some other addresses, a list was opened and 132 shares were at once taken. The subscribed capital is now 28,140*l.*

On October 10, the seventy-fourth anniversary of the birth of the Very Reverend Theobald Mathew, the statue of the apostle of Temperance, raised to his honour by the citizens of Cork, was unveiled. The crowd present at the ceremony was enormous, the various Temperance Societies and the trades being drawn up in order with their banners and their bands. John Francis Maguire, M.P., Mayor of Cork, officiated, and delivered the inaugural address. The statue, by Mr. Foley, R.A., is of bronze, stands eight feet high, and in resemblance to the original, and the dignity and grace wherewith it is invested, is decidedly a masterpiece. Father Mathew is represented in the act of blessing the multitude to whom he has just administered the pledge. The statue cost 1,000*l.*, and was executed by Prince of London. The pedestal stands nine feet six inches high, and bears the inscription 'Mathew, Apostle of Temperance,' on the frieze; on the block are the words, 'The Tribute of a grateful People,' with the words inscribed on the back, 'Erected in the Mayoralty of John Francis Maguire, M.P., 1864.'

CANADA.

By order of the Imperial Government, a formal Convention of the Governments of the various British Provinces was to be held at Quebec on October 10, for the purpose of coming to a decision respecting the federation scheme, and in case of unanimity immediate steps were to be taken to frame the necessary laws. An opposition, however, is springing up in Lower Canada, and the scheme has been denounced in violent language by the organ of the Rouge party (La Nationale). A banquet had been given at Halifax, in honour of the delegates from Canada, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward's Isle. The custom-house at Quebec, completed in 1859 at a cost of $300,000, has been burned down.

Lord Lyons was on a visit to General Monck in the last week of September.

INDIA.

The accounts of the cotton crop in the Bombay Presidency are decidedly bad, and though it is pretty certain that the extent of land sown is greater than heretofore, yet the quantity of the present will fall short of that of the past year. The case is worse in Bengal, where the cotton crop will be much less than it was last year.

An embassy has arrived in Cashmere from the kingdom of Kokand, after three months of forced marching. The mission will attempt to procure the assistance of the Viceroy to resist the aggression of Russia upon Kokand. The ground upon which the support of the British Government is claimed for the sovereignty of Kokand is that the object of Russian aggression in Kokand is to obtain a base from which to attack the British Empire in India.

The expedition against the Bhootanese is to start at the close of the present month. The Bhootanese are fortifying Missagong in apprehension of an attack.

A Reign of Terror.— General Fry of Kentucky, and of Zollicoffer fame, has arrived at Paducah, having been sent from Washington, to investigate the reign of terror and blood of General Paine. The simple facts that will be substantiated upon this investigation will send a thrill of horror through the people of the civilised world. Paine was in command fifty-six days, and shot sixty-seven men, and no evidence can be found that a single one was ever tried by a military commission or court of any kind. He was at the guardhouse one day, and a prisoner happened to displease him, when he ordered the guard to shoot him down. A negro faithfully executed the order. When a prisoner was brought to General Paine, pronounced by his captors a rebel in arms, the matter was always summarily settled by an order to 'shoot him to-morrow morning at eight o'clock.' General Meredith turned fifty-one persons loose at Mayfield, and has emptied the guardhouse at Paducah. The bloody days of Robespierre have been blotted out, and an American now bears aloft the reeking palm.— The Chicago Times, September 19.

Mr. Lincoln's Election.—Mr. Lincoln was constitutionally elected. But, in the popular vote, the majority against him was more than a million in the whole Union, and nearly 100,000 in the free States.—New Haven Register.

THE CONTINENT.

FRANCE.

The Empress of the French returned to Paris from Baden on the evening of the 5th inst. The Emperor went as far as Meaux to meet her. It is said that Her Majesty intends to spend the winter at Nice in the company of the Empress of Russia. Prince Humbert of Italy has at length left Paris, after putting off his departure several times.

As we stated last week, Herr von Bismarck has found that his health required him to visit France, but it was not expected that his complaint would necessitate a visit to the metropolis itself: such, however, is the case, and the presence of the great Prussian statesman in Paris has given rise to many ominous whispers. It was feared that it represented a rapprochement between France and Prussia, similar to that which was conjectured to be the basis of Lord Clarendon's visit to Vienna. Some have even hinted at the possibility of another war with Austria; but neither the policy nor the present physical condition of France favours such a notion. The French arsenals have been as constantly called upon for supplies during the last two years as if a great war had been actually going on; and the combination of small irritations in the shape of Mexican and Cochin-Chinese expeditions and an Algerian insurrection has been no less trying to them than would have been a great European struggle.

Some of the Paris journals have reproduced the question of a General Congress, raking it up out of the Madrid journal the Epoca; they affirm that the present difficulties can still meet with a ready solution by that means, and that the various European cabinets are willing to accept it. The only question we need ask is, What are the difficulties which a Congress can discuss? Will the Conference of Vienna give up its labours, and submit to the arbitration of the neutral Powers, which it has up to this time so persistently refused? Will France and Italy give up their Convention? Will Russia reopen the Polish question, or Prince Couza revoke his lately accorded Constitution? We trow not; but we ask again, these subjects being excluded, what remains for a Congress to discuss? Unless, indeed, it would resolve itself into a Committee of Instruction, and lecture Lord Russell on letter-writing, the Danes on obstinacy, the Germans on equity, and finally take a lesson to itself on the benefit of 'letting sleeping dogs lie.'

Delegates from France, Belgium, England, and Holland have lately met in Paris, to draw up a collective convention relative to the sugar duties. They have come to an understanding upon the general nature of the arrangements, which are to form the subject of a diplomatic convention, to be carried out within a month at latest.

Several diplomatic changes have lately taken place, of which the following are the most important:—The Baron de Talleyrand is to go as Ambassador to St. Petersburg; M. Mercier is removed from Washington to Madrid; and M. Chateaurenaud succeeds him at Washington.

On the morning of the 4th inst. all the authorities of the port of Toulon were in commotion, on hearing of the intended visit of the Lords of the English Admiralty, with the Duke of Somerset at their head, to inspect their dockyards and arsenals. They arrived in the yacht Enchantress, flying the Admiralty flag, and were conducted over the works, or rather such of them as it was advisable to show, with the greatest urbanity. It is said by the French papers—and so singular is the report that we should be glad to know more certainly its authority—that these distinguished personages have formed themselves into a Commission of Inspection, to see with their own eyes whether there is any truth in the charges against the present Ministry of having suffered the naval power of England to fall into a state of inferiority as compared with that of her neighbours. This mission, which the French journals characterise by the mild term of 'indiscreet,' has amused them vastly: they have examined with great curiosity the personal appearance of the gentlemen who devised this very simple method of obtaining information; they tell their readers that these great noblemen and gentlemen look very much like good citizens out for a holiday, and can only conjecture that they hope by an extreme modesty of demeanour to keep out of sight the singularity of their object.

A new French maestro has come out in the person of M. Mermet; he has already, twenty-three years ago, been before the public as the author of 'Le Roi David;' but his first appearance was scarcely a success, and he has ever since been engaged in the preparation of another work, 'Roland à Roncevaux,' which was brought out lately at the French opera. Its first representation was honoured by the presence of the Emperor, Prince Humbert, and the Duc de Leuchtenberg, who expressed themselves delighted with it. Et spes et ratio studiorum in Cæsare tantum. We hope that M. Mermet may find the truth of the dictum to his benefit.

In every country, however well ordered, strange and absurd incongruities at times crop out. Who would have believed that in France the transmission of valuables is so hampered by legislation that jewellers are forced to commit diamonds to the value of millions to the chances of the common post-office? Such, however, is the case. M. Kauffmann, a jeweller of Paris, was summoned before a police magistrate for sending valuable articles in the shape of 1,600*l.* worth of diamonds by post. M. Kauffmann admitted the charge, but pleaded that there were no other means of conveying precious stones into the provinces, as the common parcels delivery would not take them. This was considered to be an extenuating circumstance, and M. Kauffmann was accordingly fined in the mitigated penalty of fifty francs.

A curious, and to some nations very shameful, relic of the occupation of Paris in 1814 has been lately erected in the Invalides. At that time there were some 1,700 or 1,800 flags captured from various nations hanging in the chapel of that institution as trophies. Marshal Sérurier, its commandant, fearing only too justly their recapture, ordered them all to be burnt. This was accordingly done, and the ashes of them thrown into the Seine. In 1815 two men, one of whom is still living, hearing from a fisherman that a mass of lance-heads and other relics were lying in a certain hole in the river, determined to recover them. They were found, of course, in the most deplorable state, but easily recognisable as the remains of the burnt flags. The army of occupation was then in Paris; so the men kept their discovery secret, and only some years afterwards they offered them to Charles X., who received them graciously, and ordered that they should be kept in safety. Since that time they have more than once run the risk of being thrown away as old iron, and only lately has it been proposed to restore them to their former place. This happy idea occurred to Colonel Michel. With the help of skilful artists and men of real taste, he has constructed out of the relics four trophies or panoplies in which they are displayed to the greatest advantage; these have been affixed to the walls of the chapel in which they originally hung. These remains belong not only to the trophies of the wars of Napoleon, but also to all the wars in which the French took part since the time of Louis XIV.; among them no doubt were the English flags captured at Fontenoy. We trust that the authorities of the Invalides will find means to place under these panoplies an exact statement of the number of flags burnt in 1814, and the occasions of their capture.

The following statistics with regard to the trade of France during the last eight months will be interesting to many of our readers. The imports were of the value of 1,600,236,000 fr., showing an increase of 50,000,000 fr. upon those of the corresponding period last year. The importations of corn are of about 120,000,000 fr. in value. The increase in the imports is principally due to the augmented supply of cotton, the following being a very instructive tabular statement of the variations in the supply of that article:—

1863	158,793,000
1864	230,327,000

The weight of the cotton imported in the last year is about 100,000,000 lbs. The imports of English iron have diminished from the value of 17,000,000 fr. in 1862 to 712,000 fr. in 1864. Manufactured iron has fallen from 15,000,000 to 2,000,000 fr. in the same time. English cutlery has fallen since the conclusion of the French treaty from 261,000 fr. to 138,000 fr. The statistics of the export trade give 1,244,006,000 fr. as the figure of the last eight months, being an increase of 310,000,000 fr. on 1863, and 708,000,000 fr., or about 57 per cent., on 1861. The tonnage of the importing vessels is 1,060,315 tons for 1864, or about 20,000 tons more than last year; of exporting vessels there were 732,433 tons to 730,539 for 1863, and 627,526 for 1862. A comparison of these figures will show that the railroads export a little more than the shipping—that is, that Continental Europe takes relatively rather more French goods than do England and America.

The following official communications have been received from Algiers: 'Lacroix's column defeated the insurgents on the 30th ult. and the 2nd inst. The uncle of Bou-Maza (a celebrated Arab chieftain, now living in exile in France) attacked General Zollivet on the 30th ult. with 15,000 men, but was repulsed. The French lost 86 men killed.'

The Government of Morocco has ordered the Tangiers Custom House to pay the indemnity of 125,000 francs claimed by France for the assassination of a French subject.

ITALY.

The text of the Franco-Italian Convention has been published. We give it here in full, seeing its importance not only in European politics, but in the history of the Papal system throughout the world:—

Art. 1. Italy undertakes not to attack the present territory of the Pope, and even to prevent by force any attack proceeding from the exterior.

Art. 2. France will withdraw her troops gradually, as the army of the Pope becomes organised. The evacuation will, nevertheless, be accomplished within two years.

Art. 3. The Italian Government will make no protest against the organisation of a Papal army, even composed of foreign Catholic volunteers, sufficient to maintain the authority of the Pope, and tranquillity both at home and on the frontier of the Papal States; provided, however, that this force does not degenerate into a means of attack against the Italian Government.

Art. 4. Italy declares herself ready to enter into an arrangement for assuming a proportional part of the debt of the former States of the Church.

Art. 5. The present Convention will be ratified, and the ratifications exchanged within a fortnight, or earlier if possible.

(Signed) Drouyn de Lhuys.
Di Nigra.
Pepoli.

A protocol following the Convention says:—

The Convention will only become executive when the King of Italy shall have decreed the transfer of the capital of the kingdom to a place to be subsequently determined upon by His Majesty. The transfer to be effected within a term of six months from the date of the Convention.

The present protocol will have the same force and value as the Convention, and the ratifications will be exchanged at the same time as those of the Convention.

After the signature of the Convention it was found necessary to change the Ministry in Italy; it was also requisite to bring before the Chamber of Deputies the question of the transfer of the capital; it was therefore subsequently agreed that the six months during which that transfer is to be effected shall begin to run from the day on which the King gives his assent to the bill authorising the change. In a despatch addressed by M. Drouyn de Lhuys to the Baron de Malaret, French Minister at Turin, the former expresses a hope that the Papal Government, however suspicious of the terms of the Convention, will believe that they will be scrupulously executed, since they bear the signature of France.

As to the words of the Convention there are of course no difficulties, but with regard to its ultimate object there is a most decided difference of opinion—some saying that the idea of Rome for a capital is now definitively renounced by the Italian Government; others (that is to say, the Italians themselves) vehemently asserting the contrary. The Marquis de Pepoli, one of the Italian commissioners engaged in the framing of the treaty, has offered himself as a candidate for a seat in the Parliament, being desirous of stating personally the principles which animated him in the affair. No better proof can be given of the confidence of the present Italian Government that it represents the wishes and aspirations of the people. They appear to be determined to carry out the terms of the Convention; two engineers are already in Florence examining the various buildings with a view to their capabilities for the different branches of the Administration. A curious circumstance occurred lately at Turin, from which several omens were drawn by the common people. A huge bird flew out of the royal gardens and alighted on the top of one of the public buildings. It was at first said to be an eagle; and while some saw in the fact a sign that the sovereignty was departing from Turin, others said that the eagle of France had come to take possession of a new dominion. The bird turned out eventually to be an American vulture, attracted to the spot, as some said with a double-edged sarcasm, by the blood of the citizens slain in the outbreak of the 21st and 22nd ult.

Prince Humbert has arrived in Turin, and is shortly, they say, to be appointed to the command of the Sixth Army Corps.

The Pope is not by any means pleased with the treatment he receives from the new Convention. In the first place he objects to the way in which he is disposed of, without a word of warning or consultation: in the next place he does not believe that he is sufficiently protected, either from the Italians or from his own subjects; thirdly, he does not care to raise a large army for his own defence when he can get it done cheaper and better by French or Austrians; and, lastly, he does not like to be told, even by M. Drouyn de Lhuys, that the principles of his government are obsolete and inequitable. Men watch the movements of the Papal Cabinet just now with increased curiosity; for should they refuse to take any notice of the Convention, and neglect to provide themselves with an army such as is there suggested for them, it is hard to see what means the Emperor will have of coercing them, short of giving them up irrevocably to the tender mercies of their people, which is the very end that he most wishes to avoid.

Mazzini has published a letter on the subject of the Convention. The tone of it is such as we might naturally expect from him. He asserts that the keystone of Italian independence is Rome for the metropolis, and that therefore the present Convention amounts to treason against Italy. He puts the Ministry on the dilemma, that either the terms of the Convention will be kept, in which case Italy is enslaved to the will of France; or the terms will be broken, war will ensue, and the credit of Italy for fair dealing destroyed. He exhorts the Italian Parliament to tear up the treaty and trust to the strength of twenty-two millions of Italians. Finally, he says: 'To-day, whilst yet we are free, we swear to "make Italy," with, without, or against the present Government. If the Convention becomes a fait accompli, the two first contingencies are disposed of. Then we will try the third, happen what may.'

SWEDEN.

On the 29th ult. the Prince and Princess of Wales were entertained by the King of Sweden with a review of his small but well-appointed army. It was followed by a ball given to the royal party by the Queen Dowager, granddaughter of Josephine, the first wife of Napoleon, at her palace of Drottningholm, a few miles from Stockholm. The next day a picnic was organised. On the 1st inst. a hunting party was made up, in hopes of giving the Prince a shot at the great Swedish elk; but the energy of the Swedes is rapidly civilising these great deer off the face of the earth, and not a shot was to be had. Want of sport was made up for by good cheer afterwards. The next day was devoted to visiting the city of Stockholm on foot, and going into the shops, where the Prince made a few purchases; in the meantime, the ladies drove out to see some of the rare collections in the metropolis. In the evening the whole party went to the Opera and heard 'Faust.' On Sunday, as in duty bound, the Prince and Princess went to church, represented by the English chapel attached to the Legation. On Monday, the King swore a deadly oath that the Prince of Wales should see an elk killed; so off they all started again to the happy hunting grounds, into which about 1,000 peasants had been beating the game indefatigably for twelve hours before. A long day's waiting, agreeably diversified by lunches hospitably proffered by the King's subjects; at last the elk is found, and the lucky Baron Wrede kills it. Satisfied with this, the King and Prince returned home, for it was now time for the latter to meditate on his return. On the 4th inst. they started from Stockholm after a more than cordial parting from their royal hosts, and arrived at Gottenburg on the evening of that day; thence they steamed to Elsinore, where they arrived on the morning of the 5th, after a voyage which must have been perfectly delicious, from its contrast with the boisterous weather in the midst of which they had first landed in Sweden. Immediately on their arrival they were escorted by the King and the Crown Prince to Fredensborg.

DENMARK.

It is hoped that the Plenpotentiaries are at length seeing a little light through the tangled thickets of the Danish difficulty. The Danish Government decline to grant a proportionate repartition of the different items of public property to the Duchies. The Germans have therefore returned to the proposal to settle the question by the payment of a fixed amount. This has been accepted by the Danes ad referendum. The neutral Powers have made representations to Austria and Prussia relative to the proceedings of General Falkenstein in Jutland. There seems to be a possibility that the Danish element in North Slesvig will break out into violence before the amalgamation of that country with Germany can be effected.

GERMANY.

It appears that Prussia has won a great diplomatic victory in the occurrences of the last few weeks with regard to the new Customs League, and is nearer the attainment of the object of her ambition in the shape of the leadership of Germany than she has ever yet been. A few words will explain the process of events. The old Customs League between Prussia and the Northern States of Germany was approaching its dissolution as fixed by treaty, and was to be reorganised on improved principles. Just then Prussia made a private treaty of commerce with France, and, taking this treaty for a basis, proposed to reconstruct the Zollverein or Customs League in such a manner as to give the advantages of the Franco-Prussian treaty to all who should join the League. Now the new treaty was founded on the principles of free trade, principles which, whether rightly or wrongly, Austria repudiated. The latter Power, therefore, endeavoured by exerting all her influence to keep the lesser German Powers from joining the new League—a task so much the more easy that the French Government had stipulated that the members of it should be agreed upon by the first of the present month. There was some jealousy of Prussia and reverence for Austria among the smaller German States; at one time it seemed probable that the efforts of Austria to disintegrate the Zollverein would be successful. However, as the day for the final settlement approached, the smaller States one by one began to shrink from the responsibility of abandoning the Zollverein; in vain did Austria attempt to suggest a new and more comprehensive scheme by which the Franco-Prussian treaty should be first modified and then extended to all the States of Germany; France refused either to modify her terms or to prolong the time for deliberation. The Grand Duchy of Hesse was the first to abandon Austria and come to terms with Prussia; its example was followed by Nassau; finally Bavaria and Wurtemburg, the staunchest friends of Austria, yielded to the pressure, and forty-eight hours only before the time appointed gave in their adhesion to the new treaty. Thus Prussia has triumphed; Austria is isolated, and her rival is at the head of the strongest commercial party in Germany. The object of the conferences now going on at Prague is to make some arrangement between Austria and the new Zollverein; its meetings have been for some time postponed, but will shortly be resumed, and representatives of some of the other German States will take part in the deliberations.

It is stated on trustworthy authority that a reduction in the Austrian army is now taking place. In Venetia alone it will amount to 50,000 men, who will leave the country on furlough.

Austria and Prussia have in their turn shown signs of concession to the general feeling of the Western Powers, and have recognised the new kingdom of Greece. Plenipotentiaries from both Powers have presented their credentials to King George.

RUSSIA.

An Imperial rescript has been published on the subject of education in Poland, which will tend to improve considerably the condition of that unfortunate country. The rescript begins by stating that up to the present time all schools have been governed according to the feudal system, the lord of the manor having the appointment of the master, and prescribing the sum which each pupil should pay for instruction. Another evil complained of related especially to the education of girls. It was almost entirely in the hands of the Catholic convents, where the education was worse and the charges higher than in the free institutions. There were other complaints of various importance, arising from the differences of religion or of language in the different provinces of the kingdom of Poland. For the future the communes or townships are to take a share in the management of the primary schools, and to take upon themselves the payment of half the salary of the teachers; the other half will be supplied by Government for the first ten years of the schools' existence, after which time it will fall entirely upon the commune. Each nationality and each religious persuasion may found a school for itself, and receive Government assistance. The instruction in each school will be given in the language of the majority of the pupils. Polish and Russian may be taught in the schools speaking a different language, if required. New free institutions will be created for the education of girls in the various large towns. A special school is to be formed in Warsaw for the German inhabitants. The University of Warsaw will retain all its privileges, so far as they are consistent with the new regulations. A final decree ordains that, in consideration of the fact that the kingdom is again pacified, many of the severer and more degraded punishments are abolished, such as branding and flogging.

SPAIN.

It is known that Admiral Pinzon is to be superseded in the command of the Pacific squadron; but it does not appear that the Government has taken any further steps towards a pacification with Peru. On the contrary, it is said that the Ministers have met and decided upon a plan of campaign, and fixed upon the amount of force required in the Pacific. At Cadiz, four months' provisions are being prepared for the use of the Pacific squadron. No further news of importance has been received from Santo Domingo since the last reported victory. General Gandara, who won it, has sent a messenger home to explain (?) the state of affairs.

THE PRINCIPALITIES.

Prince Couza, in his determination to thoroughly Gallicise his dominions, has issued a decree introducing the decimal system of weights and measures into Roumania. According to his late ordinance, the lands taken from the landlords and given to the peasants are being apportioned out amongst the latter; the process is being peacefully carried out.

TURKEY.

Prince Murat and his family are paying a visit to Constantinople. They have been received with all the honours usually given to members of a reigning family.

TUNIS.

Suspicions have arisen that the disturbances in this country have been due to the intrigues of foreign, perhaps French, agents: they have, however, been thwarted by the diplomatic management of Hayden Effendi, the Commissioner from the Ottoman Porte, who refused to remove the Turkish squadron so long as France and Italy had any ships on the spot, and even beat to quarters when menaced by the French. Admiral Yelverton contributed greatly by his able management to the delicate operation of inducing the European squadrons to retire: he was the last to leave himself, with his flag-ship the Revenge. Khairredin Pasha, one of the ablest of the advisers of the Bey of Tunis, will shortly be sent to Constantinople to inform the Porte of the pacification of the country.

PERU.

The people are beginning to be dissatisfied with the Government, who, they think, are raising artificial obstacles against a reconciliation with Spain. The stagnation caused by the interruption of commerce is severely felt.

BRAZIL.

A change of Ministry has taken place in this empire, the late Government having been beaten on a question concerning the railways. The President of the new Cabinet is Don Francisco Furtado, who takes for his department the portfolio of Justice. The Secretary for Foreign Affairs, on whom it will chiefly depend whether the miserable quarrel now existing with England can be made up, has not yet been appointed.

MEXICO.

According to advices from Havana, there is doubt that Juarez has left the territory of Mexico.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

New York: September 26, 1864.

THE PANICS IN WALL STREET—THE M'CLELLAN CANVASS—THE WITHDRAWAL OF FREMONT AND RESIGNATION OF BLAIR—MILITARY INTERFERENCE WITH THE DEMOCRATIC MEETINGS—LYING IN HIGH PLACES—REPUDIATION OF THE WAR-DEBT BY THE MASSES.

Wall Street has been fearfully excited for the last three or four days with extravagant stories of great Federal victories and Southern disorganisation, with clamours for peace and overtures for peace. I say Wall Street particularly, for while credulity and partisanship have spread widely among the people the sanguine delusions of the hour, the greater part of them are inventions, meant to affect the money market and bring down the price of gold for the advantage of speculators, in which they have had the heavy help of the Government for its own political objects.

The real and ascertained Federal success is the defeat of General Early in two battles, the driving of him out of Winchester, the forcing of his inferior forces up the valley of Virginia, and the clearing of sixty miles of the valley from regular Confederate forces. It is something really substantial, if told in moderate terms such as the ascertained facts warrant; but the Government despatches, and the army correspondents, and the rival newspaper presses of both parties, have exaggerated it into a Confederate rout of the Bull Run sort, and talk of marching at once to Staunton and Lynchburg, and of Grant having Lee at his mercy. They who know the resources of General Lee, and the country through which this march is to be made, ridicule the presumption of this talk; but it has had its effect in creating another popular delusion that peace is coming soon by force of success in arms, and in enabling the shrewd ones to engineer themselves out of tight places in stock and gold speculations, and engineer the unsuspecting and innocent public into their places.

On Monday, there came to help them, perhaps by their own procuring, a report, viâ Memphis, of the capture of Mobile by Farragut's fleet. Down went stocks and gold, heavily. The story is not confirmed to-day; very probably it is not true at all, and if it were, only a panic-stricken bolder would estimate the effect as really making a difference of four or five per cent. in the rate of gold, as this did for some hours.

It is little better than fatuity for people to permit themselves to be scared out of their money by the idea that subjugation would insure such a reduction of expenditures as would bring the Federal finances into a sound state. The revenues are so far short of the actual expenditures that the government is carried on by the issue of paper money to the extent of a daily addition of nearly, or quite, two millions of dollars—a fact which it taxes the ingenuity of the Treasury to disguise from the public, but which is demonstrably true. Absolute peace and harmonious reunion—two impossibilities—would not for a long time stop this flow of paper expansion and increasing debt. The victims, who have fallen by hundreds, bankrupted and ruined by this artfully fomented panic, might have learned something of the real expectations of the Government in regard to the concluding of this war, by noticing that, in the midst of their most vainglorious boastings, they are evidently contemplating the necessity of still another draft after this is over. Their Provost-Marshals have been instructed, in various cases where a disputed excess of recruits is claimed, to adjust it by promising credit in the next conscription—mark, the next.

General Sherman, from his point of observation in Georgia, does not look upon the war as near its close yet. In his defence of the order for depopulating Atlanta, he justifies it by saying bluntly, 'It was not designed to meet the humanities of the case, but to prepare for future struggles. I know,' writes he, 'the vindictive nature of our enemy, and that we may have many years of military operations from this quarter.'

Nevertheless, Wall Street has been in a panic under these canards about victories and peace. Paper rose from about 226 to 185 for gold in three days, oscillating up and down with such sudden shocks, sometimes 8 or 10 per cent. in an hour or two, that the paper dollar rose from about 44 cents to about 54 cents in value, and ranged over all points between. What it is to-day I have no means of learning here, but the tendency was reactionary, and whatever may be its rates for a day or two more of the panic, the rebound to higher rates for gold is as certain as any law of finance. In the meantime, the fall has driven many a broken man out of Wall Street, and the shock to prices driven hundreds of dealers into bankruptcy. It gives a faint foreboding of what will be when the day of reckoning comes in earnest.

The political campaign is going on hotly. But it cannot be disguised that the military éclat with which the Administration is surrounding itself is helping the election prospects of Mr. Lincoln.

The canvass for M'Clellan proceeds, but not with the élan or enthusiasm with which it commenced. The leading Peace men and Peace journals have accepted M'Clellan. Vallandigham himself has consented to speak for the ticket in Ohio; and even the Irish organs in this city, the Freeman's Journal and the Metropolitan Record, have withdrawn opposition, and agreed to yield their support. The Daily News alone holds out. But the nomination drags heavily with the Peace-party voters. The Western Peace men, dissatisfied at the prospect, have proposed a mass assemblage of Peace men to meet at Cincinnati on October 18, in order to make an enunciation of principles and reestablish the old landmarks of constitutional liberty. If such a meeting be held, with all the numbers expected for it, it may make the defeat of M'Clellan so absolutely certain that the struggle might as well be abandoned, or it may, with prudent counsels, bring him an element of new strength. The first is, however, the more likely effect of the movement if persisted in. On the other hand, the Republicans are coming together again rapidly under the persuasions and the coercion which the Administration has within its reach to apply.

The withdrawal of Fremont in favour of Lincoln last week was immediately followed by the exodus of Postmaster-General Blair from the President's Cabinet. Fremont's letter was published on the 21st; on the 23rd Mr. Lincoln civilly requested Mr. Blair to resign. Post hoc, propter hoc, so the whole public reasons. If General Fremont had continued to be a candidate, Mr. Blair would still be Postmaster-General. Econverso, if the President had insisted on retaining Mr. Blair, General Fremont would not have declined, at least not in Mr. Lincoln's favour. The expulsion of Blair is plainly the condition for the support which Fremont and Chase and the discontented Radicals consent to give. The propitiating of such bitter enemies required a sacrifice of friends, consistency, and character, and the President has given it. The victim takes his doom smilingly, doubtless reassured by the faith or the promise that when this emergency is passed, what is taken away shall be made up threefold by the powerful patron who, in surrendering him for the present to his enemies, gives him a parting encomium as the most faithful of public officers and truest of friends. He tells Mr. Blair—

'You know very well that this proceeds from no dissatisfaction of mine with you, personally or officially.'

'Your uniform kindness has been unsurpassed by that of any friend.'

'In the three years and a half during which you have administered the General Post Office, I remember no single complaint against you in connection therewith.'

But he adds: 'The time has come when your resignation would be a "relief."'

What a pitiable spectacle of personal meanness and partisan profligacy is here exhibited in the truckling of the head of the Government to the resentment of his personal enemies, and bartering away friends and high offices for a halting support which they bring him with reiterated expressions of undiminished contempt! Fremont, in the act which gives the President his coveted 'relief,' repeats his bitter arraignment of the Administration as 'politically, militarily, and financially a failure,' and denounces the timidity of Republicans who, sharing in these opinions, have by their silence allowed Mr. Lincoln to attain a position where to support him becomes sheer 'necessity.'

The two Blairs—Montgomery Blair in the Cabinet, and General Frank P. Blair, of the St. Louis district, Missouri, in the House of Representatives—have been the 'king's friends,' who openly and successfully exposed the Fremont and Chase intrigues of the last two years to defeat the reelection of Mr. Lincoln. They detected the schemes and sounded the hollowness of Fremont when he commanded in the department of Missouri in 1862, and were Mr. Lincoln's advisers in displacing him. Last winter, when the Chase scheme against Lincoln was ripening, General Blair, from his seat in Congress, boldly attacked the Secretary of the Treasury as a faithless politician, and for gross mismanagement and corruptions in office. Immediately Mr. Lincoln, in violation of law, restored the accuser his forfeited commission as major-general in the army, and made several changes among the generals in command to create for him a distinguished place. To-day Lincoln, and Fremont, and Chase are in league together to prevent the supreme power in the State from being wrested away into 'unlineal hands;' and, like an ancient triumvirate which was about to crush the remnants of Roman liberty under a military dictatorship, each is doubtless ready with his proscription list, not doubting that he will be the Augustus of the new empire, or of whatsoever else the new Government may be called, for which Mr. Lincoln's success will displace the Republic.

In Mr. Lincoln's complimentary letter to Mr. Blair dismissing him, occurs the following passage, on which something may be said, as disclosing a little of the morals of Mr. Lincoln and the morals of his party:—

'In the three years and a half during which you have administered the General Post Office, I remember no single complaint against you in connection therewith.'

Complaints against the management of the Post Office have been many and loud, and from sources not to be treated with indifference. Does Mr. Lincoln mean to say that he remembers none, or that there are none which he remembers against Mr. Blair, because it is not Mr. Blair that was responsible?

It has been said, on the authority of Governor Seymour of this State, that his letters have been detained and read in the Post Office.

Mr. A. Oakey Hall, district attorney for this city, has charged under his own signature that his private letters from Governor Seymour have been detained, and that his own private letters to other persons have been tampered with, 'when their outside indicated associations distasteful to the Administrative sympathisers.'

The near friends of General M'Clellan have averred, and continue to repeat, that the private letters of that officer during his campaign in Virginia were opened in the Post Office, and their contents communicated to the War Office, and that what was said in these private letters engendered a good deal of the official animosity against him.

The same accusations were brought by the friends of Fremont, that his and his wife's private letters have been constantly tampered with in the same way.

In private circles you can hear constantly of cases of the like spying on the correspondence of merchants, to discover traces of sympathy or interest in blockade-running. Letters are frequently shown that have been opened, closed again, and endorsed 'Examined at' the office of the Secretary of State.

The extent to which this is practised was partially disclosed in a late military trial at the West of a 'copperhead' arrested for disloyalty, and the proof brought forward was a letter taken from the mails which had never reached its address.

The Postmaster-General himself thought these charges of some consequence, for some time ago he published a letter in which he denied the imputations, but so ambiguously that the public interpreted him as saying that these things, if done, were not done by the Post-Office Department—the inference being that they were acts of the executive through others, the State or the War Department. The use of the spy-system over letters is scarcely denied, and the President's certificate of the innocence of Mr. Blair is but an indirect way of taking the responsibility upon himself.

The successor to Mr. Blair, named in the despatches, is Ex-Governor Denison of Ohio, a Radical in politics of the extreme New England school. It is said to be doubtful whether he will accept. No person will be appointed who will not make the Post-Office Department, in its patronage and its secret uses, a partisan machine in the coming election.

Instances multiply daily of the interference of the soldiers to break up Democratic meetings. The St. Louis Republican—an intensely 'loyal' paper—contains in its issue of last Thursday an account of the irruption of some soldiers at Troy, in Lincoln County, in the State of Missouri, into a church where the friends of M'Clellan were holding a meeting, and creating a disturbance there, during which they discharged their firearms into the crowd, shooting three persons, one of whom they killed. The enrolled State militia were called out; but the soldiers had got away, and no arrests were made.

Such paragraphs as the following describe the state of things in Missouri. I find them in one day's St. Louis papers:—

'Hon. James H. Birch entered the court-house at Kansas City, to declare himself a candidate for Congress in that district, and was forcibly ejected from the stand by soldiers and abolitionists.'

'Mr. Bouton, a prominent claybank in the western part of the State, attempted to make a speech at Liberty, Clay County, when two soldiers entered the house, and dragged him out by the hair.' ('Claybank' is the local designation in Missouri for a gradual emancipationist. They call the immediate rabid abolitionists 'Charcoals.')

'Sixty men of the Sixth Missouri Cavalry, armed with pistols, clubs, and stones, again came to the Republican office on Saturday night, threatening to take down the M'Clellan and Pendleton flag. Colonel Baker, commanding the post, had previously stationed a small guard at the office door, and at their command the rioters went away, threatening that they would yet destroy the flag. The office remained under guard last night.'

How the voting of soldiers is to be taken under the auspices of Mr. Lincoln's officers, is described in a letter to the Chicago Times from Fort Snelling, where, by order of the Governor of Minnesota, a ballot was taken on the 19th:—

'Charles H. Lincan, editor of the German Volksblatt here, and another Democrat, went to the fort to see fair play and distribute M'Clellan tickets. For discussing the merits of M'Clellan Mr. Lincan was put outside the lines; on some other pretext the other gentleman was disposed of in the same way.'

This is what the Republicans call a 'fair' election, and a 'free' soldiers' vote.

There is a certain General Hovey, who is in command of a military district in Indiana, who lately expressed the feeling of the Republican army officers generally in a speech which he delivered at Indianapolis on the 17th, denouncing and threatening with the vengeance of the army every 'Northern man who is in favour of peace. The following are two or three passages which were reported in one of the most loyal Lincoln papers—the Cincinnati Gazette:—

'The idea of reconstruction, of reconciliation, is a mere child's whim—subjugation is the word.'

'Do you, Peace men, think if you had peace through the betrayal of the army, they would come back in disgrace and let you live in peace?'

'If the army comes back in triumph or in disgrace, there is no hope for those who oppose the war. I warn them in time, that, unless they turn from the error of their ways, they will find the way of the transgressor is hard.'

All military commanders are not, however, like the man Hovey. In Northern Kansas, one United States General, T. A. Davies, commanding the district, being informed, as he says, that the commanding officer at Fort Leavenworth was about to furlough the officers, soldiers, and employés at the fort, for the purpose of sending them to Leavenworth City to break up a political meeting of the friends of M'Clellan, which was to be held on the 17th, issued a special order commanding 'all officers, soldiers, and employés in the military reservation' within which Leavenworth is, 'to be at their various quarters, camp depots, &c., till 11 o'clock P.M. on that day.'

This effectually stopped the military combinations for a riotous disturbance of a M'Clellan meeting. But the necessity of such an order betrays the fearful extent of this turbulent disposition among the soldiers in camp to overawe, browbeat, and assault citizen voters who are opposed to the reelection of Mr. Lincoln. In many cases it appears that the most disorderly of the soldiers are the freshly imported foreigners or the old rubbish of cities, who are without votes themselves and are the better tools of unscrupulous and ambitious officers.

Here are some of the elements of a free and fair election in this Republican country which are worth the study of such among Englishmen as are enamoured of democracy.

The Lincoln journals are engaged in the effort to prove that General M'Clellan is a coward as well as a traitor; that he always skulked from personal danger, and during the battle of Malvern Hill, one of the bloodiest of the battles before Richmond in 1862, abandoned the field and hid himself on board of a gunboat!

The habit of reckless assertion has reached high places, and any falsehood is asserted without shame in order to inflame the passions of the populace. Senator Wade of Ohio, in a speech made last week in Pennsylvania, told the crowd, in order to excite them against the Democrats, that Jefferson Davis 'telegraphed from his seat in the Senate to the rebels in Charleston to fire on Fort Sumter,' and taunted the Democrats there with having submitted to the insult. 'I was in the Senate when these things were being done,' said the Senator, 'and I speak of what I know.' Now the truth is, that, when Sumter was fired on, Jeff. Davis was in his place as President of the New Confederacy at Montgomery, the first seat of government.

The Speaker of the House of Representatives ought to be a man of truth. Yet a few days ago Mr. Speaker Colfax addressed an Indiana meeting in a long political assault upon the Democrats, in which he said, 'Every man who is a leader in the rebellion in the South, as President, Vice-President, members of the Cabinet, Speaker of the House of Representatives, the heads of their armies, every one of them is a Democrat of the olden times.' Such assertions may pass current for a while where men are grossly ignorant and decent newspapers are scarce. Vice-President Stephens was a Whig. Mr. Benjamin, Secretary of State, was an old-line Whig; so was the Attorney-General. General Lee was a Whig; Governor Vance of North Carolina was a Whig; and Mr. A. Graham, one of the Confederate Senators from North Carolina in Congres, swas the Whig candidate for Vice-President on the Presidential ticket with General Scott. The Governor of Alabama (Watts) and both the Alabama Senators were Whigs; the Governor of Louisiana (Allen), one of the Senators, and a majority of Representatives were Whigs. I might go on and show the same in every State, but these facts will suffice to show what brazen falsehoods public men in the highest position will utter to help their party, and nobody appears to think any the worse of them after exposure. 'All's one for that,' as Jack Falstaff said on the detection of one of his grossest lies.

The Democrats had a good joke on the Tribune last week. Mr. Greeley found a fine passage going the rounds, attributed to the late Stephen A. Douglas, and reproduced it in his paper with a high compliment to its patriotic spirit. It happened to be part of General M'Clellan's late West Point oration, to which a wrong credit had been affixed. The M'Clellanites were very jolly over Greeley's misadventure in landing their candidate without meaning it.

The gun-firing and speech-making of the Democrats goes on throughout the country, but in the meantime the Administration has succeeded, to a great extent, in quieting the disaffection in the Republican party, and will probably bring it unitedly to the polls.

Ex-Secretary Chase has compounded his quarrels with the President, and takes the field to sustain his reelection. He has already made one speech, and proposes to canvass the whole State of Ohio previous to the election.

No fiercer attack has been made by any Democrat than the manifesto issued a few weeks ago by Senator Wade of Ohio, and Representative Davis of Maryland, against Mr. Lincoln, charging him with gross and repeated violations of the Constitution, and contempt of law, and usurpations by military authority, for the purpose of reelecting himself. Mr. Wade is now speaking in Pennsylvania in favour of Mr. Lincoln's election.

The commercial accounts from Europe are looked upon here as quite gloomy; but politicians know how to find something cheering in the darkest-looking future. The comfort which the money writer of the New York Times takes in the growing stringency of the London money market is a purely patriotic one, but vastly more patriotic than logical. He accuses the Anglo-American bankers of this city of having 'systematically placed their own balances abroad, and advised their friends and dealers to make haste with their money also to London, if they would avoid, instead of participating in, or attempting by their support to avert, the utter wreck of our public credit.' There is a vindictive glee in the announcement that these bankers are getting alarmed for the safety of their funds in London, and the writer looks for them to draw 'immediately' for a portion of their balances 'to be employed with the greater security here!' Imagine, if you can, the complacency of this assumption, that funds are safer in the security of the American public debt than in the British investments! Imagine this in a country where the most thoughtful men are earnestly crying for the immediate cessation of hostilities, on the ground that the debt is already so large that it is next to impossible that it can ever be paid if any more is added to it, and where there is a growing determination among the over-taxed labouring classes never to pay any portion of it if their votes can prevent it. It was an original Yankee of this sort who jeered at old Noah for betaking himself into the ark: he did not believe there was going to be much of a shower after all.

The little cloud no bigger than a man's hand, which is destined to grow and disturb fearfully, if not overshadow the land, may be discerned in the resolutions against debt-paying and tax-paying which emanate every few days from workingmen's associations in various parts of the country. I send you, as a specimen of the temper of these meetings, two or three of the resolves of a late mass meeting of working-men at Chicago:—

'Whereas: The present war was not caused by the labouring men of the North, nor fought under their direction, nor continued for their interests, their only part being to bear its burdens and shed their blood in the ranks; and

'Whereas: The national bonds are almost entirely held by our own citizens of extreme wealth, and constitute in their hands chiefly profits received by them during and from the war, often fraudulent, and always enormous and extortionate, and, when held even by the fairest, have been purchased at little over one-third of what the bonds call for in gold; and

'Whereas: We regard it shameful to transmit a less sound inheritance to our children than we received from our ancestors; therefore

'Resolved: That labour is unable to pay, without utter enslavement, and ought not to be compelled to pay, the war debt of the nation; but that capitalists, shoddy contractors, and speculators, who have been growing fat on the people's ruin, shall be taxed to pay both debt and interest; and, to forestall the certain attempt to be made by them to indirectly recharge the taxes back on labour, that the wealth hoarded in Government bonds should be taxed such percentage as will certainly and finally pay off the bonds, and such tax shall stand as a credit on the bond itself, and to that extent extinguish it.'

In a land where universal suffrage prevails, and the sort of men who passed these resolutions can, when they please, give or withhold tax laws, the security of investments in the public debt is not quite so absolute as the Times optimist so pleasantly assumes it to be.

CORTINA AND THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

New Orleans, Louisiana: Sept. 24, 1864.

We have advices confirming the occupation of Brownsville by the Mexican chief Cortina, after his expulsion from Matamoras by the French forces. As previously reported, he hoisted the United States flag, declared himself an American citizen, and occupied the town in the name of the Federal Government. It is not stated whether Mr. Lincoln, or the military authorities in this Department, have accepted the offer of Cortina's services, or recognised his claim to citizenship. It is certain, however, that he has been in communication with the officer in command of the United States forces at Brazos Santiago. A Government transport, which arrived a few days ago from Brazos, reports another engagement in progress when she left between the French forces and Cortina. The fact may not be generally known that this 'Mexican patriot' is an American citizen. He was born on the Texan side of the river, of an old and wealthy Mexican family, who still reside there, and occupy a good social position. Juan Nicopomeno, this would-be ally of the United States, is the black sheep of the family. He can neither read nor write, but his ignorance is but of little consideration only so far as it seems to impart a more brutal ferocity to his crimes. There is a moral depravity about the villain that laughs even at the most sacred claims of our nature. Even a mother's love could not restrain his sacrilegious hand from applying the torch to the little chapel on the family estate. The ceremonies of religion had been celebrated in it for over a century, and it was particularly endeared to his family, but he destroyed the sacred structure in mere devilish wantonness, and in spite of the tearful entreaties of his mother. From his early youth Juan was idle and vicious, associating with the worst characters on either side of the Rio Grande. He joined a band of Mexican horse-thieves, whose depredations often extended to highway robbery and attacks upon isolated ranches. He pursued this course for years with entire impunity, owing to the facility for escape into remote parts of Mexico and the ready asylum afforded by the Mexican authorities to all refugees from Texas, no matter what might be their character. Emboldened by his long career of success, and his band grown quite formidable in numbers, he surprised and attacked Brownsville by night in the winter of 1859. He sacked and burned several of the dwellings, and seized a number of the principal citizens, some of whom he either hung or shot. His wrath was chiefly directed against the officers of justice who had been endeavouring to effect his arrest. The United States garrison at Ringgold barracks, commanded by Captain Stoneman, Colonel St. George Cooke, and others who have since become prominent officers in Federal armies, came to the rescue of the town, and in conjunction with the Texas Rangers pursued and scattered Cortina and his band, but a majority of them with their chief escaped across the Rio Grande. Indictments were found against him for arson, robbery, and murder, the Governor of Texas proclaimed him an outlaw, and the State was free of his presence for some years. In Northern Mexico he continued his career of horse-thief, frequently assuming the rôle of the robber-soldier and 'Mexican patriot,' and with such success and daring that he soon rallied round him a formidable body of horsemen. Thus, like many other chiefs of the Juarista party, Cortina soon rose to a crominent military position, the anarchical condition of the pountry inviting the rule of desperate men, and the Mexican President being such as to make welcome the services of every Dugald Dalgetty. Some months since Cortina, after the fashion of the country, issued his pronunciamento, overturned the Government of the State Taumaulipas, installed himself Governor, and declared for war to the knife against the French. When the Federal forces occupied Brownsville, a warm fraternisation quickly grew up between Cortina and the Federal officers. They attended several fandangos given in their honour by the Mexican chief, and he in turn was a frequent guest at the Federal General's headquarters. On one occasion General Henon entertained Cortina and suite at a grand banquet, when toasts were drunk pledging an eternal brotherhood between the Mexican and American Republics, and invoking 'death and confusion upon French invaders and Southern rebels.' In proposing the health of his 'distinguished guest,' General Henon declared that if the French attacked Matamoras, he would cross the river to the rescue of the 'heroic city.' Events have saved the General from the test of redeeming his pledge. He has, however, given very material aid to Cortina. He supplied him with all the military stores he needed, and it is notorious that vessels frequently left this port for Matamoras with stores and arms for the Mexican forces at Monterey and other points in Northern Mexico.

If Cortina remains in Brownsville, the pertinent question is, What will the Federal Government do with him? Though a Mexican officer, and holding a Mexican command, he is a citizen of Texas, acknowledging allegiance to the United States. His force consists mainly of deserters from the Federal forces lately quartered at Brownsville. If he be permitted to remain in his present position, it will be a standing menace to the Imperial Government of Mexico—graver than that, perhaps, for he will cross the river whenever the opportunity offers for striking a blow at the Imperial forces.

An Elegant Comparison.—The Times, commenting on the 'Peace Address,' favours its readers with the following description of the American War. We desire to draw the earnest attention of every man and woman who has lost a relative or friend in the struggle to the language employed. At the same time we protest that it is a libel to affirm that Englishmen have ever regarded the contest in such a light:—'To wish for more progress or more success on either one side or the other is simply to wish for carnage, for it is evident the Confederates will sell their lives very dear. Of course lovers of sport will wish to see the quarrel fought out. If two ruffians or two dogs have a stand-up fight in our streets, the public instantly make a ring, and upon some fanciful ground or other the several bystanders choose their sides. They become partisans, simply to add a zest to the amusement; but if the combatants killed one another they would not take it much to heart. We are disposed to think that most English, and we hope also Irish people, have passed through this phase. They have had enough of carnage. Its very sameness is wearisome. So by this time all would be rejoiced to hear of a settlement, amicable or not.'

Imports of Confederate Cotton.—In our commercial intelligence we give a return of the imports of Southern cotton into England during the month of September. The total quantity received was 14,534 bales. The imports of Confederate tobacco during the same period were 495 boxes. The returns are nearly, but not quite, complete. Confederate produce has come in small quantities from other ports.

A RESEMBLANCE AND A CONTRAST.

(From the Morning Post.)

In the address recently signed and sent by a number of persons in this country, who state that they sympathise with America in the present calamities which afflict that continent, there is one passage that is particularly worth notice, from the reflections which it suggests. After lamenting the evils of the war, and counselling an early peace, the address points out that if the Federals will only consider the matter fairly and dispassionately, they will find many points of resemblance between the Secessionists of to-day and the revolted colonists of 1776. There are, indeed, many points of resemblance between the two cases, but in every one of them there is also a very wide contrast suggested, and that assuredly not to the advantage of the ancestors of the Federals who seceded from the British empire in 1776. Let us consider a few of these resemblances and contrasts. The Southern seceders are a people of at least six millions, who are all of one mind to be independent and govern themselves: that is, they are in number about a third of their would-be rulers. But the colonists of 1776 were about two or three millions in number, that is only a very small fraction of the British empire, and among that two or three millions there was a strong Loyalist or Union party, who were in favour of continued connection with England. We were told at first there was such a party in the South, but that illusion has been long since dispelled, even among the most fanatical section of Northern politicians. If from fact we come to theory and principle, we find that the right of any number of persons sufficiently great to form a nation, to separate from the society of which they form part, and establish a new nation of themselves, is not only a right universally admitted in America, but is, in fact, the fundamental organic principle and law of their political constitution.

It was to establish that right that they seceded from and went to war with Great Britain. But that right was not admitted, and could not be admitted, by the British empire when the colonists seceded from it. It was enounced by the Americans for the first time when they revolted in 1776. The principle in question is Republicanism, and the colonists revolted to establish a Republic. But the principle of the British empire does not admit of this. If, for instance, a third of the United Kingdom were to secede from the rest, the legal nature of the act would not be rebellion against the other two-thirds, but against the Government, in which, according to the principle of a constitutional monarchy, the sovereignty of the State resides. But in America sovereignty, according to their Republican constitution, resides in the people, and the Government is their mere servant; the agency constituted and appointed by them to manage their affairs.

Directly, therefore, six millions of people, all living together in one tract of country, and all of one mind, unanimously secede, the Government ceases to be their servant or agent any longer. There can be no such thing as rebellion against a Republican Government in the sense of secession. As little can one citizen, or any number of citizens, rebel against his or their equal or equals in the person of another citizen or number of citizens. The law and constitution of the Republic of the United States was based on the consent of the people. This consent of the people was the very essence of its authority. If a small minority scattered over the whole Union—a few in this State, a few in that, and so on—had rebelled against the law and constitution maintained by the common consent of the majority with which they were mixed up, it would have been different. But in the case of secession we have a third of the whole nation, inhabiting one continuous tract of country by themselves, all unanimously withdrawing their consent from an arrangement under a voluntary partnership into which they had entered, and therefore had a right to retire from, of their own free will. It is mere absurdity and abuse of terms to talk of the six million Southerners rebelling against the agency for transacting public business from which they had withdrawn their delegated authority, or against the twenty millions of the North, who are their mere fellow-citizens and equals.

But the secession of the colonists was legally and grammatically a rebellion against the Government in which resided the sovereign power of the State whereof they formed part, and against which they revolted, contrary to the principle acknowledged throughout the British empire. We may follow out this parallelism of similarity and contrast into every ramification of detail. It has been said that the negroes in the South ought to have a voice in deciding the question of secession, as it concerns them. We may admit this for argument's sake. A people in the Republican sense generally, though not perhaps in the sense which the North themselves would have attached to the word up to 1861, should include all the human beings of which the society is composed—Helots as well as Greeks. It cannot include those who are outside of the 'people' in question. For instance, in the Republican sense, namely, that a 'people' means any number of persons large enough to constitute a nation, and resolved to establish a new society of their own, whether they have hitherto formed part of another community or not, the North, who are separated from the South by a sharp, well-defined line, are not entitled to a voice in the matter at all, any more than the rest of the British empire had any right, according to their theory, to a voice in the question of colonial secession in 1776. But what will be the consequence of admitting that the negroes have a right to a voice in the matter?

In the first place, the negroes are a small comparative minority of that society which has resolved to secede, so that their vote, man for man, will not count for much. In the next place, if it is their interest that the Union should be maintained—that they might have a chance of escaping from their owners into the free States—it was much more the interest of the slaves of the colonists that the Union should be maintained with the British empire. There were fugitive slave laws in the United States, but there was no fugitive slave law for handing over to their masters the slaves who had escaped from the colonies to England. Slavery would have been much more likely to be perpetuated, had the Union been continued, or were it restored, than it would be in the case of North and South becoming two separate independent empires. Would not the slaves have a better refuge to escape to if North and South became two independent States, the former free, the latter slaveholding, than if both were one Union as before, with fugitive slave laws for delivering up escaped slaves when claimed by their masters? If the old Union is restored, slavery, which was an essential institution of the old Union, will inevitably be restored with it. It has been said that the Southern States were represented in the American Parliament, while the colonists were not represented in the Parliament of England. But this is a mere quibble about names and definitions. What does it matter whether the South were nominally and formally represented or not, so that they were outvoted, and their interests systematically sacrificed to the North. So long as the tyranny of the majority is established in reality, how does it signify under what specious forms it may be done? We might continue this parallelism much further, but we have said enough to convince every reasonable and impartial mind.

HOW SUBJUGATION PROCEEDS.

(From the New York Daily News, September 27.)

The fall of Vicksburg is undone. The Mississippi has been once more sealed to the up-country merchantmen. Confederate guns sink, burn, and destroy, along the line of the Father of Waters; and the declaration by the Constitution of the Confederacy of the freedom of its navigation, has been annulled, vi et armis, by horse, foot, and artillery. And the conquest of the South, ye men of the West, goes bravely on!

Texas has been abandoned. The Rio Grande has been opened for supplies of Confederate material. Matamoras is a port of entry for Southern cotton, and a banking-house charged with unlimited transactions in Southern gold! Thus, ye war advocates of these broad States of the North, are the supplies of the Confederates being cut off, and their credit crippled by exclusion from the markets of the world!

The Louisiana of the Abolitionists was a broad State while its riches were ungarnered by organised robbery. Like a sucked orange, now that its 'loot' has been transferred to Black Republican pockets, it has collapsed. A ring-fence of pickets hedges in the jurisdiction of Mr. Hahn within a narrow circle around New Orleans, and he has fallen from his high estate below the level of the ambition of Sancho Panza, since his dominions have ceased to embrace the governorship of even Barataria!

Stand Wattie lords it with his Indians on the Western border. The lands of the Creeks and the Cherokees are once more under the protection of his braves, and he holds sway so far up towards Kansas to give law probably at this moment from Fort Gibson!

General Steele sleeps at Little Rock. He is as inoffensive as a quaker gun. His army appears to be as mythical as Sir John Falstaff's men in buckram. Price moves up on one side into Missouri, and Shelby, Marmaduke, Fagan, had already preceded him on the other, within seventy or eighty miles of St. Louis. And thus, ye hopeful advocates of subjugation, does the work of conquest progress beyond the Mississippi.

Western Tennessee the work of subjugation has compelled us to surrender. The recruiting ground and storehouse thus opened has given and fed an army for Forrest. The Memphis and Charleston Railroad has been surrendered. Memphis has been lately plundered by a few Confederate horsemen; Vicksburg has recently been threatened by a gathering at Jackson; and the sovereignty of the Confederacy stands unchallenged throughout almost the length and breadth of the great producing region of Mississippi!

Forrest is in Middle Tennessee, killing, capturing, plundering, and not afraid. Cavalry men of the regular army of the Confederacy, guerillas, bushwhackers, and all descriptions of evil-doers, disturb Federal dominion in the fair State of Kentucky. And thus, you believing imperialists, progresses between the Tennessee and the Ohio the highly democratic business of armed repression!

Sherman is in Atlanta. The gallant fellow seems to have been less puzzled as to the mode of taking it than he is now by the question of what to do with it. One advantage that the war-makers have gained by it is the comforting assurance that he sees, from within its earthworks, a business of conquest which must go on, he says, for many years. The great guns fired and the powder burned for the fall of that den of misery and blood: what has been accomplished, aside from executive clap-trap, by this foolish hunting of the ignis fatuus of Southern subjugation into the jaws of the cannon of Atlanta?

Sheridan has won two victories in the Valley. The material result so far gives him the possession of that region for a distance of about sixty miles from the Potomac—but not until after Early had stripped it very thoroughly of its corn and oil, its flocks and herds. The Federal chief may, it is true, with his overwhelming force—obtained by crippling Grant press still onward; but unless Sherman abandons his wild-goose chase into Georgia for a movement on the rear of Richmond, can do so only subject to the danger of such a movement in his rear as that which hurled Hunter to the Kanawah at the head of a starving mob.

Grant—oh! we hate to think of the thousands of poor victims that now drop around him under the shot and shell, and breastwork and mine, of deadly pestilence! The Lieutenant-General, however, still languishes with his shattered army under the tide-water fever of Virginia. He is monarch of about 100 square miles of Virginian soil—for which, however, he has recently acknowledged his vassalage to the extent of a contribution of twenty-five hundred fat bullocks!

All around the coast of the Confederate States the Federalists hold positions very favourable for killing our men by pestilence. All these, however, are of no use to the work of war, save only so far as they illustrate its barbarities by shelling a city, burning some houses, and frightening poor women out of their wits. At Mobile and at Charleston the Federalists have fleets that cut off foreign intercourse at these points after it had been opened, without let or hindrance, along all the wide border of Texas! Vessels by the hundred steam up and down from the Potomac to the Mississippi around the Southern shores; and pretend to declare these Federal States masters on the ocean, while the Confederate cruisers make the high seas too hot for the Northern merchantman! Such, oh! ye jubilant assertors of conquest, is the progress of your work upon the shores and waters of the deep!

And the draft? What of that? A false pretence! A crimp-sergeant's trick for winning recruits! Abandoned in New York and Brooklyn by confession, it is also abandoned all over the country in actual fact. A make-believe of filling quotas here by volunteering, or of completing them there by conscription, the call for five hundred thousand men has turned out like that of Glendower for spirits that would not come. One hundred thousand men would, we firmly believe, represent more than the total results obtained under the draft whip; and that number falls greatly short of the recruits required to bring up our armies to their old relative standard of comparison with those of the Confederacy. Expirations of terms of service, prostrations by sickness or death under autumnal fevers, casualties of battle, &c., may be fairly supposed to have involved a reduction in our strength in the field to an extent that permits of but very moderate expectations from the accessions obtained under the call for five hundred thousand men. The 'rebels,' in the meantime, have met our pretended conscription by new levies; and thus do both sides come again together to enter, for the tenth or twelfth time, on a work of blood which will surely be completed in ninety days. And thus, most sapient friends of Imperial Federalism, does the labour of war go bravely on!

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

The Index was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, The Index has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. The Index does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, The Index is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1864.

The War.

The British public has, for the last week or two, jumped at the conclusion that Mr. Stanton has made up his mind to be honest, and that a bulletin from the War Office at Washington is a true exposition of facts. It does not say much for the sagacity of general readers that they should arrive at this decision when the North is in the throes of a Presidential election, and when the falsifying of despatches or the invention of telegrams would be regarded not merely as venial frauds, but as commendable developements of party warfare. But we all know the advantage of having 'the first say.' Mr. Lincoln and the gentlemen of his Administration are, of course, alive to its importance; and we can hardly wonder if their tactics are almost as successful on this as on the other side of the Atlantic. It takes some time to stifle a malicious scandal and to root out a mischievous error even in this country. When lying is so easy and so profitable, as it is at this moment to Mr. Lincoln's satellites, we ought not to be surprised that the most is made of twenty-four hours' start, and that very little importance is attached to the subsequent correction, provided the highly-coloured version of interested officials shall have had due circulation. And at this juncture every item of news that comes from the North should be read by the light of the contest now going on in all the States of the Union. The greatest purist that ever lived, in view of four years' prolonged retention of office, could hardly fail to exaggerate if his chances of success depended on his inventive powers. What, then, can we expect from Lincoln, and Seward, and Stanton? Now it is not our intention to make light of the reverses which have befallen the Confederate arms in the Valley of the Shenandoah. A people which is fighting the battle of independence against a Power possessing more than three times its numerical strength and material resources must expect, in a prolonged war, vicissitudes of fortune, and cannot hope to conquer a peace by an uninterupted course of victory. But admitting that Early has sustained a defeat, we may yet consistently, and in perfect confidence, assert that Mr. Stanton has not chosen this moment for a sudden display of honesty, and that the Northern bulletins have ridiculously overstated the successes of Sheridan's army.

The battle of Opequan Creek was a heavy blow to the Confederates, not so much from its intrinsic importance as from its political effect. It was undoubtedly a great gain to the Federals to be able to say that, at the end of a hard day's fighting, they had compelled a Confederate army to retire from ground of its own selection. But there is no doubt that beyond the prestige of victory the Federals achieved very little. Their losses were nearly double those of Early's army. Advancing in heavy columns upon a strong position, they were literally mowed down by grape and canister, and in the end only dislodged the Confederates by the onslaught of an overpowering mass of cavalry on the unguarded flank of their brave antagonist. The superiority of Sheridan in cavalry compelled Early to continue his retreat, but there is not the slightest evidence to show that it was not conducted in the most perfect order; and the fact that the pursuit of the retreating army was not commenced for twenty-four hours after the engagement sufficiently proves the rough treatment Sheridan's army experienced. At Fisher's Hill cavalry again enabled the Federal General to outflank the Confederates, and Early chose rather to lose a certain amount of material than to risk the destruction of his small force. But this was the last Federal triumph. Notwithstanding Sheridan's inflated boasts of having routed the army opposed to him, Early's rearguard easily held him in check at Mount Jackson, and finally retired unmolested in the direction of Harrisonburg and Staunton. But by this time the earlier conditions of the fight were altered. Sheridan was seventy miles away from his base of operations, Harper's Ferry; Early was falling back upon reinforcements and supplies. Kershaw's division had come up to his aid; probably fresh troops had been despatched to his assistance. At all events, it is reported from Southern sources that at Broom's Gap the Confederates had taken up a strong position, which Sheridan had assaulted unsuccessfully; that Early had then resumed the offensive and driven the Federals six miles; and this intelligence is borne out by the admission that the Federals had actually fallen back to Harrisonburg, at least twenty miles from Broom's Gap. Under these circumstances it would appear that Sheridan's progress has come to an end, and if he cannot advance he must retire, and once more abandon the Shenandoah Valley. He has suffered fearful losses; his army is worn out with heavy marching and constant fighting; he is eighty miles distant from his base; his line of communications is open to the constant incursions of Confederate cavalry through the gaps of the Blue Ridge. There is a reasonable probability, therefore, that we shall hear either of the retreat of Sheridan's army or of a new humiliation to the Federal arms in the Valley of the Shenandoah.

But both Sheridan's and Early's forces can only be regarded as detachments from the main armies at Petersburg and Richmond. Sheridan's attack appears to have been concerted with General Grant, and as soon as its success was known Grant put his army in motion. On the right and left the Federals attacked, according to their own reports, with partial success. Generals Birney and Ord, on the north bank of the James River, are reported to have carried strong intrenchments close to Chapin's Farm; and General Warren is said to have extended his front into close proximity to the South Side Railway. This change would make Grant's line some twenty miles in extent, and we may hope that Lee will soon find out some weak point in so extended a position. That the Federals should claim guns and prisoners, and should declare Richmond in serious danger, is nothing new. General Birney is the hero of half a dozen successful advances and as many great defeats, and he may again capture some unimportant earthworks; but if he is within five miles of Richmond, then he will find that his labour is just beginning, and that the fortifications of the Southern capital will stand a lengthened siege. But if Grant has been encouraged or impelled to assume the offensive in Virginia, it is certain that Sherman's army in Atlanta is in a position of extreme peril. Strong enough to hold Atlanta against any force that can be brought against it, it has yet to preserve a bold front before Hood's army, and to keep open a line of communications some 250 miles in length. According to the latest accounts, a Confederate cavalry force was destroying the direct line between Chattanooga and Atlanta; Forrest with 10,000 men had cut the railway at Athens, Alabama, had driven the Federals into Nashville, and was preparing to operate seriously on the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad. Hood was taking up a position threatening the Federal rear, and Wheeler's cavalry force was held in reserve to act either in Georgia or Alabama. Meantime Sherman was said to have got his last man. The North-western States had been drained to recruit his armies. The Federals in Missouri wanted aid; in Arkansas the existence of Federal rule depended on the tenure of one fortified town; Little Rock; Texas, can not boast of a single Federal soldier on her soil; and Western Louisiana, with the exception of the city of New Orleans, has virtually returned to the Confederacy. It is obvious that all the talents of Mr. Stanton are needed to bolster up Mr. Lincoln's chances; and it ought not to surprise our readers if for the next two weeks every skirmish should assume the aspect of a Federal victory, and every movement of Federal troops should be described as a preliminary to the coup de grâce to the Confederate cause.

A Pretty Game of Chess.

It is curious to see what infinite perplexity and confusion are given to the followers of Lincoln by the unfortunate African. "Am I not a man and a brother?' receives at one time an affirmative and at another a negative answer; and the sable interrogator, after having caused a world of vexation and sorrow to his Northern benefactors as a slave, seems likely to involve them in yet greater trouble as a freeman. In the political circles of the United States, singularly enough, the negro has now no friends at all, and in the social circles, though he asserts himself greatly, attends the levees of President Lincoln, takes the best seat in the lecture-room or the concert-hall, and dances with a white partner at miscegenation soirées, he is yet so far under the ban of the 'Hunc tu Romane caveto,' that his oldest and most consistent eulogists are constrained to repudiate him. In truth, the 'nigger worshipper' is getting tired of his dark idol, and somewhat ashamed of his former idolatry. A few faithful adherents still stand by Cuffee and dance with him—nay, for aught we know, marry him, or worse—such as Angelina Weld and Anna Dickinson; but the politicians and philosophers, such as would retain any influence over the public mind, manifest the strongest repugnance to being known as associates of the poor negro, and disown the very doctrines they have for years been defending.

Par exemple, Horace Greeley. Ardent friend of the negro has been the editor of the Tribune since he first began his career as journalist, teacher of public morals, and propagandist of -isms. His porch has always been open to the black man—his academy has always proclaimed the equality of the races. Yet Horace now denies this equality, will not dance with 'cullurd pussons' any longer, let who will pipe unto him, and is so indignant at the bare statement that white Black Republicans can fraternise and mingle in the 'windings of the mazy' with black Black Republicans, that he threatens to horsewhip the reporter who tells of the free-and-easy fandango. Horace horsewhipping! Shade of Tamerlane, but this is horrid! Odds Enfields and Whitworths, but here's a transformation! Well, we have lived to hear John Bright, the prophet of peace, cry bravo to the cruellest and most unnatural war of all the ages, and we may not wonder that the spirit bellicose should so change the meek optimist of the Tribune that he should aspire to try the other end of the horsewhip, as a mild preparative to the musket or the sword.

On the evening of September 21, there was a meeting of the Central Lincoln Club at the regular Republican headquarters, corner of Twenty-third Street and Broadway, New York City, at which many eloquent speeches were made, and upon the adjournment of the club, the hall was immediately given up to a miscegenation ball at which several prominent Republicans assisted. Whites and blacks alternated in the dances like the keys of the pianoforte, and became mixed up on the floor like the pieces on the chess-board, in a strikingly miscellaneous manner. Considering the place at which the ball was held, and the fact that it followed directly upon the adjournment of the Central Lincoln Club, one might fairly attach to it a political significance, such as belonged to the salons of the Revolution of 1793. It might have well been regarded as a sort of political partie d'échecs in which black was to play and checkmate in two moves. Yet mark that when the New York World, in the legitimate exercise of its vocation as chronicler of events, undertakes to report the proceedings, Greeley waxes wroth, and declares that anybody who dares assert that Abolitionists have danced with negroes deserves to be horsewhipped. A fortiori, then, the Abolitionist who so dances is worthy of castigation, and, as for the negro, we suppose he or she that should be caught in a galop with a white partner ought to swing on the gallows. Alas! poor Cuffee!

It is difficult to account for this recent sensitiveness of Greeley on the subject of social fraternisation with the blacks. It may be that, Seward having thrown the negro overboard in his Auburn speech, and Lincoln having wholly abandoned the idea of the extermination of slavery, policy dictates the desertion of the dusky brethren on the part of the recognised friends of the Government. Or it may be that the negro, since the enlargement of his rights, social and political, has fallen into bad company among the lower white classes of the Northern States, and thus degraded himself in the eyes of Horace, just as Doll Tearsheet tells us of the word 'occupy'—'which was an excellent good word before it was ill-sorted.' Or yet again the wrath of Horace may be referable altogether to physical objections becoming stronger and stronger against Dinah as the atmosphere of the ball-room becomes more and more heated, and the negro may be only objectionable when in a high state of perspiration. Certain social privileges may be safely allowed him in a cold climate and in the open air, which must be withheld in crowded apartments and under a tropical temperature, and thus his full citizenship be determined by isothermal lines, and not by 36.30 or any other degree of latitude. Sydney Smith once said that he thought the negro might have become a citizen in the United States but for his odour, like the bay-tree in the Georgics—

Et si non alium late jactaret odorem,
Civis erat.

The question is, after all, not a very pleasant one to pursue, and might fairly be left to the discussions of the Anthropological Society; but it is certainly worthy of remark that, while miscegenation is going on apace in the Northern States of America, the Lincolnites proper are deserting their black brother and backing out from the practical working of their own long-cherished dogma of African equality.

The Bazaar at Liverpool.

The thanks of every lover of his fellow-creatures will be awarded to the promoters of the Liverpool Bazaar. To alleviate the physical sufferings of human beings, whether by the foundation and support of hospitals, or the still nobler effort of charity which prompts sisters of mercy to pursue their self-imposed tasks, is the peculiar office of Christian benevolence. Indeed, while the eye gazes on the picture of gentleness, of loving acts and emotions, which command devout admiration for Him who taught peace and goodwill among men, no feature so enchants the imagination as those acts of healing which restored to vigour the miserable victims of disease. Inasmuch, then, as the approximation to an ideal perfection constitutes the highest claim to just applause, it is not without a law of reason that respect unbounded and unqualified has been bestowed on those who have loved to smooth the pillow and bind the wounds of the soldier. Moreover, in a country and among a people obedient to the laws of Christianity and civilisation, just as the spectacle of a woman fighting in war shocks the softer sensibilities, so by the force of contrast does woman, while bravely enduring the horrors of the hospital, inspire a courage and devotion such as even the fierce enthusiasm of a Jeanne d'Arc can scarcely excite. But if the conduct of the primary agent is so worthy of praise, it follows that every effort which renders that conduct more potent of good is also laudable in its degree. Assuredly, if millions fall down and worship him who successfully sends brave men by thousands to the grave or to the hospital, some may be found to admire those who assuage the misery which the mighty master of war has created. Then again, stern as the realities of the battle, the forced march, or the night watch may be, it has been found possible so far to embellish war with outward trappings and with ideas of triumphant glory as to fill the imagination with all 'the pride, pomp, and circumstance of war,' and to obscure its severer features. Yet, perhaps, if poets had been more just or their audience more gentle, it would have been a truer and more facile labour to have softened the repulsive traits by dwelling on the acts of mercy evoked. At any rate, but few years have passed since English people regarded the operations of the Patriotic Fund and the efforts of Miss Nightingale with more sincere and more deep pride than all the honour of the hard-fought struggle of Inkerman.

On these grounds we think that every one who lends a hand to promote the success of the Bazaar which is to be held next week at Liverpool will deserve praise. The object of the Bazaar is to add a good sum of money to the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund. The operations of that Fund have been conducted on an extensive scale and in a creditable manner. Not only is it attempted to minister in a thousand ways to the unfortunate men who by the accidents of war are confined in Northern prisons, but also to alleviate the sufferings of wounded men within the Southern States, either when lying in the hospitals or on their journeys from the field to the cities. We in this country remember the peculiar pleasure derived by the soldiers in the Crimea from the institution of dispensaries which administered certain comforts to the invalids on their embarkation for Scutari; and just in the same manner many a gallant fellow in the Confederacy has blessed the hand which at the wayside houses has strengthened his body and cheered his spirit by the timely gift of some small luxury.

There is, however, one point of considerable importance which must not be overlooked in this matter. When we English people gave our money freely to our soldiers in the Russian war, we did not do it because the treasury of England was incompetent to perform the task. Besides our desire to lend a hand actively, as free men ought, to maintain the power and honour of the nation, there was also, it is believed, an honest and humble desire to do an act of Christian benevolence. Similarly, although in the present case we are dealing with a people who, though speaking our language, using our religion, and sprung of a common stock, are nevertheless not our people, we should not for one moment dream that we are eking out resources insufficient for the purpose. Such a thought would entirely destroy the value of the gift—first, because it would be the offspring of a haughty spirit condescending to an act of pity; second, because it would be a galling insult to a noble and an independent people. We are convinced that such a mistake will not be made, and that the gift will be offered and received in a spirit which will do honour to the donor and the recipient.

There is yet one more view not to be overlooked. The task to which in these columns we have devoted ourselves, not entirely without success, has been that of demonstrating that the English people and the people of the Confederate States possess interests in common of no ordinary magnitude, and that it is necessary for the welfare of both that they should understand with greater accuracy, and learn to look with a more just appreciation on the ideas, the laws, and the usages of each other. We believe that between them bonds of union of no ordinary stringency ought to exist, and we are well assured that the Southern people are not destitute of a kindly and even a respectful yearning towards the old country. Therefore, if such acts of benevolent sympathy as this Bazaar indicate a desire to make closer the connection between the English nation and that people whom three years of a war unprecedented in fury have demonstrated to be capable of the highest acts of genius, courage, and devotion, we shall hail the success of the experiment with pleasure, because it will be one step of progress in that task the accomplishment of which will be of lasting advantage to England, to the South, and to the civilised world.

The Strike in Staffordshire.

All nations that have a just pride in themselves are open to the charge of vanity. Indeed, the absence of vanity would argue a want of just pride. Vanity run mad has been the ruin of the Yankee people, and of them it is perhaps true—

Quem Deus vult perdere prius dementat.

Englishmen, however, are, and not without good cause, proud of themselves. Perhaps, as a nation, they are the greatest success in existence. Nay, it is probable that no nation has ever arrived at an equally favourable condition of fame, tranquillity, and wealth. England has experienced boundless prosperity in commerce and manufacture, has achieved a noble reputation in war, has built up a grand empire, has solved the problem of a combination of liberty and order, and has even acquired some little respect for morality and religion. Just at this present moment she happens to find that some other nations are not in an equally happy state with herself. War, bankruptcy, disunion, oppression prevail in America and on the continent of Europe. She herself has felt the rebound of blows inflicted, has seen her people stirred in their very souls with indignation at the rapacity of great European Powers, has beheld one great section of her industry and one immense source of her wealth absolutely paralysed, while thousands of her most industrious sons have been reduced to idleness and beggary. But, on the whole, she is singularly fortunate: her revenue is elastic, her people contented, the burdens of taxation are not overwhelming. The political world is singularly stagnant, and members of Parliament addressing their constituents at soirées or their tenants at an agricultural meeting, are forced to dilate on the cheapness of wheat and the science of crossing Leicester and Cotswold sheep. Indeed, a patriot might be pardoned for believing that the golden age had returned, and that England had become a living and tangible Utopia.

But just as the priesthood rightly exclaim, 'Let him that standeth take heed lest he fall,' so the greater the elevation of power and wealth to which England has arrived, the greater is the caution needed. It is a foolish thing to croak; the man who informs his friend, after the occurrence of some horrid disaster, that he always felt convinced that the evil would come to pass, justly earns the title of a very inopportune and impertinent critic. Yet it is a matter of reprobation that a folly or a weakness perhaps easily remedied, yet injurious if not removed, has an existence even in a state of approximate perfection.

At the present moment the old war between labour and capital—forces which in combination the economist contemplates as the origin of all effects—is raging with peculiar sharpness. The contest does not cover a broad expanse of ground, but within narrow confines it manages to attract the attention of a very considerable number of neighbours. After the French newspapers have been for many weeks narrating and commenting in terms not favourable to England on the strikes in the collieries, the journals of this country have at last discovered not only that there is a strike, but even that its dimensions are considerable and its consequences unpleasant. Indeed, to quiet humdrum people to whom an explosion of gunpowder gives a shock, the terrors of which are only relieved by the novelty of the sensation, it is really startling to find that 30,000 colliers have fully made up their minds not to dig coal except at an advance of wages; that they have held, and will continue to hold, enthusiastic meetings in which lord-lieutenants are denounced and clergymen derided, while the Mayor of Birmingham is so alarmed for the safety of the city of John Bright that he invokes the assistance of a regiment of lancers and a battalion of volunteers. If it be added to this, that an attempt has been made to apply the system of Guy Faux to a collier who preferred work at the reduced rate of pay, honest men may be pardoned for trembling in their beds. It is not for us, however, to decide on the merits of this unfortunate quarrel. Oppression on the part of masters is detestable, and reckless obstinacy on the part of the labourer is only less unfair because it is usually less systematic. So far as a strike is the honest protest against an attempt on the part of capital to usurp the obedience of labour, does it deserve support; but nothing is more difficult than to distinguish a just cause of opposition from a state of enforced idleness brought about by the interested machinations of a dozen committeemen. At the same time a state of things which renders the Mayor of a town panic-stricken at the threats of his fellow-citizens, is not creditable, especially when it would be so easy to obtain the mediation of the greatest of peace-makers, John Bright. Perhaps, however, that distinguished individual may consider the case a little too complicated even for his ingenuity. He might consider himself able to reconcile the colliers and the owners of collieries; but when the iron-workers, owing to the fall in iron of 1*l.* per ton, refuse to pay the ancient price for coal, and the vendors of the latter commodity reduce the wages of their men by 6*d.* a day to make up the loss, a professed peacemaker might well stand aghast at the attempt to adjust the difficulties of a triangular duel. Yet if there is any meaning in a borough having confidence in its representative, or if there is any use whatever in a representative, why is not such a mediator invoked? The aristocrats have failed hopelessly—why not let the democrats try? Are these distrusted by the masters or by the men? At least, whether Bright be useless or not, whether he be a practical man or a helpless agitator, surely the colliers and the owners of collieries have sense enough to adjust a dispute, the continuance of which inflicts heavy losses on the one combatant, and sours the temper and empties the cupboard of the other.

'Talk thus to the Marines!'

The struggle in America may be not inaptly defined as one between the power of insolent brute force and the principle of law and order. The human mind is never satisfied with abstract ideas, but desires to embody them in living forms. If the personification of insolent brute force is sought, it will be found to live in the person of Major-General W. T. Sherman. Butler, Milroy, Turchin, and Paine are equally insolent and equally brutal, but their fury is futile except against defenceless objects. Grant approximates very nearly to Sherman, and their relative superiority was long in suspense. The talk about 'the last ditch' and about 'robbing the cradle and the grave' was sufficiently insolent and sufficiently brutal. But Sherman eclipsed the Lieutenant-General, when he bade a Southern General 'to talk thus to the marines and not to him.'

What sort of correspondence with an enemy in the field such men as Attila or Zingis Khan carried on, it is not easy to say. Perhaps they conveyed what they desired to tell in the manner in which Nero informed Hannibal of the defeat and death of his brother at the Metaurus. In modern times, however, such methods have been abandoned, and warriors like Wellington and Soult knew how to communicate with each other without displaying the tempers of savages or using the language of costermongers. Nay, the very New Zealanders could teach Federal generals a lesson in common courtesy. Of the statements in Sherman's letter it is unnecessary to say much. There is not one which is not disproved by General Hood. Let every man read and judge for himself the correspondence which we elsewhere print. What we desire to learn is, whence do the men in power in the Northern States derive their love of vulgar insolence, their hatred of decent courtesy? From Lincoln, who condemned himself before the civilised world by his filthy frivolity at the reception of the Peace Congress, to the mad brigadier of Kentucky, it is all one story. Is it congenital coarseness, or is it the force of example? Is it nature, or is it fashion? It is bad enough for the South to have to contend with an enemy destitute of humanity. What evil destiny has decreed that her foe should repudiate common decency?

YANKEE CALCULATION.

To the Editor of The Index.

Sir,—The Spectator published, on October 8, a letter from its Special Correspondent in New York, in which, after declaring that the excess of Federal captures is more than 40,000 men, and that the Confederates had proposed to exchange all prisoners, the excess to be on parole not to serve till exchanged, the writer says: 'Now we (i.e. the Federals) have done this before, and we have learned by experience that it would now be equivalent to sending straight into the ranks of the rebel army, not only the actually exchanged men, but the excess of 40,000 paroled men, with this difference also, that the men whom they received would be healthy, well fed, and hearty; whereas our poor fellows are so wasted, so worn, and so diseased by the manner and places of their confinement, that the sworn and trebly confirmed story of their wretchedness has spread sorrow and indignation throughout the country.'

There is a calm merciless spirit in this calculation which stamps it as the work of a Yankee. One hundred thousand Northern soldiers may pine in prison, but the cost of relief would be one hundred thousand Confederates. The former are wasted and worn, and not fit for fighting. The latter are robust and ready for war. That is the only consideration. If an exchange will not pay, the argument of mercy even for their own soldiers will find but a deaf ear among the War-Christians.

I am, &c.,

THE PRINCE OF WALES IN RICHMOND.

To the Editor of The Index.

Sir,—I observe a note in your paper of last week, referring to a passage in a recent letter of Mr. Sala to the Telegraph which treats as true that absurd slander of the Prince of Wales having been insulted by a mob in Richmond, Virginia. As I was in Richmond in October 1860, when the Prince of Wales visited that city, and learned the whole facts of the case, you will perhaps give me space enough in your columns to relate them.

One Mr. Joseph Howard, jun., a travelling correspondent of the New York Times, had without invitation intruded himself on board the Harriet Lane, the steamer which conveyed His Royal Highness and suite from Washington City to Acquia Creek, where they took a special train for Richmond, sent by the civil authorities of Richmond to meet them. Howard came by the train to Richmond, and arriving at a point on the northern edge of the town where open carriages were in waiting to carry the distinguished guests to their hotel, attempted to enter one of these carriages, but was promptly hindered from so doing by the Committee of Reception. Stung by this rebuke for an impertinence, he wrote, two days afterwards, the letter to the New York Times, in which the utterly baseless story of the mob and the insult to the Prince was first given to the public. He was thus revenged upon Richmond for what he conceived his wrongs at the hands of its authorities. The letter was quickly seized upon by the Abolition journals of the North as furnishing proof of the 'brutality' of the 'slaveocracy' of the Southern States, and widely circulated to the prejudice of Richmond. The Mayor of the city, the Hon. Joseph Mayo, in vindication of its fair fame, wrote to Lord Lyons and the Duke of Newcastle, both of whom accompanied the Prince to Virginia, asking whether there was any shadow of truth in the statement made by the correspondent of the New York Times, and received letters from these noblemen declaring that there had been no insult given to his Royal Highness by mob or otherwise, but that his visit to Richmond had been altogether pleasurable and satisfactory. If communication with Richmond by mail were not interrupted, it would be an easy matter to procure the official refutation of this disgraceful slander, which was accepted for truth at the time by many persons in England, and naturally enough excited in their minds a feeling of indignation.

Of Mr. Joseph Howard, jun., it is perhaps unnecessary to say more here than that he has recently furnished the world with another specimen of his mendacity, in the forged proclamation of President Lincoln, which procured for him an incarceration for some months in Fort Lafayette.

Naturam expellas furca, tamen usque recurrit.

I am, very respectfully, yours,

A Virginian.

Close of the New Zealand War.—Submission of the Natives.—A copy of the following telegram from the Acting Consul-General, Cairo, to the Foreign Office, dated October 10, 1864, has been received at the War Department: 'I beg to communicate through your Lordship's Office, to the Secretary of State for War, and to the Quartermaster-General, Horse Guards, London, the following telegram, just received from Lieutenant-General Cameron, dated Tauranga, August 6: —"A meeting took place on the 5th and 6th of August between his Excellency the Governor of New Zealand and the natives of Tauranga, at which the latter submitted unconditionally to the Queen's authority, and placed their lands at the Governor's disposal. They have been permitted to return to their lands, a small portion only of which will be forfeited."'

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN FRANCE.

FROM A CONFEDERATE CORRESPONDENT.

Paris: October 12.

I regret that, owing to an illness which has confined me to my bed during the past fortnight, I have been unable to acquaint your readers with the recent comments of the Paris press relative to the affairs of America. During this short period, however, the attention of the French journalists has been diverted from the American continent, and has been wholly concentrated on the Italian peninsula. With that versatile impetuosity which is so prominent a feature in the French character, the Parisian press has seemed to ignore every question in the whole political world save one—that of Rome. In its consideration of this subject all other interests of a political nature have been for a time forgotten, and its every energy has been devoted to the investigation of this curious Italian Convention.

This Roman question being one of a purely speculative nature, it was not long in becoming a source of weariness to the French journalists, who, a few days since, abandoned its consideration and reapplied themselves to the American question, the changeful features of which afford a deeper and more varying interest.

The nomination of General M'Clellan, which was at first received with indifference, if not with some degree of sympathy, by the Liberal journals, has now become the subject of their most severe attacks. So long as the Peace Democrats appeared hostile to the General, he received but little opposition from these journals, but when they witnessed the entire Democratic party advance to his support, he immediately became the object of their bitterest criticism.

The Opinion Nationale, the Siècle, the Journal des Débats, and the Temps, with one voice exclaim, 'Away with this pro-slavery candidate, who seeks to reestablish the Union by the pollution of slavery!'—and they one and all consign him to the malediction of posterity. It is not he who is to restore the Union. This glorious task is reserved for honest Lincoln, for patriotic Lincoln, for the unswerving and clear-sighted Lincoln. It is amusing to notice the rambling notions of these journals on this subject.

The Temps, which may generally be regarded as a grave and moderate journal, in its enthusiasm for Mr. Lincoln positively allows itself to be carried into the domain of poetry. According to this journal, Mr. Lincoln is not only an honest, courageous, persevering man: he is more than this—a noble-hearted man, a man 'who has most unflinchingly borne the heaviest burden of responsibilities ever yet imposed upon a statesman, who has never once despaired of the safety of the country, who found the Union on the very brink of ruin, and who gave it gigantic armies and fleets, and who has but one effort more to make in order to save the great republic.'

Such language as this deserves notice. Lincoln found the country on the verge of ruin, and gave it gigantic armies and fleets! What a present! Surely General Butler's organ at Norfolk alone would have ventured to congratulate a democratic republic on having received such a gift!

The Temps thus characterises the two candidates for the Presidency. One is most determined on the reestablishment of the Union and the abolition of slavery; the other is also for the Union, but does not trouble himself much about emancipation. It is evident that the Temps, with other journals of the same stamp, has learnt nothing from Mr. Seward's speech at Auburn—'None so deaf as those who will not hear.'

In an article written by M. Chatard, of the Presse (notwithstanding its numerous errors, some of which are very serious), the respective situations of the candidates for the Presidency are more correctly described. M. Chatard appears clearly to understand that the question of slavery is no longer the cause of dispute, and that the election contest has nothing whatever to do with it. He remarks as follows:—

M'Clellan's programme differs but little from that of Abraham Lincoln, and it may well be adopted by those Republicans by whom the Union is regarded as of greater importance than Abolition. But this is also precisely the programme of Lincoln. Although he has used his best energies to secure Abolition, he nevertheless remains immovable on the principle of the Union, and in case of need, and with a view to further his Presidential success, he would quickly divest himself of the surplus weight of Abolition in order to gain his object.

The Patrie, with still greater exactness, describes the character of this election contest, and states that it is open between—

First, Mr. Lincoln, a candidate of the Republican party, whose programme is: political centralisation at Washington; the conquest of the South and the maintenance of the Union, with the clause, well defined by Mr. Seward, that slavery has nothing whatever to do with the present war.

Secondly, General M'Clellan, a candidate of the Democratic party, whose programme is: political decentralisation; acknowledgment of the rights pertaining to the States of the Union; the maintenance of the Union by pacific means if possible, and by war if indispensable, with the tacit clause, or rather the hope, that M'Clellan will not persist in his warlike determinations.

In the clear and precise sketch above given, you will doubtless recognise the pen of that intelligent defender of the Southern cause, M. Aucaigne.

You are no doubt aware that an account of the cruises of the Sumter and the Alabama has been published in French by Dentu. The sympathy exhibited by the whole French nation towards Captain Semmes on the occasion of the glorious combat near Cherbourg insured a remarkable success for this book: its first edition was disposed of in a few days, and a second is now in course of preparation, which will no doubt meet with an equally rapid sale. This unpretending little work, whose every page records some daring exploit, and which is animated throughout by a truthful and patriotic sentiment, has been received with great favour and sympathy by the entire press. The Patrie, by the pen of M. Aucaigne, the Constitutionnel, the France, and the Pays, have each earnestly directed the attention of its readers to these truly dramatic and heroic recitals, and have been loud in their praises of those hardy cruisers, whose courage and romantic adventures so thoroughly harmonise with the French temperament.

The Petit Journal itself, a popular organ par excellence, reckoning at the present time upwards of 150,000 subscribers (which supposes it to have at least 300,000 readers), has welcomed this book in an article extending over four columns, bearing the signature of the illustrious Timothée Trimm, whose celebrity amongst the working classes exceeds that of the most popular writers of the day.

This unanimous praise has caused no small vexation to the Siècle. In a furious article, inspired by the blindest hatred, it passionately calls the whole press and the entire French nation to the rescue against the Alabama and Captain Semmes, whose popularity, according to its way of thinking, is a decided disgrace. This article, altogether unworthy of a French writer, has met with the following stern comment from the Pays:—

It is in vain that the Siècle seeks to heap insult upon those who have bravely sacrificed their lives in the defence of their country; such sentiments as these can never conduce to popularity in France.

The Patrie, referring to the occupation of Brownsville by General Cortina, very justly remarks that complications of a serious nature may result from this circumstance. It is strange that such an event should have remained unnoticed by the other Paris journals, more especially as its importance must be apparent to all. This journal also contains an interesting article, written by M. Cucheval-Clarigny, on the torpedoes and armour-plated ships whose invention is due to the Confederates. Although M. Cucheval, being an editor of the Patrie, is an advocate of Northern interests, still in this article, which is by no means political, he evinces great impartiality. The fight of the Tennessee against the combined fleet of Admiral Farragut is related with great exactness. M. Cucheval admits the heroic defence made by this vessel, and does justice to the inventive genius of the Confederates in stating that the Tennessee fought unaided, during two hours, against the combined Federal fleet, being overcome at last by a mere accident, her armour having suffered no considerable damage.

CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Manchester: October 12, 1864.

The distress arising from the cotton famine has made another great stride this week, and unless matters mend to a degree not at all to be counted upon, we must shortly be prepared for a worse winter of misery than has afflicted us in any previous year. The gravity of the occasion was fully recognised at the monthly meeting of the Central Executive Relief Committee, held at the Town Hall on Monday last, when among the noblemen and gentlemen present were the Earl of Derby, Lord Egerton, Lord Edward Howard, M.P., Sir J. P. Kay Shuttleworth, Colonel Wilson Patten, M.P., and Mr. T. Bazley, M.P. Mr. Commissioner Farnall's report showed, in the words of the Manchester Examiner, 'a lamentable increase in the number of the distressed operatives during the last month.' As a matter of fact, more than 30,000 persons were thrown out of work between September 3 and October 1, and it is estimated that the number of people at the present time in receipt of aid either from boards of guardians or from district relief committees, falls very little short of 120,000. With good reason may the Guardian observe, in commenting upon so alarming a statement, that the report of Monday's proceedings will have been read with anxious concern throughout the cotton manufacturing districts. From the tenor of the discussion, it appeared to be the general opinion that, inasmuch as 'great fluctuations' would probably take place in the amount of mill work 'before the cotton trade returned to its ordinary settled condition,' the Executive Committee were impressed with the necessity of husbanding and economising their resources so as to provide if possible for any contingency that may from time to time arise. With this view, they recommended an increased employment of factory operatives upon public works; and also that a larger proportion of the unemployed than hitherto should receive relief, not from the central or district committees, but from the Poor-law Guardians, thus facilitating the inevitable transition from voluntary charitable aid to the relief to be provided at the cost of the ratepayers. This new feature in the mode of dealing with the distress would not appear of much importance unless, other things considered, it were sadly ominous of the difficulties in store for us in a more straitened and less bountifully provided future. About eighty towns have already adopted the Public Works Act, and an additional number of men will be immediately set to work where the pressure of the distress is heaviest, and works suspended during the summer in three of the unions will be immediately resumed.

The necessity of actively applying the Act in all the unions was strongly insisted on, and it was held by some of the speakers, although the statement was not verified by evidence, that there was a culpable remissness somewhere. Mr. Commissioner Rawlinson calculated that 13,000 men, whose families amount to 50,000 persons, might find employment on the public works; yet the reports for September show that the number so employed fell short of 5,000 men. Before separating, the Relief Committee expressed their sense of the seriousness of the crisis by passing a resolution to meet on each of the two succeeding Mondays, instead of fortnightly as before. Grants to the amount of 6,000*l.* were made from the general relief fund. The balance at the disposal of the committee is now 210,000*l.*; but large as this sum may appear, Lord Derby and his colleagues were sufficiently emphatic in their opinion that it would not be found more than adequate for the most cautious expenditure.

In view of so much bitter hardship in esse, and so much more in posse, it seems a cruel mockery of the wretched condition of the operatives that agents—avowed Federal agents—should still be permitted to hover among them in prosecution of the iniquitous design of inducing them to emigrate by shiploads to America. A Mr. Peter Sinclair, whom we chiefly remember in Manchester as one of the Yankee operators in the infamous George Griswold swindle, boasts of having visited Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster's constituency) and other manufacturing towns in the north, for the purpose of engaging our unfortunate dupes under what he styles 'a legal contract of service for twelve months' in their respective trades in one or other of the Federal States. The list of trades with members of which he appears to have been tampering is a tolerably comprehensive one, and represents a good deal of that kind of physique that goes to recruit armies. His first shipload—if it is allowed to sail—or, as he says, his first 'group,' purports to consist of (besides weavers, calenderers, &c.) iron-puddlers and their 'helps,' heaters, roughers, rollers, finishers, blast-furnacemen, iron-turners, brass-turners, farmers' labourers, and domestic servants. The terms upon which Mr. Sinclair is said to have engaged the 'parties' are, that from the time of starting from their respective localities they should be paid all their expense of transit to New York, and from thence to the works in the several States where they are to be employed—the emigrants agreeing to refund the cost by small weekly instalments until the whole is repaid by the workmen to the employers who advanced the capital through the medium of the aforesaid Mr. Sinclair. The sums thus to be repaid will, it is naïvely added, be 'considerably lessened by so many going together.' The whole bedding, for instance, with an extra blanket for each, towels and cookery utensils, 'as required by the Emigration Act,' were purchased for less than 10*s.* each; and in like manner the railway fare to Liverpool and the passage by mail steamer to New York were procured, as it is said, 'at a reduced rate to the emigrant,' the whole probably amounting 'to about 6*l.*' for each emigrant to repay during his year's engagement. Will Her Majesty's Government make any enquiry into the doings of this Peter Sinclair? Earl Russell might possibly make so bold as to 'see about it,' if he were encouraged by a perusal of the opinions entertained and published of this nefarious scheme by C. Godfrey Gunther, the Mayor of New York. Mr. Gunther, in acknowledging receipts of papers from the 'general agent of the American Emigration Company' (to wit 'Peter Sinclair'), writes as follows:—

Mayor's Office, New York, September 14, 1864.

Sir,—Your letter of the 5th inst. requesting my sympathy and support for your Association, together with circular, articles of agreement, and a copy of the recent Act of Congress 'to encourage immigration,' was duly received. Immigration under ordinary circumstances is a source of wealth and prosperity to a people, and its encouragement a duty. The Act of Congress under which your Association has been organised, however, is, in my judgment, for another purpose. Its title is a misnomer, and it should have been called a bait under fraudulent pretences to enlist foreigners.

England and the American War.—The war has swept American commerce from the sea, and placed it, in great measure, in our hands; we have supplied the loss of the cotton which was suddenly withdrawn from us; the returns of our revenue and our trade are thoroughly satisfactory, and we have received an equivalent for the markets closed to us in America in the vast impulse that has been given towards the development of the prosperity of India. We see a great nation, which has not been in times past sparing of its menaces and predictions of our ruin, apparently resolved to execute, without pause and without remorse, the most dreadful judgments of Heaven upon itself. We see the frantic patient tearing the bandages from his wounds and thrusting aside the hand that would assuage his miseries, and every day that the war goes on we see less and less probability that the great fabric of the Union will ever be reconstructed in its original form, and more and more likelihood that the process of disintegration will extend far beyond the present division between North and South. We observe the rapid destruction of that mighty fabric of prosperity which was so formidable a rival to our own colonies, and we look forward, at no distant date, to the day when the credit of the Republic must be hopelessly and utterly destroyed. Were we really animated by the spirit of hostility which is always assumed to prevail among us towards America, we should view the terrible spectacle with exultation and delight, we should rejoice that the American people, untaught by past misfortunes, have resolved to continue the war to the end, and hail the probable continuance of the power of Mr. Lincoln as the event most calculated to pledge the nation to a steady continuance in its suicidal policy. But we are persuaded that the people of this country view the prospect of another four years of war in America with very different feelings. They are not able to divest themselves of sympathy for a people of their own blood and language thus wilfully rushing down the path that leadeth to destruction. Accustomed themselves to the use of freedom, to believe in its future and to confide in its progress, they cannot see with indifference the ruin of so many hopes, the eclipse of so many glorious aspirations. They know very well what are the sentiments with which this fearful American catastrophe is regarded by those Governments which consider it their mission to put down liberty of every kind in the whole world, and to inculcate the doctrine that order can only be preserved by tyranny. The people of this country view with dismay the overthrow and abolition of the rights of individuals which immemorial tradition has taught them to hold sacred, and as they muse on the appalling spectacle their faith in the ultimate triumph of the good cause grows weak, and their apprehension that human nature has in it something suicidal, which the best institutions are powerless long to resist, becomes strong. Suppose any one five years ago had predicted, we will not say the present fearful condition of the United States, but the existence of the least and most tolerable evils which oppress them, from whom would he have found belief? And if such is the state of things now, what will it be after four years more such as the last four years have been? In comparison with these tremendous questions the success of one war party or the other is a matter of indifference. Ruin stares the Union in the face if the war is to be conducted by General M'Clellan, and if it be conducted by President Lincoln the result must be exactly the same. Why should we feel anxiety as to the success of one party or the other, when either must be equally fatal to the welfare of the Republic and equally pernicious to the cause of liberty and good government throughout the world?—Times, October 10.

THE CONFEDERATE SECESSION.*

Thoughtful and sensible as it is, the Marquis of Lothian's book is not very easy to read, and has faults which a more experience and more attention would have certainly avoided. The present tense is confused with the past, and imaginary cases, suggested for the sake of illustration, are mixed with real history, in a manner very likely to mislead a hasty reader ill-acquainted with the actual facts to which the author refers. The excuse, however, which he fairly pleads for faults frankly confessed—that ill-health has interfered with the composition of the work, and that want of practice has hindered its due arrangement—must exempt it from severe criticism, except at the hands of those avowed enemies from whom no book favourable to the South can expect justice, much less mercy; and these faults, after all, are the less likely to impair its usefulness, since three years of full and eager discussion have made most Englishmen acquainted with the history of Mr. Lincoln's election, and of the consequent withdrawal of the Southern States from the Union.

The Marquis writes as an Englishman, and not as a Southerner; and on the subject of slavery he shares the abstract views almost universal in this country. But he looks at the question from a practical point of view, and is willing to allow due weight to those considerations of policy which must modify and control the expression of theoretical opinions, and the efforts to carry those opinions into action, of all men fit to take a part either in the discussion or the execution of measures intended for a world of concrete phenomena, and not of pure abstractions. The essential distinction between a fanatic and a philanthropist—the regard of the latter for those practical complications of all simple theoretic questions which the former overlooks, and for the consequences which he despises—is generally the distinction observable between the English friends of the South and their countrymen who have espoused the cause of the North. The devotee of Yankeedom curses the Southerners as slaveholders, and overlooks the manner in which slaves were forced into their hands, and the reasons which have made it impossible for them to get rid of slavery; he shouts for instant abolition, without considering what abolition would make of the South, and what it would do for the negroes. The sober and honest Englishman bears in mind the fact, so pointedly recalled by the Marquis of Lothian, that it was England who forced slavery and the slave trade upon her colonies, in despite of their earnest opposition; that they have not, for the last forty years, ever been allowed to consider the subject fairly and temperately, but have been forced to defend their institutions, sword in hand, against a sect which has striven to effect an instant emancipation through midnight murder, through incendiarism, through conspiracy, through legislative usurpation, and through civil war; and remembers that they have before their eyes the examples of Jamaica and Hayti—the latter proving what becomes of emancipated negroes when left to themselves, the former what must be the fate of a country which depends for its existence upon negro labour, if once it releases the negro from that compulsion without which he will not work. No one honest enough to bear these things in mind can blame the South for not having abolished slavery; and no one who does not blame her on that score can feel any sympathy with the frantic tirades of Messrs. Bright and Taylor against the countrymen of Lee and Stonewall Jackson.

But the Marquis has one charge to bring against the upholders of Southern slavery which, as it is temperately urged and plausibly argued, ought not to be passed over altogether without notice. They do not, he says, look upon slavery sufficiently as a state of transition, through which the negro race should be educated for freedom and equality. It would seem that he has taken for granted, with too little consideration, the theory of the fundamental equality of races which is in vogue in Europe; that, while admitting the vast difference between the Caucasian and the negro, he thinks the latter capable of being fitted, by a slow and gradual process, for the same freedom and the same institutions that are enjoyed by the latter. We are not going now to argue the question whether this be true or not. We shall only say that it is questionable, and that those who know the negro best hold the contrary opinion. They believe that he is essentially inferior to the Caucasian, and that no training can ever bring a negro population to the level of the Caucasian race, especially of its Anglo-Saxon variety, or even so near to that level that the two could dwell together on terms of equality. Now historical experience shows us, that where a naturally superior and a naturally inferior race are in close contact, only two things can happen to the inferior—it must be enslaved or it must disappear. The latter is the fate of those races which cannot be enslaved, as the Maori and the Red Indian. If the 4,000,000 negroes were free among 8,000,000 whites, it would seem to be a certainty, according to the laws deducible from history, that they would be extirpated. Is it not better that they should remain slaves; being, as is admitted, happy and well treated in their slavery, well fed, well cared for in soul and body, humanised, protected, Christianised? Such is the Southern view; and unless the theory on which it rests be shown to be false, the conclusion can hardly be contradicted. At all events, those who believe the negro's inferiority to be incurable, cannot be blamed for not preparing to give him a liberty which, in that case, must inevitably destroy him.

But the most ardent Southerner will readily pardon this oversight in one who has taken so much pains to set the cause of the South in a just and favourable light before Europe. Three years or more ago, the prevalent theory in England was that secession was an aggressive movement, of which the object was the extension of slavery. So little was known of American history that it was currently supposed that slavery was the original and only ground of difference between the North and South—that the South had forced upon the North one compromise after another in favour of slavery; had sought new territory for the sake of extending slavery into it; had possessed herself of the government of the Union, and directed it to her own ends from the very first; and finally, having roused the fury of the North by repudiating her own compromises, and attempting to assert the right of holding slaves in all the territories (some said in all the States), had seceded because for once she was unable to elect a President of her own. This monstrous series of fictions has gradually been eliminated from the minds of all except those adherents of Mr. Bright whose frantic worship of democracy can see nothing but excellence in New England and nothing but evil in her enemies. But it is well to have it shown so distinctly as this book does show that in every respect this received version of the American schism was the exact reverse of the fact.

At the outset, Massachusetts was the only non-slaveholding State. She had found that slavery did not pay, and had sold her slaves to the South. Even the Fugitive Slave Law, as our author observes, was enacted on the proposition of Pennsylvania. And yet, at a very early period, the distinction between Northern and Southern interests was declared to be as strong as that between the interests of Russia and Turkey. And this was almost literally true. The North (the States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and New England) had two sorts of interests, both unconcerned with foreign trade. There were the agriculturists, who lived on their farms and provided themselves with nearly all they wanted, and fed the towns, but found no market in Europe for their corn, wheat, and similar produce; and there were the manufacturers of various goods, who, so far from exporting, could hardly hold their own at home against the superiority of Europe. Their interest, then, was protectionist; that of the farmers was hardly of any account either way. But commerce was the very life of the South. She employed her whole energy in producing cotton, tobacco, rice, for foreign markets. The only article for which she could find an adequate market at home was indigo. Her interest, therefore, was in universal free trade, except in indigo. For as she had no manufactures, and could not afford to waste her industry in that way, she was an enormous consumer of foreign goods; and a protective tariff would therefore affect a much larger portion of her expenditure than would be the case in any other country. There was, then, a strong feeling of indignation excited in the South when Congress, under Northern domination, continually increased and multiplied the duties on foreign goods, till every article of domestic consumption that could be produced at home was protected by enormous duties, except indigo. This kind of protection had no analogy to our Corn Laws or Navigation Laws. These were intended primarily for the national benefit; the latter inflicted no considerable burden on any one; the former conduced to the profit of a class which, in return, paid (and still pays) from fifteen to twenty millions of taxation proper to itself, besides its equal share of the general taxation of the country. At any rate, the profits of these duties levied on Englishmen went into English pockets. But American protectionists proposed no national benefit; their tariffs were a naked spoliation of one section for the profit of the other. The South paid in customs' duties perhaps two-thirds of the Federal revenue. She paid ten times as much in the shape of extra prices to Northern manufacturers for the inferior articles which they substituted for the better and cheaper British goods excluded by protection. That is to say, the South probably paid some fifty millions sterling as tribute, not to Southern citizens, but to a greedy and unfriendly community which sucked her wealth from her through the channels of political connection.

By this time the West had come into being. It consisted of two (afterwards of three) portions—the country ceded by Virginia to the Union, and the country purchased from France. The country stolen from England and that forcibly torn from Mexico was subsequently added. On the course taken by the West depended the settlement of all questions between North and South; whichever she joined must certainly prevail. She had no interest in protection—quite the contrary. But as her supplies must in any case come through the North, and at great expense, the value of free trade did not present itself to her so forcibly as to the South. She had, however, or supposed herself to have, another interest hostile to the latter. The Western people were insatiable in their greed for land, and the question whether any given land should belong to them or not practically depended on the question whether or no slavery should be admitted there. If it were excluded, they would take undisputed possession. Hence the West became strongly anti-slavery, or rather anti-negro. And a battle-ground speedily presented itself on which North and West, protectionists of manufactures and protectionists of labour, monopolists of the market and monopolists of land, might join hands against the South. The second portion of the Western territory had to be organised into States. Louisiana came in naturally as a slave State. A dispute arose about Missouri. The South—which had given to the freesoilers the vast territory which now forms the States of Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin—demanded the admission of Missouri with the pro-slavery constitution which she had chosen. The Northerners resisted. The real question was that which has been fought between the two ever since—Northern ascendency or Southern independence. To admit the principle of excluding fresh slave States was to establish the former; to allow the new State to fix its own constitution gave the South as much as she could claim. At last the matter was compromised. Maine was admitted as a free State under a solemn agreement that the next year Missouri should come in as a slave State, and that for the future slavery should be excluded from all territory north of the parallel of latitude 36° 30′—that is, that all such territory should be surrendered absolutely to the Northerners. It would seem fairly to follow that all south of this should be Southern; and this was the intention.

* The Confederate Secession. By the Marquis of Lothian. Blackwood.

This has been strangely represented as a Northern concession—as if the territories should be naturally freesoil, as if the property of Southern citizens of the United States should be naturally confiscated on their entering the common unappropriated domain of the Union. But no reason has ever been alleged for so strange a doctrine. The natural law would clearly be, in the absence of express provision—as the Supreme Court afterwards ruled—that every citizen had a right to go with his property where he pleased in the territory not yet formed into States, and so capable of legislating for itself; and it might be doubted whether even Congress had power to deprive him of that right. And if this did not work fairly, the next rule of justice would seem to be an equitable division (giving the South credit for the enormous territory ceded by Virginia to the North), either by an equal sharing (with such allowance), or by tracing Mason and Dixon's line through from the Mississippi to the Pacific. Nothing so favourable to the South was allowed. She gave up her right to an equivalent (if the territory were to be divided) for the Virginian cession, and received only the territory south of a line to the north of which lay Virginia, Kentucky, and Maryland. The compromise, then, was wholly and solely a concession on the part of the South both of her legal and her equitable rights. But even this compromise would not satisfy the North. The perfidious Yankees tried, the very next year, to exclude Missouri till she would give up slavery, in direct violation of the bond; they made a similar [attempt in the case of Arkansas; and in California they succeeded in locating a free State in the extremest corner of the South-west. So much for Southern encroachments and Southern breaches of faith. It was not till after the admission of California as a free State that the Missouri Compromise was finally torn up by a decree of the Supreme Court, based on the principle above suggested, which pronounced the indefeasible right of a citizen to take his property with him to any spot within the unappropriated domain or 'territory' of the United States.

The anxiety of the South to secure new slave States was wholly independent of slavery. It had regard simply to her sectional safety. The European immigration, acting on a highly democratic constitution, had given the North an overwhelming preponderance in the House of Representatives and an advantage in the Senate, and consequently a majority in the college of Presidential electors. The only chance the South could see of maintaining something like an equal rank in the Union was to secure, by the creation of new States, an equality in the Senate, and even in this she had failed. So far from controlling the policy and monopolising the government of the Union, she was in a minority in both branches of Congress, and she had 120 votes in the Presidential elections against 183. And since 1829, every President elected, except Mr. Buchanan, had a majority of Northern votes, and since 1837 four out of six had been Northerners. Till 1856 the Union was ruled by a party which had a majority in both sections. From 1857 to 1860 it was ruled by a party which had a Northern minority and a Southern majority. So much for Southern monopoly of power! And all this time the Federal Legislature used its most important privilege, that of taxation and expenditure, to enrich the North at the expense of the South. It imposed, as we have seen, an enormous tribute on the latter for the benefit of Northern manufacturers and shipowners; and it spent the public money exclusively on the North.

In clearing up confusion and error of this kind, 'The Confederate Secession' will prove a useful work. Into the arguments on other questions which it contains we have not entered, because some of them are far from new, and others, though opportune enough when written, have lost much of their force in the presence of subsequent events. The friends of the South have reason to be grateful to the writer; the abuse of her enemies will afford a less suspicious testimony to his merit than any praise of ours.

The Interest of England in Southern Independence.—The New York Daily News of September 26 says: 'The independence of the Confederate States will throw open to the British producer an annual demand of upwards of $250,000,000. The cheap goods of free trade brought into contact with the high goods of protection all along the St. Lawrence on the one side, and the Ohio on the other with the high goods of protective tariffs, an irresistible mode of argument will have declared the agriculturists of the West taxed grievously to sustain the monopolies of New England. Free trade will thus sweep over the Great West, and finally take its position in the policy of the Federal Government. The independence of the Confederacy thus throws open to the English producer, under a free competition, the South, the North, the West, and the markets of the teeming lands that are now budding into great States on the slopes of the Rocky Mountains. Southern independence breaks down the navigation laws. It destroys the rich monopoly of the coasting trade. Three-fourths of the export freights of the old Union, made up of the products of the now Confederate States, will have been thrown open, after their independence, to the free competition of British bottoms. The shipping interest of England will be enriched under Southern independence by the coasting trade and by three-fourths of our whole freights. Her products, in that event, will flood the whole continent under a perfect freedom of trade. Her political power will be increased, and her colonial possessions guaranteed, by a dissolution which shall make her one of the weights in an American system of political equalibration. Here are, in brief, some results for England inconceivably great, and, in their commercial and political bearing, of an importance worthy, on the part of that country, of a most decided policy.'

'The Cradle and the Grave.'—The rebels have had 1,802,000 men, wherewith to carry on their military operations during the four years of the war, and having called out 818,000 of these, they have got a surplus of 884,000 men of the proper military age. This, added to the 202,000 men now in the field, gives 1,186,000 men as the present available military strength of the rebellion, not counting the boys and old men, and not robbing either the cradle or the grave. These are facts which cannot be disputed.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

CANADA.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Quebec: September 26, 1864.

The grand scheme projected by politicians for the future government and greatness of Canada is that of amalgamation with the maritime provinces. Statesmen have been put to their wits' ends. Party interests and sectional divisions have for a long while disturbed the harmonious working of the Government, and so impeded its progress that it had even very recently been brought to a dead-lock. Despairing politicians luckily alighted upon a project which many consider feasible, but respecting which some sagacious people entertain the worst and most gloomy apprehensions. It is pleasing, however, to find that the Hon. Messrs. G. Brown and J. A. Macdonald, who for a series of years have been the most formidable political opponents, should have sunk their party predilections and have united, con amore, in a plan which may have the effect of improving the political and social condition of their country.

So far matters have progressed very favourably. The provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward's Island had agreed to hold a Conference at Charlottetown, the capital of the last-mentioned province, which accordingly took place during the early part of the present month. The object was to consider the propriety of uniting their political fortunes in one federative alliance. Permission was accorded to the Canadian Government to attend this assembly (which they did informally and unofficially), for the purpose of discussing the larger proposition, namely, whether it would not be politic and possible for all the provinces to combine themselves for the common good in one confederation. In this Conference the Government of Newfoundland was not represented; but it appears, from authoritative communications received, that they heartily sympathise with the movement, and evince a desire to attend any further deliberations on so vital a question. As the proceedings of the Conference were conducted with closed doors, a good deal of surmise was indulged in by the journals of the Upper and Lower Provinces as to the nature of the speculations brought forward and the programme that might have been determined upon. All surmise, however, has for the present been removed by the announcement that a formal Conference of the Governments of Canada, conjointly with those of the Lower Provinces, has been summoned by the Governor-General (I am confidentially informed, under authority of the Imperial Government) for the 10th proximo, at Quebec, as well as by the issue of a semi-official statement drawn up by a leading member of the executive. From this we learn that no definite policy has yet been agreed upon relative to the details of the projected political alliance, although we are told that the question was discussed in all its bearings; that no insurmountable obstacles were encountered; and that the conclusion was unanimously arrived at that a confederation of the entire British North American provinces would be highly advantageous, provided equitable terms of union could be agreed upon. At the approaching Convention several programmes will be submitted bearing on the question of union, and it will then be seen whether or no the project be possible of accomplishment.

I now give you the gist of the suggestions thrown out at the late Conference. These no doubt will form the subjects of unfettered enquiry during the sittings of the forthcoming Convention. First, then, it has been suggested that for the present the confederation should be composed of three sections—Upper Canada, Lower Canada, and the Maritime Provinces; that these may be admitted into the union either collectively or otherwise; and that provision might be made for admission into the union, at a future time, of the whole North-western territory, including British Columbia and Vancouver's Island. Secondly, it was suggested that the control of all local matters should rest with a local legislature and executive, while the affairs of the whole country should be vested in a general government and legislature. For this end, and to prevent collision, it would be incumbent to have the nature of the functions of both governments clearly and severally defined and embodied in an Act of the Imperial Parliament. Thirdly, it seems to have been suggested that, with reference to the constitution of the Federal Legislature, the representation in the Lower House should be based on population, and that of the Upper House on sectional equality. And here I may remark that the mode of selecting the members of the Upper House will form a subject of some difficulty, and certainly give rise to long and warm discussion. It seems that some favour election by the people for a term of years; others advocate that such election should be vested in the local legislatures; while others again as warmly contend that the election should devolve upon the Crown, acting upon the advice of its responsible ministers. Fourthly, it was suggested that the Federal Government should be constituted as at present—the representative of the Crown being advised by an administration possessing the confidence of Parliament. Fifthly, discussions likewise arose, it would appear, upon the nature and extent of the questions that would properly come under the cognisance of the Federal authority, such as trade, navigation, currency, banking, taxation, &c., &c., &c. No less formidable a subject for debate was the model upon which the local legislatures should be based. Some advocated two legislative chambers; others, one. Some favoured making the executive Government, as at present, responsible to the legislature; while others advocated that the lieutenant-governors and chief officials should be elected by the people. So far as the question of finance is concerned, little if any difficulty will be experienced. Should the union become a fait accompli, it is presumed that all the debts and assets of the several provinces would be assumed by the Federal Government; and it appears from a critical examination of the financial affairs of each province that the debt and annual burden now borne by the people are pretty equable; that the public exchequers all show a surplus; and that, consequently, no injustice could possibly be inflicted on either section composing the federation.

For my own part I am not at all sanguine that the projected alliance will be accomplished. A good deal of opposition will be offered to the contemplated change of government; the interests to be conserved and the probable details of the scheme are so numerous and entangled that it will be wonderful indeed if anything like unanimity of sentiment shall prevail. Several of the Franco-Canadian organs attack the proposed alliance with their customary vigour, and even some English organs are not silent in denouncing the measure. The Chronicle, the most popular journal in Quebec, this very morning has an article on the subject, and looks very dubiously, if not hostilely, on the movement. It regards it as nothing more or less than 'a transcript of the American Union which is just now offering so sorry an example of its cohesive and governmental powers.' It further observes that 'a federal division of the governing powers appears a very clumsy mode of giving them such an identity as would make them emphatically juncta in uno. It is in truth doing business by halves, and leaving the right, the true thing, to be done at a future time, if the opportunity which now offers should ever occur. . . The leaving the work that will surely have to be done some day, if we are to retain our present political existence, and not to be torn from our loved connection with Great Britain by ruthless violence, will be an error that we shall all deplore when perhaps the hour will be past at which it could have been remedied.' Owing to the difficulties in the way of governing Canada and her isolated position, I have heard some intelligent persons observe that they considered annexation to the States inevitable.

THE EVACUATION OF ATLANTA.

The following is the correspondence between General Sherman and General Hood with respect to the order for the evacuation of Atlanta:—

Headquarters, Mil. Div. of the Miss.,
In the Field, Atlanta, Ga., Sept. 18, 1864.

General J. B. Hood, commanding Army of the Tennessee, Confederate Army.

General,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date, at the hands of Messrs. Ball & Crew, consenting to the arrangements I had proposed, to facilitate the removal south of the people of Atlanta who prefer to go in that direction.

I enclose you a copy of my order, which will, I am satisfied, accomplish my purpose perfectly. You style the measures proposed 'unprecedented,' and appeal to the dark history of war for a parallel as an act of 'studied and ingenious cruelty.'

It is not unprecedented, for General Johnston himself very wisely and properly removed the families all the way from Dalton down, and I see no reason why Atlanta should be excepted; nor is it necessary to appeal to the dark history of war when recent and modern examples are so handy.

You yourself burned dwelling-houses along your parapet, and I have seen to-day fifty houses that you have rendered uninhabitable because they stood in the way of your forts and men. You defended Atlanta in a line so close to the town, that every cannon-shot and many musket-shots from our lines of investment, that overshot their mark, went into the habitations of women and children.

General Hardee did the same at Jonesborough, and General Johnston did the same last summer at Jackson, Mississippi. I have not accused you of heartless cruelty, but merely instance these cases of very recent occurrence, and could go on and enumerate hundreds of others, and challenge any fair man to judge which of us has the heart of pity for the families of a brave people.

I say it is a kindness to these families of Atlanta to remove them now at once from the scenes that women and children should not be exposed to, and the 'brave people' should scorn to commit their wives and children to the rude barbarians who thus, as you say, violate the laws of war, as illustrated in the pages of its dark history.

In the name of common sense I ask you not to appeal to a just God in such a sacrilegious manner—you who, in the midst of peace and prosperity, have plunged a nation into civil war, dark and cruel war, who dared and badgered us to battle, insulted our flag, seized our arsenals and forts that were left in the honourable custody of a peaceful Ordinance Sergeant; seized and made prisoners of war the very garrisons sent to protect your people against negroes and Indians. Long before any overt act was committed by the, to you, hateful Lincoln Government, you tried to force Kentucky and Missouri into the rebellion in spite of themselves; falsified the vote of Louisiana; turned loose your privateers to plunder unarmed ships; expelled Union families by the thousands, burned their houses, and declared, by act of your Congress, the confiscation of all debts due Northern men for goods had and received.

Talk thus to marines, but not to me, who have seen these things, and who will this day make as much sacrifice for the peace and honour of the South as the best born Southerner among you.

If we must be enemies let us be men, and fight it out as we propose to do, and not deal in such hypocritical appeals to God and humanity. God will judge us in due time, and He will pronounce whether it be more humane to fight with a town full of women and the families of a brave people at our back, or to move them in time to places of safety among their own friends and people.—I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) W. T. Sherman.
Major-General Commanding.

Headquarters Army of Tennessee, September 12.

Major-General W. T. Sherman, Commanding the Military Division of the Mississippi.

General,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 9th instant, with its enclosure, in reference to the women, children, and others whom you have seen proper to expel from their homes in the city of Atlanta. Had you seen proper to let the matter rest there, I would gladly have allowed your letter to close this correspondence, and, without your expressing it in words, would have been willing to believe that whilst 'the interest of the United States,' in your opinion, compelled you to an act of barbarous cruelty, you regretted the necessity, and we would have dropped the subject. But you have chosen to indulge in statements which I feel compelled to notice, at least so far as to signify my dissent, and not allow silence in regard to them to be construed as acquiescence. I see nothing in your communication which induces me to modify the language of condemnation with which I characterised your order. It but strengthened me in the opinion that it stands 'preeminent in the dark history of war for studied ingenious cruelty.' Your original order was stripped of all pretence; you announced the edict for the sole reason that it was 'to the interest of the United States.' This alone you offered to us and the civilised world as an all-sufficient reason for disregarding the laws of God and man.

You say that 'General Johnston himself very wisely and properly removed the families all the way from Dalton down.' It is due to that gallant soldier and gentleman to say that no act of his distinguished career gives the least colour to your unfounded aspersions upon his conduct. He depopulated no villages, nor towns, nor cities, either friendly or hostile. He offered and extended friendly aid to his unfortunate fellow-citizens, who desired to flee from your fraternal embraces. You are unfortunate in your attempt to find a justification for this act of cruelty, either in the defence of Jonesborough by General Hardee, or of Atlanta by myself. General Hardee defended his position in front of Jonesborough at the expense of the houses—an ordinary, proper, and justifiable act of war.

I defended Atlanta at the same risk and cost. If there was any fault in either case, it was your own in not giving notice, especially in the case of Atlanta, of your purpose to shell the town, which is usual in war among civilised nations.

No inhabitant of either town was expelled from his home and fireside by either General Hardee or myself, and, therefore, your recent order can find no support from the conduct of either of us. I feel no other emotion than pain in reading that portion of your letter which attempts to justify your shelling of Atlanta without notice, under the pretence that I defended Atlanta upon a line so close to town that every cannon-shot and many musket-balls from your line of investment, that overshot their mark, went into the habitations of women and children. I made no complaint of your firing into Atlanta in any way you thought proper. I make none now, but there are a hundred thousand living witnesses that you fired into the habitations of women and children for weeks, firing far above and miles beyond my line of defence. I have too good an opinion, founded both upon observation and experience, of the skill of your artillerists, to credit the assertion that they, for several weeks, unintentionally fired too high for my modest field-works, and slaughtered women and children by accident and want of skill.

The residue of your letter is rather discursive. It opens a wide field for the discussion of questions which I do not feel are committed to me. I am only a general of one of the armies of the Confederate States, charged with military operations in the field, under the direction of my superior officers, and I am not called upon to discuss with you the cause of the present war, or the political questions which led to or resulted from it. These grave and important questions have been committed to far abler hands than mine, and I shall only refer to them so far as to repel any unjust conclusion which might be drawn from my silence. You charge my country with 'daring and badgering you to battle.' The truth is, we sent commissioners to you respectfully offering a peaceful separation before the first gun was fired on either side. You may say we insulted your flag. The truth is, we fired upon it and those who fought under it when you came to our doors upon the mission of subjugation.

You say we seized upon your forts and arsenals, and made prisoners of the garrisons sent to protect us against negroes and Indians. The truth is, we expelled by force of arms insolent intruders, and took possession of our own forts and arsenals to resist your claim to dominion over masters, slaves, and Indians, all of whom are to this day, with unanimity unexampled in the history of the world, warring against your attempts to become their masters. You say that we tried to force Missouri and Kentucky into rebellion in spite of themselves. The truth is, my Government, from the beginning of this struggle to this hour, has again and again offered before the world to leave it to the unbiassed will of those States and all others to determine for themselves whether they will cast their destiny with your Government or ours, and your Government has resisted this fundamental principle of free institutions with the bayonet, and labours by force and fraud to fasten hateful tyranny upon the unfortunate freemen of the States.

You say we falsified the vote of Louisiana. The truth is, Louisiana not only separated herself from your Government by nearly a unanimous vote of her people, but has vindicated the act upon every battle-field, from Gettysburg to the Sabine, and has exhibited an heroic devotion to her decision which challenges the admiration and respect of every man capable of feeling sympathy for the oppressed, or admiration for heroic valour. You say that we turned loose pirates to plunder your unarmed ships. The truth is, when you robbed us of our part of the navy, we built and bought a few vessels, hoisted the flag of our country, and swept the seas in defiance of your navy, around the whole circumference of the globe.

You say we have expelled Union families by thousands. The truth is, not a single family have been expelled from the Confederate States that I am aware of; but, on the contrary, the moderation of our Government towards traitors has been a fruitful theme of denunciation by its enemies and many well-meaning friends of our cause. You say my Government by Acts of Congress has confiscated 'all debts due to Northern men for goods sold and delivered.' The truth is, Congress gave due and ample time to your merchants and traders to depart from our shores, with their ships, goods, and effects, and only sequestered the property of our enemies in retaliation for their acts declaring us traitors, and confiscating our property wherever their power extended, either in their country or our own. Such are our accusations, and such are the facts known of all men to be true.

You order into exile the whole population of a city, drive men, women, and children from their homes at the point of the bayonet, under the plea that it is to the interest of your Government, and on the claim that this is an act of 'kindness to these families of Atlanta.' Butler only banished from New Orleans the registered enemies of his Government, and acknowledged that he did it as a punishment. You issue a sweeping edict, covering all the inhabitants of a city, and add insult to the injury heaped upon the defenceless by assuming that you have done them a kindness. This you follow by the assertion that you will 'make as much sacrifice for the peace and honour of the South as the best-born Southron.' And because I characterise what you call kindness as being real cruelty, you presume to sit in judgment between me and my God, and you decide that my earnest prayer to the Almighty Father to save our women and children from what you call kindness is a 'sacrilegious, hypocritical appeal.'

You come into our country with your army avowedly for the purpose of subjugating free white men and women and children; and not only intend to rule over them, but you make negroes your allies, and desire to place over us an inferior race, which we have raised from barbarism to its present position, which is the highest ever attained by that race in any country in all time. I must therefore decline to accept your statements in reference to your kindness towards the people of Atlanta, and your willingness to sacrifice everything for the peace and honour of the South, and refuse to be governed by your decision in regard to matters between myself, my country, and my God.

You say 'let us fight it out like men.' To this my reply is, for myself, and, I believe, for all true men, ay, and women and children, in my country, we will fight you to death. Better die a thousand deaths than submit to live under you or your Government and your negro allies.

Having answered the points forced upon me by your letter of September 9, I close this correspondence with you, and, notwithstanding your comments upon my appeal to God in the cause of humanity, I again humbly and reverently invoke His almighty aid in defence of justice and right.—Respectfully, your obedient servant, (Signed) J. B. Hood, General.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

Wednesday Evening.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

The state of the money market remains unsettled. The numerous failures, the heaviness in cotton and other produce, and the high rates for discount, would, in ordinary periods, have created a perfect panic. Though a want of confidence exists, and it is not yet certain whether the Bank directors may not go to 10 per cent., the position is less embarrassing than it was a few days ago. The payment of the dividends has just occurred in time to bring money out. The Bank accounts, it is hoped, will shortly improve, and, if so, further danger may be averted for the present. Still there are many who think we shall see things considerably worse towards the end of the year, particularly in the dull days of November and December. No great apprehension is now entertained of any very serious crisis, because the bankers and brokers have adopted every precaution to protect themselves. Through being 'forewarned,' the operators generally have got out pretty well, but, of course, there must be some who will risk the sacrifice. The supply of money has increased the last forty-eight hours, and, were it not for exceptional circumstances, the rates would be cheaper. An influx of foreign gold is expected, and, therefore, probably the next two weeks will see a return to partial abundance. The Bank has been charging 10 per cent., the majority of transactions have again ensued at 9, and the joint-stock banks work a little more freely.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The state of the bullion market may be regarded on the whole as satisfactory. There have been no great changes, but what there have been are favourable. The specie sent into the Bank during the week has amounted to 190,000*l.*, and the withdrawals have been only 20,000*l.*, which was taken for Lisbon. The arrivals of specie have only been moderate, viz.: 177,650*l.* from New York and 10,762*l.* from the West Coast of Africa. The silver market has not been particularly active, there not being at present much demand for the East. The bar silver by the last West India packet has been disposed of at 61*d.* per oz., which is a decline of about $\frac{3}{8}d.$ upon the previous sales. There is very little doing in Mexican dollars, and prices have not varied from those current last week. Telegraphic advices from Melbourne to August 25 state that the shipments of gold during the month were 16,500 oz. of the value of 66,000*l.*

MERCANTILE SUSPENSIONS.

The suspensions announced during the week have been Messrs. John Gladstone & Co., of Three King Court, Lombard Street, in the export American and Australian trades. The liabilities are believed to be between 150,000*l.* and 200,000*l.*—Mr. John Catto, of Upper Thames Street, in the French and Belgium paper trade, with about 35,000*l.* liabilities. — Mr. Patrick Thomson, ship and insurance broker, with debts amounting to about 25,000*l.*—Mr. E. Lazard, of Moorgate Street, exchange broker and agent to Paris bankers. His liabilities represent about 500,000*l.*—Messrs. Weber and Biddulph, of Philpot Lane, in the continental trade, with about 70,000*l.* liabilities.—Mr. G. P. Lascaridi, of Winchester House, in the Greek trade, with debts amounting to 40,000*l.*—Messrs. Mavrogordato & Co., of Gresham Street, and Messrs. Glaucopide, Brothers, & Co., also of Gresham Street, both likewise in the Greek trade, but it is expected that the joint liabilities will not exceed 20,000*l.*—This evening the suspension has been announced of Mr. Louis Speltz of Liverpool, cotton broker. He is known to have been in difficulties for some little time, consequently the event has not caused any surprise. It is stated that his own acceptances amount to about 250,000*l.*, and his endorsements and engagements on other bills to about 70,000*l.* more. Of the latter about 50,000*l.* are expected to rank on the estate. At present the assets are quite uncertain, but it is feared that they will not turn out very favourable. Messrs. Kemp, Ford, & Co. have been appointed by the creditors to examine the accounts, and a meeting will be called of the creditors as soon as a balance-sheet can be prepared.—The failure has also been announced this evening of Messrs. Bendie & Co. of the Corn Exchange, with liabilities to the extent of about 25,000*l.*—At a meeting of the creditors of Messrs. Fletcher & Co., corn merchants, Manchester, held on October 6, a balance-sheet was read showing the estimated liabilities to be 143,175*l.* 1*s.* 8*d.*, and the assets 66,850*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.*—At a meeting of the creditors of Thackrah Brothers, of Leeds, on Friday last, it was agreed to wind up the estate under assignment. The assets were estimated at 8,500*l.*, and the liabilities at 12,100*l.*

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The stringent state of the money market, combined with the suspensions which are now daily taking place, not only in the metropolis, but in all the large centres of commerce, continue to have a very adverse influence on all departments of the Stock Exchange. The brokers, under the circumstances, are afraid to operate with anything like freedom; consequently transactions are limited, and prices generally are lower. In the English market to-day, however, there has been rather more firmness, and Consols improved about $\frac{1}{8}$ per cent., but in the foreign department there was scarcely any change. Consols closed this evening at 88 to 88$\frac{1}{8}$ for money, and 81$\frac{1}{2}$ to 81$\frac{5}{8}$ for the November account, which, as compared with this day week, is a fall of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Exchequer bills have also declined considerably, the present price being for the March issue 11*s.* to 5*s.* dis., and for those of June 25*s.* to 15*s.* dis. The decline in most of the foreign stocks has been greater comparatively than in Consols. Greek close this evening at 22$\frac{1}{4}$ to 22$\frac{3}{4}$, being a drop of $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. Mexican are down 1$\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., the present quotation being 26 to 26$\frac{1}{4}$. Spanish Passives have declined 1$\frac{1}{4}$, and the Certificates $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., the prices respectively being 30 to 30$\frac{1}{2}$ and 13$\frac{3}{8}$ to 13$\frac{5}{8}$. Turkish descriptions are from $\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. lower, the Six per cents. of 1854 being 87$\frac{1}{2}$ to 88$\frac{1}{2}$ ex div., and those of 1862 69$\frac{1}{4}$ to 69$\frac{3}{4}$.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The market for American Government and Railway securities has again been more active this week; prices have fluctuated rather more than usual, but they close at about the highest point of the week. The dealings are chiefly of a bond fide character, the brokers still showing but little inclination to speculate in this class of securities. The dealings officially recorded have been as follows:—United States Government securities, 1882, at 47$\frac{1}{2}$ and 47; do. do., 1881, 43$\frac{1}{2}$, 43$\frac{3}{4}$, 44, 44$\frac{1}{4}$, 44$\frac{1}{2}$, 45, 45$\frac{3}{4}$, 47, 46$\frac{1}{2}$, and 47$\frac{1}{4}$; Virginia State six per cents., 28, 26, 27, and 28; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York section, second mortgage, 68; do. do., Pennsylvania section, first mortgage, 73, 72$\frac{3}{4}$, and 73 ex div.; do. do., second mortgage, 68; Erie, $100 shares, all paid, 40$\frac{3}{4}$, 42, 41, and 42; do. do., fourth mortgage, 50; Illinois Central six per cents., 76 and 75 ex div.; and do. do., $100 shares, all paid, 51, 50$\frac{3}{4}$, 52, 51$\frac{1}{2}$, 52$\frac{1}{4}$, 51$\frac{3}{4}$, and 51$\frac{1}{2}$.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market for this stock has been again depressed by the receipt of unfavourable war news and the monetary disasters here and in Liverpool. The lowest price was 50$\frac{1}{4}$, from which there has been to-day a rebound to 57 to 60, and the market closes 53 to 55. The attempt to close extensive bear accounts was the cause of these rapid fluctuations, which, at the same time, illustrate the baseless origin of the recent heavy decline.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

A slight improvement took place in some of the produce markets towards the close of last week, but it has since entirely disappeared, owing to the increased stringency in money and renewed uneasiness in reference to the future course of financial affairs. At the present moment the markets throughout have a dull and gloomy aspect, and, although only moderate supplies are brought forward, arrivals having been light for some time past, prices have a downward tendency. Deliveries from warehouse show some falling off, and stocks are in many cases in excess of those of last year at this time. Many cargoes are close at hand, and with a change of wind, increased importations may be expected. The cotton trade has participated in the prevailing heaviness, and sales have been difficult to effect at $\frac{1}{8}d.$ to 1*d.* per lb. decline in the London market. The grain trade has hardly varied; wheats are generally held firmly, and but short supplies of English are brought on offer. Both English and American flour is also firm in price, although the demand is dull. Provisions meet only a slow sale, and butters have declined 2*s.* to 4*s.* per cwt.; otherwise quotations are not materially altered. American cheese continues to find a steady sale at 46*s.* to 60*s.* per cwt. In petroleum a moderate business is passing, without much alteration in the terms current; 2*s.* 0$\frac{1}{2}d.$ to 2*s.* 1*d.* was the quotation for American refined this afternoon. Crude remains at 17*l.* per tun. For linseed oil there is still a fair demand, and the fall in the value of cake having caused a diminished production, prices are from 34*s.* 6*d.* to 34*s.* 9*d.* on the spot. At Hull the price is 33*s.* 6*d.* Rape oil is dull of sale at 45*s.* per cwt. pale, and 42*s.* brown. Olive offers on rather lower terms: Mogadore 52*l.* 10*s.*, and Gallipoli 60*l.* per tun. Cocoanut is very unsettled; the current quotations are 38*s.* to 38*s.* 6*d.* per cwt. for Cochin, and 36*s.* to 36*s.* 6*d.* for Ceylon, but forced sales by speculative holders take place occasionally under these rates. Palm oil is tolerably steady at 36*s.* per cwt. Sperm, in the absence of any transactions of moment, is nominally unaltered. Oilcake moves off slowly at 10*l.* 10*s.* to 10*l.* 15*s.* per ton for American barrels, and 9*l.* 10*s.* to 10*l.* 5*s.* for bags. The tallow market continues heavy, with drooping prices. Y.C. closed this afternoon at 40*s.* 6*d.* for old, on the spot, and 41*s.* 6*d.* new. 'Sorts' sell at proportionate rates. Jute has entirely lost the improvement quoted last week, and common qualities have further declined 10*s.* per ton. Hemp is saleable only in retail quantity, except on lower terms. The quarterly sales of East India indigo, comprising 13,206 chests, have opened with a decidedly flat market, and prices range 2*d.* to 6*d.* under those of the July sales, the heaviest decline being on the common qualities. Cochineal meets only a limited demand, but prices are not perceptibly depressed. Plumbago is rather dearer, common dust selling at 7*s.* 9*d.* to 8*s.* 3*d.*, and lump, 12*s.* to 17*s.* 6*d.* per cwt. In gums there is no quotable change. The metal trade continues extremely dull, and Scotch pig iron has been heavily depressed, 5*s.* 6*d.* cash being the closing quotation to-day. The sugar market has again become inactive, and prices are 6*d.* to 1*s.* per cwt. lower than on this day week. Refined sugars are not, however, so much depressed as raw, and they are in moderate request. In spices the only quotable change is a further decline of 2*s.* per cwt. on the price of Cochin ginger.

Liverpool, Wednesday Evening.—In the early part of the week our cotton market presented a more animated appearance, and prices generally advanced about ½*d.* to 1*d.* per lb.: but there has since been renewed heaviness; the transactions have again become limited, and quotations less firm. American cotton has again been in good request, particularly for export, but buyers refuse to give any advance upon the recent fall. The sales this week have amounted to only 28,000 bales, of which 12,000 were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year to the present time have been 2,019,211 bales, and to the corresponding period in 1863 they were 1,975,937 bales. There have been imported this year 1,786,856 bales, whilst last year the number was 1,201,922 bales. The trade have this year taken 1,234,908 bales, against 1,049,562 bales in 1863. The exports this year have been 443,591 bales, and to the same period last year 357,834 bales. There have been taken on speculation this year 339,333 bales, and to the same in 1863, 522,819 bales. The estimated stock at the present time is 395,827 bales, whilst at the corresponding period last year they were 184,618. The latest official quotations were, for American descriptions, 19*d.* to 25*d.*; Maceio, 21½*d.* to 21¾*d.*; Bahia, 21½*d.* to 22*d.*; Egyptian, 8½*d.* to 25½*d.*; Smyrna, 13½*d.* to 14*d.*; Surats, 8½*d.* to 16¼*d.*; Bengal, 9½*d.* to 10½*d.*; Scinde, 9½*d.* to 10½*d.*; and China, 13*d.*, and Japan, 14¾*d.* to 15½*d.*

The markets at Manchester have again been greatly depressed in all branches, and, under present circumstances, there appears but little reason to anticipate a speedy improvement. In shipping yarns there has been very little doing, and to have effected sales spinners would have been compelled to accept at least 1*d.* per lb. decline on the rates of last week; but even at such a reduction buyers have evinced no disposition to operate. In home trade yarns, also, there has been very little business transacted; but in the few dealings that have taken place a decline of at least 1*d.* per lb. has to be recorded. There is, however, an exception with respect to yarns made of good cotton, which spinners do not seem disposed to press upon the market, because of the loss to which they would have to submit. In the cloth market the transactions have been very limited, and prices have been gradually declining throughout the week; nevertheless, there has been more anxiety evinced to sell than for a long time past, notwithstanding the loss which must be thus entailed. The recent failures that have taken place, and the numerous adverse rumours afloat as to the stability of other parties, is creating great anxiety, and all the markets close with a feeling of unusual depression. The closing quotations were as under: ⅞ Grey Printers, according to quality, 6*s.* 6*d.* to 13*s.* 3*d.*; ⅞ Grey Madapollams, 5*s.* 9*d.* to 8*s.* 9*d.*; ⅞ Grey Printers, 8*s.* 9*d.* to 15*s.* 9*d.*; ⅞ Grey Shirtings, 10*s.* 3*d.* to 22*s.*; Water Twist, No. 20, 1*s.* 7*d.* to 2*s.* 3*d.*; No. 30, 2*s.* to 2*s.* 6*d.*; and No. 40, 2*s.* 6*d.* to 3*s.*; Mule Twist, No. 20, 1*s.* 3*d.* to 2*s.* 0½*d.*; No. 30, 1*s.* 7½*d.* to 2*s.* 3*d.*; No. 40, 1*s.* 10*d.* to 2*s.* 6*d.*; No. 50, 2*s.* 1*d.* to 2*s.* 9*d.*; No. 60, 2*s.* 4*d.* to 2*s.* 11*d.*; No. 70, 2*s.* 7*d.* to 3*s.* 1*d.*; No. 80, 2*s.* 9*d.* to 3*s.* 3*d.*; No. 90, 2*s.* 11*d.* to 3*s.* 5*d.*; and No. 100, 3*s.* 2*d.* to 3*s.* 11*d.*

It is intended to hold a Bazaar in St. George's Hall, on the 18th inst., in Aid of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund. Many Ladies, in addition to those named, have promised their active aid.

The suffering of the Southern Prisoners of War in sickness, wounds, and deprivation of every comfort of life; the multitudes of widows to whom nothing remains—and of orphans unable to help themselves—form an amount of woe, which some who are blessed here with abundance and peace have felt a desire to alleviate.

Efforts have already been made, and not without success, through reliable friends in the Northern States, but unhappily the field is so wide that aid is now required to replace the means already provided and exhausted.

It is hoped that you will not refuse your assistance in this work of humanity. The Committee will be glad to hear in what form you will aid them, if disposed to do so, and will attend at once to any suggestion with which you may oblige them.

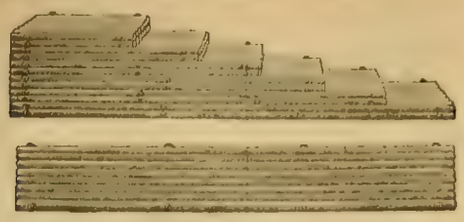
DUNCAN'S PATENT RATAN CANE SPLINTS.



THESE Splints are introduced and recommended to the Faculty for the great advantages which they possess above others,—viz., their comfort, coolness, and durability, as well as the facility with which they may be applied to the fractured limb.

As cleanliness is an important consideration, these Splints possess that quality pre-eminently, as they may be readily washed without the slightest fear of injury.

They are especially adapted to the constant usage of the General Hospital, and the movements of an Army on Service, as they cannot easily be injured. For Colonial practice they are recommended for the same reason.

They have been submitted to, and have received the approbation of, the Principal Medical Officers of the Army Medical Department.

The Splints cannot be injured by moisture; and are manufactured either with or without pads.

THERE are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. Ashbridge, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by Henry Hozze, Esq., 17 Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. Brewer, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and Daniel Hubbard, Esq., 24 Rue Lord Byron.

Abolitionism and the Negro.

THE record of the negro race is a sad and inscrutable enigma. If ever it were justifiable to say, 'Behold the curse of the Eternal!' it would be so in respect to the history of the negro. History! Bitter mockery! The negro has no history. From the days when the sable sons of Africa were the slaves of the Kings of Egypt until this hour, when clad in LINCOLN'S livery they are driven into the very jaws of death, their existence has been a blank—a perfect blank. They have no trophies. They have left no tracings on the sand of time. When not savages they have been slaves. The monuments of antiquity raised by their labour were designed and directed by others. When they have appeared in history, it has been as tools to be cast aside and forgotten when the work was accomplished. So far as the historian can discern, literature and art, government and all other sciences owe no more to the negro race than to the generations of African cattle. Yet negroes are not cattle, and hence it is that their career is a riddle. Not only have they their place in nature, but they are members of the human family. Intellectually inferior to white people, as children compared to Caucasian tribes, they are nevertheless men—men who, as the institution of negro slavery in the South shows, may be a blessing to their generation, in whose hearts kindly treatment begets grateful affection, who are capable of social progress, who under favourable circumstances are happy, and who above all else have aspirations for immortality, and like the white man are supported by the faith and rejoice in the promises of Christianity. The Abolitionist may tell us in his frenzy that the negro is intellectually equal to the white man. But what avails mere assertion in the face of the facts that we have cited? We are not afraid of the truth. We assert the negro's intellectual inferiority whilst we stoutly maintain his human brotherhood. And because of his humanity and of his mental childhood, we are incensed and appalled at the brutal—nay, the expression is inadequate—at the fiendish malignity with which he is persecuted by the Abolitionists of New England. What should we say of those who would corrupt children, incite them to commit infamous and bloody deeds, meanwhile robbing their victims and subjecting them to the vilest uses; and who, to paraphrase Mr. LINCOLN, would drive them into slaughter-pens as a butcher does sheep? No language is powerful enough to properly denounce such crimes, and neither can any one fairly express the detestation inspired by the consideration of the horrible sufferings that New England Abolitionism has inflicted on the negroes who, by the cruel fortune of war, have fallen under its merciless and abominable yoke.

It was inevitable that the invasion of the South should do harm to the negroes, because they are a component part of the nation, and therefore enjoy the prosperity and suffer from the adversity that lights upon their homes and country. It was not, however, to be supposed that they would have been, as they have been, the victims of the most ruthless passions of the invaders. What has the negro done unto the North that he should be persecuted with bloody and unparalleled ferocity? What raised New York to the rank of an Empire city, and lined her streets with marble palaces? The profits realised from dealing in the products of negro labour. And what laid the foundation of the greatness of Boston? Not Emancipation, not any theory of rights, not righteousness or philanthropy. The middle passage was revolting, but it was profitable; and the self-dubbed saints of New England waxed rich by the zealous pursuit of a highly remunerative slave-trade. Why should New England hate the race that has given her riches? Because, forsooth, the negro is the cause of the dissolution of the Union? The North knows full well that negro slavery was not the cause of secession, and is not in the way of reunion. The South would have left the North even if the Government of England had not forced her to receive the negro slaves brought to her ports in English and Yankee ships; and if the South would return to the Union, slavery would be no obstacle, and Abolitionism would be no more heard of.

We understand why Mr. LINCOLN desired to deport the negroes to a remote place where they might die out. Mr. LINCOLN is from the West, and Western men, thanks to the insidious teaching of New England, have always been intolerant of the presence of the negro, and, from a fear that free negro labour might compete with white labour, have made it penal for negroes to reside in their States. We understand why the Irish settlers have an antipathy to the negro, for the unscrupulous Abolitionists have told them that the negro will interfere with their labour. But we do not understand why New England should so hate the negro. Is it a mere savage instinct that makes her prone to oppress the helpless? We cannot tell. The motive is problematical, but the fact is hideously glaring.

This hate is not of recent growth, though the war has amazingly developed it. From first to last the North has behaved inhumanly to the negro. We have seen how the Yankees for the sake of gain were active participators in the slave-trade. While the Southerners were petitioning the home Government to send them no more negroes, the merchants of Boston were importing living cargoes and selling them by auction. Nor were they without an excuse. They declared that they were engaged in a holy mission. They were rescuing the 'blacks' from savage life and heathenism, and bringing them into a Christian land. So long as slave labour was profitable in the Northern States, so long did the Northerners keep slaves. When the influx of emigrants and a change in the cultivation of the soil rendered slave labour unprofitable, slavery was abolished. What did the New Englanders with their slaves? Emancipate them? What! the saints of New England sacrifice property for the sake of a professed principle? That phenomenon has not yet happened. No, the New Englanders sold their slaves to the South—sold the fathers and mothers of the slaves they are now seeking to destroy in the name of philanthropy. Thenceforth the negro had no rest in the North. He was free, but he was a leper. Happy for the Northern slaves that the South could purchase them, for otherwise they would have perished from sheer neglect and misery. The free negro has not prospered in the North. From 1840 to 1850 the Census of the United States informs us that in the South the free negroes increased from 170,335 to 210,955, and in the North from 215,968 to 223,248—that is, in the South about 25 per cent., and in the North about 3 per cent. And this difference cannot be mainly ascribed to the Southerners freeing their slaves, for we find that in the same period the slave population advanced from 2,519,087 to 3,112,806—or at the rate of nearly 20 per cent. So the negroes in the South were more than six times as prolific as the negroes in the North. We suppose that few persons will deny that prolificacy is an unerring test of comparative happiness, prosperity, and virtue.

The war, as we have said, has amazingly developed the long existing hate to the negro. What can be more wonderful than the demoralisation of the negroes that have been 'freed'? We might have expected some, but were not prepared for such a rapid and fearful deterioration. We learn from the United States Census, that in 1850, in every 10,000 coloured persons, excluding slaves, there were in the State prisons and penitentiaries:—

„ Free States	28·743

Not quite 1 in 10,000 of the free negroes in the South were in prison, while of the free negroes of the North there were more than 28 in 10,000. But this, we repeat, did not prepare us for what has occurred. In the South we see the fruits of 70 years of a humane and civilising treatment. All the incentives of the North have not succeeded in shaking the fidelity of the negroes to their masters, or in making them faithless to the principles of our holy religion. Mr. LINCOLN'S invitation to them to rise up and murder the families of their masters—for such is the only meaning of what he is pleased to call a military measure and a proclamation of emancipation—has proved a brutum fulmen, and has been utterly disregarded. Whilst the Southerners have been fighting their battles, the negroes have in no instance plundered their masters' property, or been other than good servants to the white women and children. But mark what has been the conduct of those who have been dragged into the clutch of Abolitionism. Look at the horrible massacres perpetrated by negro soldiers. Look at the host of coloured prostitutes that swarm in the Federal camps. Look at the Federal officers parading the towns with their negro wenches. But decency forbids that we should unveil the filthy orgies of miscegenation.

The condition of the negro in the North is at this moment heartrending as well as loathsome. See the 'freed' negroes on the Mississippi—'freed,' but forced to labour for less rations and less money perquisites than the slaves obtain, while even these rations and this money are kept from them. There they are in shoals literally rotting away. They are hungry, and the Yankee commissariat officers purloin their food; they are sick, and the Yankee doctors will not tend them, though they pocket fees for so doing; and so the freed negroes rot away in hunger, dirt, and disease. We write not thus on Confederate testimony. A Federal inspector testifies to the shocking state of the negroes on the Federal Government plantations; and Federal papers publish graphic accounts of the sufferings and the degradation of the coloured race. But the climax of Abolitionist savagery towards the negro is conscripting him and placing him in the battle-field, where there is no escape from death or mutilation.

The Federal generals and the Federal Government evince the most callous contempt for the lives of the mercenaries they command. GRANT is not censured for sacrificing 50,000 lives to reach a position that he could have gained without the loss of a man. Because the terms of service of some of the Federal prisoners in the South have expired, the Federal authorities will not exchange them. For the German and Irish recruits there is no more feeling than for the guns they carry; but for the negroes there is, besides callous contempt, a manifest delight in their torture and carnage. The Earl of Chatham denounced in withering language the proposed employment of Indians in the first war of American Independence. But what is there in such a scheme to compare with the employment of negro soldiers? The Indian is a warrior, and he fights without dread. The Indian does not need the stimulus of the bayonet to make him face the enemy. With the negro it is altogether different, and especially with the negroes in the Federal service. They shrink from the conflict, and above all from a conflict with those who have governed them from the hour of their birth, and whom ere the war began they loved and reverenced. But the trembling creatures have no chance. Drugged with whisky, under cover of Federal guns, and pricked on with Federal bayonets, they are driven to 'the post of honour.' The rest is soon told. The hissing bullets and the whirring shells of the Confederates fall amongst them, and palsied with fear they crouch in the slaughter-pen. To advance is death, to flee is death, and so they remain until the dead and dying form a wall between the Confederates and Mr. Lincoln's drovers. How true this is may be seen from the Northern accounts of the fight before Petersburg, and of the late action on the junction of the Varina and Newmarket Roads. One story is so exact a repetition of the other that it will suffice to notice the last. Birney's coloured brigade had to assault the Confederate works. Before the works was a ditch, into which 2,000 negroes huddled. Let the correspondent of the New York Times narrate the rest: 'About 2,000 of the negroes got into this ditch and never came back. At least twenty of them climbed on the parapet of the fort and were shot dead, tumbling back upon their comrades. The rest, it is said, were slaughtered by the enemy with shells thrown among them by hand.' How awful yet how vivid is the picture! Out of the terrified creatures only twenty ventured to put their heads above the parapet. But, since they could not advance, why did they not retreat? We are writing of negroes, not of white troops. Retreat! What to? What would they gain? Are the Confederate balls more deadly than those of the Federals? But they had not even courage to retreat if retreat had been possible. Bereft of reason, screeching with agony, the quivering mass of black flesh did not attempt to emerge from the grave into which they had been driven. There they were, the living, and the dead, and the dying, until the work was done; the white troops looking on, but not helping them. So 2,000 negroes were slaughtered for—what for? That Mr. Lincoln may reign over thirty-four States? That the loyal contractors may grow rich? That Mr. Seward may keep in office? No, for none of these, though these are the objects of the war. Will it be pretended that the negroes are of any service to the North or any source of danger to the South? Is anything to be gained by this horrible slaughter? So far as the progress of the war is concerned, Birney might as well have sent 2,000 black cattle into the fatal ditch. We shudder at the crime; but we cannot tell the motive thereof, unless it is savage hate.

We must turn from the sickening sight. To gaze too long upon it would inflame the imagination and make reason reel. But we cannot forget such deeds. We cannot forget the Petersburg pit. We cannot forget the ditch of death with its 2,000 poor negroes whom the correspondent of the New York Times, with grim diabolical humour, designates as 'nameless black men who have won the title of hero.' Do Abolitionists believe that there is a God who sees the sparrow fall, and who is also the God of the negro? Nameless black men! Yes, but as precious in the sight of Heaven as white heroes. Would, for the sake of humanity, that the Abolitionist could learn that negroes are not vermin, but men!

Cui bono? Wherefore do we write? Will words of ours check the persecution of the negro? No! So long as the war goes on, the negroes that fall under Federal rule will be debauched and slaughtered. For them there is no hope but in their home—the South—being freed from the invader. What then does it avail to expose the utter depths of Abolition infamy? We say that England, that the civilised world is bound to protest against the ruthless brutality of Abolitionism. We may or may not be called upon to intervene. We may or may not be justified in leaving the whole work to the South. But we are called upon to protest. There must be thousands—nay, millions—of people in the Northern States who have not bowed down to the idol of Abolitionism; and it may be that they will heed the protest. When the Great Avenger maketh requisition for blood, let us be able to plead that, though we could not save the negro, we denounced the conduct of his persecutors. This is surely the least that any Christian can do—it is surely the least that England can do, seeing that England planted the negro population in the Confederate States.

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

The truth is oozing out in spite of the indefatigable Stanton. For two or three weeks, whilst M'Clellan was supposed to have a chance of being elected President, Mr. Stanton's ready pen gained two or three victories a day. It was all up with the South. Sheridan was hotly pursuing Early. Grant was marching on to Richmond. Lee's army was caving in. Hood's army was dispirited and demoralised. Georgia was in despair. The Confederate Government and the Confederacy was on its last legs. The rebellion was crushed, and it only needed another 200,000 men to grind it into powder. 'Only 200,000 more,' cries Mr. Stanton, 'and "up goes the donkey!"' The last two mails, however, tell a very different tale. It is not Mr. Stanton's fault. He still does his best to make victory look like defeat, and defeat look like victory. But the truth is too much for him. Those obstinate, aggravating rebels have completely spoiled his game.

General Grant has added considerably to his enormous butcher's bill. His recent operations, though well-pleasing to Mr. Stanton, have not brought him nearer to Richmond, but have resulted in killing and wounding about 10,000 Federals and in the slaughter of 2,000 negroes. But though the operations at Deep Bottom and before Petersburg have failed, and though it is intimated that Grant is withdrawing from the north of the James, we are informed by the correspondent of the New York Times, that 'refugees from Richmond report the evacuation of the city by non-combatants, and great dismay prevailed everywhere.' Seen through Federal spectacles, the people of Richmond are very eccentric. When the Confederate arms are reported to be unsuccessful, they are undismayed; but when the Federals are repulsed they are always evacuating the city. During the last three years Richmond has been evacuated about a hundred times, and at least twenty times the inhabitants have been starved to death.

There was a report that Butler had been killed in battle, but he has not met with a soldier's death; and, seeing that he keeps as far as possible from the scene of conflict, he is not likely to do so. Butler's lines were assaulted by the Confederates, and Kantz's artillery was captured. We are told that Birney recovered Kantz's position, but we are not told that he recovered the artillery; from which we infer that the Confederates made off with their booty, and that Birney merely occupied the post that the Confederates did not attempt to hold.

The Federals broke through a portion of the Confederate lines on the south of the James, and were driven back with the loss of 900 prisoners.

In the Shenandoah Valley the position of affairs is changed; or, rather, the true position is now known. General Early was outnumbered and slowly retreated before his antagonist, dealing blow for blow, losing and inflicting loss. Then the hot pursuit stops. A battle ensues. Sheridan is in turn forced to retire. Confederate guerillas are in the Federal rear, capturing—so the Federal Government intimates—numberless deserters, but capturing, we know, the Federal supply trains. Sheridan is checked. If it is true that General Longstreet with 20,000 fresh troops has joined Early, Sheridan is in imminent danger of being checkmated. The worship of Sheridan, 'the brilliant Yankee Blucher,' did not last quite a week.

The Federals under General Burbridge have been defeated in Virginia. They attacked Salthill in the western part of the State, were 'badly repulsed, retreating in confusion, pursued by the Confederates.' The Federal military prospects in Virginia are not improved or promising, and they are not better in other quarters.

General Sherman at Atlanta is on the defensive. General Hood has reminded the Federal commander that he can act on the offensive, and General Forrest has destroyed a portion of the Chattanooga railroad, and captured Big Shanty. It is said that Forrest has been compelled to retreat and leave 1,000 of his dead and wounded in the hands of the enemy. The initiated in Federal reports will not suppose from this that Forrest has sustained any serious check.

General Price has met with great success in Missouri. Not only has he advanced to within six miles of St. Louis, but his army has been increased by 5,000 Missourians. Such is the reply that the men of this gallant State give to the appeal of the Federal commander to enlist in the service of Abraham Lincoln. Generals Magruder and Kirby Smith have entered Arkansas, it is supposed for the purpose of cooperating with General Price.

Surely the Northerners must now be convinced that the 'rebellion' is not so near exhaustion as the Lincolnites report. It is manifest that the Confederate armies were never more numerous, and never in better fighting order.

The so-called Governor of Tennessee (Federal) has issued an order that no person can vote for President unless he swears to oppose an armistice. It is common enough to exact pledges from candidates, but it is a novelty to exact pledges from voters. The Lincolnites have curious views about the freedom of election. They must not vote unless they are loyal, and the test of loyalty is voting for Mr. Lincoln.

At Chicago there is a commercial panic, and several banking houses have stopped payment. It is ominous of what may be expected that the military were called upon to keep order at the first mutterings of the financial storm that must sooner or later overwhelm the whole country.

Two years ago there was an outcry in London against the practice of tradesmen feeing the servants of their customers. The evils of the system are palpable. The servant so feed will not scrutinise the tradesman's bill or the tradesman's goods. For every pound the servant receives the master is mulcted of twenty pounds. An analogous game is being played by Mr. Lincoln. He is asking for presents from those who purvey for the United States. To pay for the expenses of his election, not only the salaried employés of the Government, but even the loyal contractors, have to contribute. The following letter is published in some of the Northern papers:—

Rooms of the National Union Executive Committee,
Astor House, New York, September 15, 1864.
(Private.)

Dear Sir,—Your name, with others, has been handed to me as having been employed by the Government in furnishing supplies to the Medical Department of the army for the past year. I take it for granted you appreciate the necessity of sustaining the Government in its contest with the rebellion, and of electing the Union candidates in November, the only mode of carrying the war to a successful close, and of restoring a peace which shall restore the Union.

I trust you will have anticipated the application now made for a contribution to the fund which we need for organising and carrying on the Presidential canvass. The amount of this contribution I of course leave to yourself. Please remit whatever you may feel inclined to give in a cheque payable to my order as Treasurer of the National Executive Committee. I respectfully ask your immediate attention to this matter, as the need of funds is pressing, and the time for using them is short.—Your obedient servant, H. J. Raymond, Chairman.

We may be sure that the contractors for medical stores will remember their donations in the price and quality of the goods they will supply. It is not in human nature, and it certainly is not in Yankee nature, to do otherwise.

The Knights of the Road, the thieves of the last century, were humorous scoundrels. If they relieved a bishop of his watch, they reminded him that it was a kindness to take from him part of his worldly goods, which are a snare and an incumbrance. If they robbed a fat trader of his purse, they told their victim that he would not be troubled about the investment of his money. Mr. Lincoln's Knights of the Silver Spoon and the Dollar are not less humorous. A riot occurred in Cincinnati, the Cincinnati Enquirer published a report of it, the report was quoted in many papers, and at last in the Baltimore Evening Post. The Evening Post put forth a bill of contents, which announced the riot in Cincinnati. Upon this General Wallace determined to suppress the paper, and sent the following order to the editor:—

Eighth Army Corps, Middle Department,
Baltimore, September 30, 1864.

Editor of the Evening Post,—As the surest means of preventing your office from being made the subject of violence, you will discontinue the publication of your paper, the Evening Post. By command of Major-General Wallace.
Oliver Matthews, Captain and A. A. G.

The Baltimore Sun of October 1 says: 'General Wallace stated last evening that he suppressed the publication of the Evening Post purely to prevent riot and perhaps bloodshed in this city, and to save the building in which the Post was published from destruction, and that the order for the suppression would not be revoked.' Really Mr. Lincoln must look to his laurels. This joke beats many of his Western stories.

The following, suppressing a Louisiana paper, though not quite so racy, is worth reading:—

Headquarters Lafourche District, Thibodaux, La.,
September 21, 1864.
(General Orders, No. 107.)

The Thibodaux Sentinel, a newspaper published at Thibodaux, in the parish of Lafourche, on account of its notoriously disloyal tendency, its insinuating treason and rebel innuendoes, is hereby suppressed, and its publication under its present management will cease.

Its present editor and proprietor, if he feels aggrieved, can have safe conduct to his friends outside of the Union lines by applying at these headquarters. By command of Brigadier-General R. A. Cameron.
B. B. Campbell, A. A. G.

The joke here is, we suppose, the doubt implied whether the proprietor would feel aggrieved at the ruin of his property, or whether he would rather enjoy the fun, and that, if he did not like the fun, he could be banished as well as robbed. The jest of General Wallace is more piquant. The kindness of killing a man to save him from hurting his little finger is charming. After all, these must be sorry jests to those Federals who remember that in 1860 they were free, and that now they are the creatures of Abraham Lincoln.

The New York Herald has invented an excellent title for its summaries of electioneering news. It has adopted the heading of 'The Political Market.' Politics in the United States are a trade, and a most nefarious one.

There has been a riot in Cincinnati, attended with loss of life. A Lincolnite procession, headed by one of Mr. Lincoln's employés, the postmaster of Covington, and whose retention of office depends upon Mr. Lincoln's re-election, marched through the town, threatening Democrats and breaking windows. A crowd collected, consisting principally of women and children, and there were shouts for M'Clellan. Upon this the Lincoln mob, under the direction of the Covington postmaster, fired into the crowd. A woman was killed, and several persons were wounded. His people may be slow to learn, but Mr. Lincoln may be sure they will ultimately learn and not forget, the lessons of bloodshed that he is teaching them.

Mr. Vallandigham lately delivered a speech at Sydney, Ohio, in which he denounced the efforts of the Government to disturb demonstration meetings, and declared that he was ready to oppose force by force.

It is an old adage that speaking truth shames the devil. Mr. Lincoln's supporters will never put the devil to shame. When they are at a loss to invent new calumnies, they repeat oft-refuted calumnies. Mr. Blair, at a Lincoln ratification meeting held at the Cooper Institute, New York, said: 'The next step in this war of treason was the distribution of the arms of the United States from all their arsenals and cannon foundries among the State authorities favourable to secession.' Now Mr. Blair knows that this assertion is utterly false. He knows that when the war broke out the Southern States had not received their fair share of arms. It is much to be regretted that the South did not prepare for war, and secure her fair share of arms and ships. We do not suppose that even Mr. Blair will say the South had her share of the navy.

The gold market in New York is still visibly agitated. On the 4th the quotation was 189, and on the 8th it was 201¼. Mr. Fessenden has asked for a new loan of $40,000,000 six per cent. gold-bearing bonds. If he gets it, it will pay about a fourth of the pressing claims on the Federal Treasury.

ENGLAND.

One more member of that brilliant company of gentlemen who have adorned by their lives and their talents the public schools of Eton and Harrow, the University of Oxford, the Houses of Parliament, and England herself, has died. The Earl of Elgin, Lord Canning, Lord Herbert, the Marquis of Dalhousie, Sir Robert Peel, and now the Duke of Newcastle—all statesmen of the best type, true patriots, and men of honour; ambitious of power, not for their own glory, but for that of their country; Viceroys of India, Ministers of War and of Finance—each one in turn has died almost in his prime, the victim of an unwearied devotion to duty. Mr. Gladstone, associated with them at school, at college, or in Parliament, imbued with their ideas, their compeer in industry, genius, and integrity, alone remains to represent worthily the once powerful Peelites. The Duke of Newcastle was born in 1811, a Tory of the Tories. He was educated at Eton, which, in the famous scholarship founded by the father of the deceased statesman, preserves the name of Newcastle as an emblem of intellectual superiority. Thence His Grace proceeded to Christ Church, Oxford. He took his degree in the year 1832, and in the same year entered the House of Commons as member for South Nottinghamshire. In 1846 came the crisis of the Corn Law agitation, and Lord Lincoln went for Sir Robert and repeal. His father burned with indignation at the defection of a Clinton, and opposed his son at the election for South Nottinghamshire; Lord Lincoln was defeated at the poll, and after an equally unhappy attempt to win North Notts in the face of the Clumber interest, found a seat in the Falkirk burghs, and qualified himself to hold the post of Chief Secretary for Ireland. He had been a Lord of the Treasury in 1834-5, and Chief Commissioner of the Woods and Forests from 1841 to January in 1846. In December 1852 he was made Secretary for the Colonies and for War (for at that time the offices were combined) in the Aberdeen ministry. Then came the Russian war and the disastrous winter of 1854, when the British troops were quartered in front of Sebastopol in diminished numbers, with a broken-down commissariat, a helpless quartermaster department, without medicines, without clothes, without meat, exposed to the fury of the elements, sustained only by the indomitable fire of British courage. When Parliament met in 1855, Mr. Roebuck, backed by the almost unanimous voice of the country, gave notice of an enquiry into the administration of the war. Lord John Russell with characteristic discretion left the sinking ship. Lord Palmerston with characteristic courage stood manfully by his colleagues. The brunt of popular indignation fell on the Duke of Newcastle; for the anger of a multitude always desires a scapegoat, and the man who had scarcely known a night of sleep, and never had known a day of recreation, was openly accused of 'indolence and indifference.' Those who were aware that blame rested on every department of the military administration, and that one man could not be responsible for the inefficiency of 10,000 officials whom a long period of repose had rendered unequal to the exigency, knew that after a lapse of time a reaction would welcome back the Duke to power. As Secretary of the Colonies from 1859 to 1864, His Grace enjoyed an office for which he was peculiarly suited. Every one remembers the visit of the Prince of Wales to America, and the tact with which the Duke encountered the difficulties incident to an intercourse with men of every shade of temperament and opinion. The Duke of Newcastle died, at Clumber, at seven o'clock in the evening of the 18th October. In concluding this necessarily brief memoir of a man who is deservedly lamented by the Queen, by an immense circle of illustrious friends and colleagues, and by the people of England, we are compelled to do the work of Garter King at Arms, from respect to the illustrious rank of the deceased. Henry Pelham Fiennes Pelham Clinton, K.G., fifth Duke of Newcastle-under-Lyme, in Staffordshire, Earl of Lincoln, Baron Clinton, Lord Warden of the Stannaries of Cornwall and Devonshire, Lord-Lieutenant of Nottinghamshire, Rider and Master Forester of Dartmoor, Lieutenant-Colonel of the Sherwood Rangers, High Steward of Retford, Keeper of St. Briavel's Castle, &c., born May 22, 1811, married Lady Susan Harriet Catherine Hamilton Douglas, only daughter of the Duke of Hamilton, by whom he leaves four sons and one daughter. He is succeeded by his son Henry Pelham, Earl of Lincoln, born January 5, 1834, married February 11, 1864, the only daughter of the late Mr. Henry Thomas Hope, of Deepdene.

Mr. Gladstone, in a speech on Friday last in the Town Hall, Manchester, made the following remarks with reference to the American war:—'I don't believe that history records a case in which the internal dissensions of a country have produced such widespread calamities in other nations beyond its borders. But we have felt that it was our duty to respect American freedom—to respect the discretion of the American to deal with his own affairs, whatever might be our particular opinion as to the wisdom of any course they were pursuing or as to the practicability of any object they had in view. For my own part I confess I have always had great doubts as to the probability of reducing to subjection any large portion of a country that manifests a determined disposition to separate. But whatever be our opinion we have no right to place it in a form which should make us the judge of what it is fit for another country to do. Theirs is the responsibility; ours is—has been, in fact—the suffering; but if we groan over the suffering which has been experienced among our own population, let us look at the frightful magnitude of the calamities the Americans are undergoing. It is for them, as they have the responsibility, to judge of their own course. I entertain, in the first place, this conviction, that by any attempts to enforce our own judgment instead of theirs, we should have done nothing but embitter a contest already too much exasperated. In the second place, I feel that the sentiment with which we ought to regard this most unhappy war is this. We have no jealousy of American greatness. We have no reason to fear them or any other nation. We feel they are our brethren by blood and language. We know their continent is calculated to continue in relations of the most beneficial intercourse with us, and we ought to pray Almighty God that it may please Him in His mercy to bring this sanguinary contest, if it be His will, at an early period to such a termination as shall be most for the happiness, peace, permanent welfare, and prosperity of all the inhabitants of what were once the United States.'

The distress in the cotton districts continues rapidly to increase. At a meeting of the Executive Committee of the Central Relief Fund on Monday last, Mr. Commissioner Farnall delivered a report, from which it appeared that during the past week there was an increase of upwards of 5,000 in the number of persons receiving relief in the twenty-seven unions embraced in his returns. Mr. Farnall also stated that the whole of the money which the Loan Commissioners were authorised to lend under the Public Works Act had been appropriated.

The colliers' strike at Bilston has come to an end. A notice had been issued calling a meeting for Saturday last, at which some thousands of workmen attended. Mr. Griffiths, a well-known metal broker, enjoying a great popularity among the working population, addressed the meeting to the effect, that while the strike was amply justified, and while, with one or two exceptions, for which the general body of colliers were not responsible, the men had conducted themselves in a most exemplary manner, yet the iron trade was in such a condition that a further struggle was hopeless. A miner and member of the committee then moved that the colliers and miners should resume work on the following Monday. The motion was duly seconded, but the nervous embarrassment of the speakers was so great that the audience greeted their perplexities with hearty shouts of laughter. When the motion was put, the men preserved a deep silence, broken only by some merriment at the situation. The committee, on consultation, then agreed to abnegate their functions, and to leave every man to do as he judged right for himself.

On Monday last, Earl Russell opened the North London Working-Classes' Industrial Exhibition at the Agricultural Hall, Islington. The report of the Secretary showed that the Society included the districts of Clerkenwell, Islington, St. Pancras, St. Luke's, Hoxton, St. Andrew's (Holborn), and Bloomsbury. The exhibition was to consist of objects manufactured by the exhibitors, either as specimens of skilled workmanship, or examples of self-taught handicraft. The guarantee fund amounted to 350*l.*, of which 50*l.* had been guaranteed by Miss Burdett Coutts, and 100*l.* by Mr. Samuel Morley. The exhibitors were 866 in number, and the articles shown by them occupied 5,930 feet of wall, 2,012 feet of counter, and 1,750 feet of floor. The articles were classified in the divisions of professional workmanship, amateur productions, inventions and novel contrivances, mechanical models, architectural and ornamental models, artistic objects, ladies' work of all kinds, and miscellaneous articles. After the report had been read, Earl Russell addressed the assembly, affirming that fresh proof was now afforded that the working classes of London were the highest in the world, and alluding to the unity of all classes in the path of progress. Mr. Digby Seymour, M.P., in proposing a vote of thanks to Earl Russell, whose name had long been identified with the welfare and progress of the people, social and political, did not neglect the opportunity of suggesting the propriety of completing the political emancipation of the working classes.

A fine ship of war was launched at Portsmouth on Saturday last. The Royal Alfred is an ironclad ram, destined to be armed with 4½-inch plates to her waterline. She was laid down in 1859 as a 91-gun ship of the line, but has undergone conversion. In 1861, she was lengthened amidships, and her bow and stern altered to convert her into a powerful ram. Her length between perpendiculars is 273 feet, her extreme breadth 58 feet, and her burden 4,045 tons. She is classed with the Royal Oak, Prince Consort, Caledonia, and Bellerophon.

Mr. Thomas Burrowes, a stockjobber, who was declared a defaulter on the Stock Exchange on Saturday last, was brought up the same day before Mr. Alderman Challis, charged with obtaining 2,000 Confederate cotton bonds, value 1,280*l.*, from Mr. J. Tucker, of 10 Hercules Chambers, under false pretences. Mr. Mullens, who appeared for the prosecution, stated that the prisoner had given cheques for bonds at a time when he knew he had no money in his bank to meet them, and that the cheques given were for no less an amount than 10,000*l.* It was proved that the cheque for 1,280*l.* was given on Friday, and was returned unpaid on the same day. It was also proved that the balance of his account at the time amounted only to 7*4l.* 1*s.* 4*d.* Cheques to the extent of 9,120*l.* were presented on the same day, and returned unpaid. The prisoner stated that he could not sell the stock because he was an object of doubt and suspicion on the Stock Exchange. The stock was, in fact, in the hands of the Stock Exchange. The defalcation would not amount to 300*l.*, and in a few days that amount would be set right. The magistrate offered to take the prisoner's bail in 1,000*l.* and two sureties in 500*l.* each. The prisoner was unable to obtain it, and was removed in custody. The method by which Mr. Burrowes was captured proves, first, that the gentlemen of the Stock Exchange have confidence in their ability in other matters besides money transactions, and second, that the confidence is not misplaced. Two or three brokers having got wind of the state of Mr. Burrowes's affairs, and finding themselves the holders of worthless cheques in exchange for good securities, concocted a scheme for the apprehension of the presumed fugitive. They discovered that he had left his office early, and naturally supposed that he would put in an appearance at some railway station in the course of the day. They chose to act as detectives on their own account rather than to trust to the activity of Scotland Yard. Mr. Sturdy, of the firm of Messrs. Baker & Sturdy, was detailed to the Charing Cross Station. In the train that was to convey the Paris mails a gentleman was seated with a lady by his side. The face of the gentleman was clean shaved, and the heavy dark beard and moustache of Mr. Burrowes had disappeared. But Mr. Sturdy was not to be deceived. He interrogated Mr. Burrowes, and finally induced him to travel, accompanied by the lady, to some offices in the City. At the opening of the market announcement was made of the capture, and the narrative was received with tumultuous applause. Mr. Sturdy was seized and chaired in splendid style, and some minutes elapsed before order and business resumed their sway.

A new feature in the method of entertaining the public in their jovial hours sprang up some eight years ago in London, and has been developed into an institution of no mean pretensions. It was justly considered that there was an immense multitude of individuals of both sexes desirous of amusement between the hours of 8 P.M. and midnight, and that little or no provision existed for the satisfaction of those impulses. There were theatres; but to them the serious objection prevailed that smoking was prohibited, liquor stronger than lemonade or gingerbeer did not exist, and the knees were made intolerably stiff by eternal sitting in cramped positions. Again, there were public-houses where drink and smoke were unlimited; but inasmuch as the Londoners are not so addicted to mere animal delights as to adore the bar of a grog-shop, it was natural that a line of entertainment should be adopted which would, while permitting the body to be refreshed or wearied by a variety of supplies, yet take care to administer pleasure to the more elevated senses. Enterprising men, therefore, started music halls; and the success of the Alhambra, the Oxford, the Islington Philharmonic, and Canterbury Halls testified that the taste of one class of Londoners had not been misconceived. Men, and women too, liked to listen to a fair quantity of decent vocal and instrumental music, to hear Unsworth deliver a stump oration, or see Leotard and the Brothers Conrad fly through the air, especially when the price of admission did not exceed one shilling. We do not know that the music halls have done much to elevate the moral sentiments of their habitués, but there is no reason for supposing that they have acted in a contrary direction. The latest speculation in this line is the Strand Music Hall, which was opened for the first time on Monday night. To criticise its attempts at amusement would be unfair at so early a stage of its existence. The company has erected a building whose front, defiant of all laws or schools of architecture, possesses variety, if not grotesqueness; at the same time it bears the marks of very considerable skill, and certainly has powers of attraction. If the doings within are equally novel and eccentric, doubt of a success will scarcely exist.

The interest of the Second October Meeting at Newmarket did not close with the decision of the race for the Cesarewitch. On the ensuing day a contest, worthy of record from its extraordinary severity, was fought out between three colts of fair pretensions. The prize was small, and the course was but three-quarters of a mile in length. Thirteen competitors, however, came to the post, and on the word being given the pace at once became serious. At about one hundred yards from home Lord Stamford's Gownsman, Mr. York's Lytham, Lord Hastings' Attraction, and Mr. Payne's The Beadle appeared in the van, and fought out a result which placed the three first named on the equal terms of a dead heat, and The Beadle but a head behind the trio. In the deciding heat Gownsman beat Lytham by a head, and Attraction was half a length behind Lytham. On the next day Count F. de Lagrange's Fille de l'Air put in an appearance for the Newmarket Oaks, and was made favourite with the odds of 13 to 8 laid on her. Baron Rothschild's Breeze, who finished second to Fille de l'Air in the Epsom Oaks, figured at 6 to 1, while 8 to 1 was laid against John Day's elegant filly Teneriffe. The length of the course was nearly two miles. As for struggle there was none, for the renowned victrix of Vermout passed her opponents at a distance from home and galloped in some lengths in advance of Breeze. Teneriffe was third, Baron Rothschild's Evelina and Tomato fourth and fifth, and Lord Exeter's Auricula, whose brotherhood to Stockwell and Rataplan augured better things, last. Again, on the next day, Fille de l'Air added fame and money to her owner by winning the Newmarket Derby. Her opponents were Mr. Bowes's Claremont, and Mr. W. Day's 'Cesarewitch crack' Mail Train. The latter animal went furiously for three parts of a mile, and then stopped as if shot. Fille de l'Air then took up the running, and won in a canter by six lengths. Perhaps, however, the most interesting event of the meeting was a match for 500*l.* between Lord Glasgow's General Peel and Lord Stamford's Cambuscan. General Peel, by Young Melbourne, the winner of the Two Thousand Guineas, and second to Blair Athol in the Derby and Leger, seemed to enjoy a reputation greater than that of the handsome son of Newminster and the Arrow. The latter horse won the July stakes at Newmarket as a two-year-old, but his career in the year 1864 has not been quite equal to the promise of earlier youth. In the Derby he was not many lengths behind General Peel, but his noble owner was justly dissatisfied with such a position. In the St. Leger he showed a decided improvement, inasmuch as he succumbed to General Peel only after a gallant fight. Both the horses had come to Newmarket to fulfil engagements, for which they were allowed to 'walk over,' and it was considered by their sporting possessors that it was not to be endured that they should return home without a display of prowess. So, when Lord Glasgow expressed a readiness to concede two pounds' weight, as the measure of the St. Leger head, to his adversary, no difficulty was experienced in concluding the terms of the struggle. The ring after much wavering laid 6 to 5 on Cambuscan, and were right in their notion. The race was run over the Two Thousand Guineas course, one mile and seventeen yards. General Peel went away with the lead, and maintained his superiority till he descended the Bushes Hill. At this point Cambuscan got his head in front for a few yards. On ascending the final rise, General Peel again obtained the lead, but within fifty yards from the post Cambuscan got up and won by half a length. The cheering at the victory of Newmarket over Yorkshire was tremendous. In the course of the week, Mr. Tattersall sold the Duke of Cleveland's stud by auction. The gallant Tim Whiffler by Van Galen by Van Tromp, out of Sybil by the Ugly Buck, the winner of the Chester, Epsom, and Doncaster Cups, who finished his racing career in the dead heat with Buckstone for the Ascot Cup of 1863, was purchased by Lord Coventry for 750 guineas, a price probably much below the value of the horse. Tim Whiffler has neither the quality of great beauty nor that of great size to recommend him for the stud, but his legs are of iron and his heart of steel, and he was the best-tempered horse ever trained.

IRELAND.

THE Ribandmen have achieved a great success. They have shot an aged and infirm man, against whom no charge of oppression could be brought, and who had done no act calculated to arouse hostility. Mr. Robert Wilson had been for many years the agent of Lord Leitrim. He was kind and affable, and if he had ever dismissed from employment some impracticable individual, he had never earned a name as a lover of eviction. Some eight days since he was on his way to meet the pay-clerk at Leetbeg, in the county of Donegal. At a point in his journey where the road was not belted by trees, he observed a number of corn sheaves placed in a heap. He stopped his horse to survey the singular structure. At that moment, when he was about fifteen or twenty yards from the heap, two shots were fired, both taking effect in his arm, leg, and lung. The horse was wounded and immediately ran away. The unfortunate gentleman looked back and saw two men with guns on their shoulders leisurely marching off. Many peasants witnessed the affair, but neither did any one attempt to arrest the fellows, nor has any one given information to the police. One of the slugs has been extracted, and there is some hope of Mr. Wilson's recovery. Even if an arrest is effected, it is not probable that the Crown will succeed in getting a conviction.

AUSTRALIA.

The Ballarat and Daylesford gold-fields have received a fresh development, and enormous yields of gold are being obtained from the 'deep-sinking claims.' It is known that 'leads' of wash dirt, consisting of submerged river beds, exist hundreds of feet below the surface of the earth, and these deposits are being worked with success.

A quarrel is not only being fomented between Victoria and England, but also between the Melbourne and the Sydney Cabinets. The Northern Railway of Victoria runs near the Murray River, and consequently there is an influx of goods from New South Wales. The latter colony claims absolute jurisdiction over the river, and has placed her custom houses along the banks. Besides the certainty of a prodigious amount of smuggling, there is a dispute arising from the claim of an easement over the river by the Government of Victoria.

The transportation question has excited a strong feeling of indignation at the conduct of the English Cabinet. Mr. Cardwell's last despatch announcing the intention of continuing transportation to Western Australia, coupled with the speeches in the House of Lords, has afforded a cry to the Opposition, embarrassment to the local Government, and food for fury to the general public.

A copy of the minute submitted by the Cabinet of Victoria to the Governor of the colony has arrived in London. In the document regret is expressed that all efforts to secure that measure of justice which the colonists had a right to expect had failed, and that the decision of Her Majesty's Government was not only at variance with the statement made by the Duke of Newcastle in 1853, but also in contravention of the policy declared by His Grace to be the duty of Her Majesty's Government. The Government of the colony had determined to exercise the powers of self-government to initiate legislation in concert with the other colonies for their common protection. It had accordingly addressed a circular to the Chief Secretary of each of the colonies, inviting cooperation in framing measures prohibitive of all intercourse whatsoever with Western Australia, in order that her position as the only convict colony in Australia might be distinctly marked. It is further intimated that no measures of isolation would be efficient while the mail steamers continued to call at King George's Sound; therefore, that unless the terms of the existing arrangements with the Peninsular and Oriental Company be altered, and the company consent not to touch at any port in Western Australia, the Government of Victoria would cease to contribute to the annual subsidy. His Excellency is requested to assure Her Majesty's Government of the reality of the feeling of the people of Victoria on the subject.

THE CONTINENT.

FRANCE.

It is certainly not the fault of the French press that we do not yet clearly see what the effect of the Franco-Italian Convention will be upon the political relations of Austria, but their challenges to the Germans have fallen comparatively flat. Neither the Cabinet nor the press of Austria are very expansive in their declarations; we are still left to conjecture on this important point. That the statesmen of Vienna are wise in not showing their hand is becoming daily more evident. Ominous whispers are heard of an imminent coolness between them and the Cabinet of the Tuileries; they are confirmed by the behaviour of France to Prussia, the courtesy with which her envoys have been received, and the patience with which her conduct in Denmark has been endured. The recent appointment of M. Benedetti to the French Embassy at Berlin is again a fact worthy of notice, as pointing in the same direction. That gentleman is an avowed enemy of Austria, and will doubtless do his best to put her in a disadvantageous position with regard to Prussia. All these things considered, we are not surprised to hear of rumours that M. Drouyn de Lhuys is about to resign his post as Foreign Minister of France; his Austrian sympathies are too well known to allow of his remaining in a Cabinet which entertains views adverse to that Power. Again, another report says that the army of Algeria is to be raised to a fighting complement of 100,000 men; it is certain that that army is being largely reinforced, and men call to mind the events of 1858, when the same device was used for collecting troops, which in the next year were poured into the plains of Italy. The number of the reinforcement in the present instance may be exaggerated, as also may be the story of a new loan of thirty or forty millions sterling; but if the old maxim be true that there is never smoke without fire, we may expect fresh troubles in Europe.

It is settled that the Emperor and Empress of Russia are to visit Nice; the Empress will stay there during the winter, and the Empress of the French will join her. Their route to that town lies through Lyons, where apartments are already engaged for them; the Emperor of the French will probably meet them in that city. According to another story, he will pay them a further visit at Nice as soon as they are established there. A battalion of chasseurs à pied, of the Imperial Guard, has already arrived at Nice, and will act as a guard of honour to the Czarina during her stay.

M. Prévost-Paradol has vindicated the wisdom and liberality of the English Constitution with an energy and a completeness which are all the more gratifying that they come from a Frenchman and not an Englishman. The Duc de Persigny, in his anxiety to find new praises for the present Imperial Constitution, had hazarded a comparison of the liberties of France and England, and had come to the conclusion that the executive, legislative, and judicial powers in England were all concentrated into the same hands—those, namely, of the conquering class, the traditional inheritors of the Conquest—and that consequently freedom in England was confined to that class. The philosopher of old declined to argue with 'the master of forty legions,' and the modern journalists have been shy of refuting the Imperial confidant. Thereupon M. de Persigny raised a shout of triumph, and proclaimed to the world that his theories had been unchallenged, because they were unassailable; nor did he omit to thrust into the faces of his adversaries the revered name of Montesquieu, the father of constitutionalism. This was un peu fort; and M. Paradol determined to run all risks in exposing the fallacies of the Imperialist philosopher. He begins by reminding his antagonist of the difficulty under which every man labours in discussing the French Constitution in an adverse fashion—a difficulty which, he bids him remember, was created by the restrictions which M. de Persigny himself, when in office, had imposed upon such discussion. In a very few words he disposes of M. de Persigny's claim to number Montesquieu among the authorities for Imperialism. 'M. de Persigny,' he says, 'thinks he has found out the right system of government, and asserts that he derives it from Montesquieu himself. M. de Persigny is too modest; it is his own exclusive property.' M. Paradol then examines the attack made on the English Constitution. He shows that the ultimate power lies in the hands of the electors, who hold the franchise according to assessment of property, and concludes with these telling words: 'Really we cannot consider the invitation of M. de Persigny to discuss these delicate questions, nor even his regret that they should not be discussed, as a sufficient "safe conduct" to follow him on such a battle-field. We prefer pulling up short, and telling M. de Persigny the plain truth, as he will insist on having it. The thesis developed in his letter consists of two parts, a criticism of the institutions of England, and a eulogy of our own. Of these two parts the first, were it not signed with the name of M. de Persigny, would not deserve discussion; the second, under whatever name it might be put forth, cannot be discussed.'

A very interesting sham naval fight took place on the 9th instant at Toulon. The whole squadron, with the Solferino at the head of it, made an attack upon the batteries defending the entrance of the harbour of Toulon, exactly similar to that which a hostile fleet would make. The immediate object of it was to discover how many shots an ironclad might be expected to fire at each battery under a given speed, and with a certain circumscribed space for performing evolutions. The engagement lasted for one hour exactly, under a bright sun, and with a fresh breeze blowing. It was, of course, most interesting and exciting to the innumerable spectators who had assembled on the shore; but the practical results of it are a secret for the outer world.

The spirit of disorder so rife in our mining population has appeared in France under an exactly similar shape. A conspiracy was formed among the miners of Valenciennes to strike for an advance of wages, which they required to be fixed for all workmen, bad and good, at three francs a day. They succeeded in keeping their machinations secret. On the night of the 20th ult., believing affairs to be ripe for an explosion, they broke out; they forbade all workmen to go down into the pits, extinguished the engine fires, and stopped the whole of the works; they then entered the cottages of all who were not taking an active part in the disorder, and compelled them to join. Strikes are not treated with much respect in France; the military were instantly ordered up, a whole batch of arrests were made, and quiet restored. An ineffectual attempt was made to break out again on the following night, which was checked in the same way. On the 7th inst. twenty-nine workmen arrested in the two affairs were brought before the magistrates at Valenciennes. On examining them the authorities were disgusted to find that they had failed to get hold of the ringleaders and original movers of the disturbance; the accused were all young men earning fair wages, and evidently the dupes of some older criminals. They received a suitable lecture, and were condemned to short periods of imprisonment, varying from six weeks to one week.

One of the vast cloth factories of Normandy, the property of the firm Méry Sampson, situated at Lisieux, has been burnt to the ground, and a vast amount of property destroyed, including cotton to the value of upwards of 40,000*l.* Six hundred workmen are thrown out of employment by this catastrophe.

M. Jules Gérard, the lion-killer of Africa, whose name was familiar to the world before Gordon Cumming made his battues in the Cape Bush, or Speke and Grant had penetrated to the core of Africa, has unfortunately been drowned in attempting to cross the River Jong, near Sierra Leone.

ITALY.

The election of deputies is proceeding energetically. General della Marmora and others of the Cabinet have been duly re-elected to their seats. The electors of Castel-Maggiore have returned the Marchese di Pepoli as Deputy; that statesman has therefore gone off to Russia, in which country he was Ambassador, to present his letters of recall. He will return to Turin in time for the meeting of the Chamber. A banquet was given at Milan in his honour on the 10th inst., at which a unanimous resolution was passed in favour of the Convention, in the framing of which the Marquis was so largely concerned. He himself proposed the health of the city of Turin, and in the course of his speech exhorted her to submit to the sacrifices which Italy demanded of her, and to rest assured of the falsehood and malice of those who prophesied that she would be the victim of cowardly cessions or foreign conquests. The speech was well received, and has been eagerly quoted in France. Without in any way doubting the sincerity of the Marquis's statements, we may remember that the cession of Nice and Savoy was once denied even more categorically by Count Cavour. A meeting of workmen has been held at Turin with the object of presenting a petition to Parliament requesting the impeachment of the late Ministry, and protesting against the Convention. The United National Committees are preparing to present a similar petition against the Convention, which they declare to be a fatal blow to the unity of Italy. A circular note is now in course of preparation by the Premier, to be addressed to all Italian ambassadors abroad. It maintains that the emigration of the Government to Florence is a purely strategical measure, and expressly points out that, although the Government desires reconciliation with the Papacy, it cannot ignore the principle that the Romans have the right of selecting their own Government. It is understood that the King will still permanently reside in Turin, so that one of the objections to the change will be obviated. The question of the transfer of the capital will of course be made a Government question in the Chamber, and any amendment in favour of the claims of Naples to the sovereignty will be considered as a vote of want of confidence in the Administration. It is satisfactory to see that a decree of amnesty on behalf of the prisoners taken at Aspromonte has been passed. Their offence was flat rebellion, and amply deserved punishment; but the circumstances of the case palliated their crime to a great extent, and it was impossible to continue a course of severity against the subordinates while Garibaldi, the leader of the movement, was nominally at large. It is said that the reduction in the Austrian army will be answered by a corresponding reduction in the Italian forces. About 50,000 men will be sent to their homes, 41,000 of whom will come from the infantry.

The Pontifical gendarmes have been effecting some arrests among the brigands; five of a band which murdered some French officials have been taken. No idea can yet be formed of the position which the Pope means to assume with regard to the Convention. The French journals deny everything which might lead men to suppose that the Holy Father will embarrass his powerful ally, or complicate the situation further. The story now is that, on being informed of the treaty by M. de Sartiges, the Pope replied not a word, but merely pointed to the crucifix with a gesture of sublime resignation. The people of Rome, after some uncertainty and wavering, have declared themselves strongly in favour of the new Convention, thereby proving to the world that they at least still hold the doctrine of 'Rome for a capital,' and foresee a means of realising their wishes. An amusing story is told of the Roman police. They were lucky enough to capture thirteen pickpockets in one night, who were duly brought to the lock-up. The superintendent, however, considering thirteen to be an unlucky number, declined to receive more than twelve, and sent the other about his business!

DENMARK.

The sittings of the Conference of Vienna have been succeeding each other with great rapidity. The difficulty on the financial question has been settled, Denmark having consented to fix the round sum of 9,000,000 as the share which the Duchies are to have in the public property of Denmark. This amount will therefore be deducted from the portion of the Danish debt which has been assigned to the Duchies. Captain Sköller has arrived in Vienna, bearing the approval of the Danish Government to the settlement of the frontier question as arranged by the Conference. It is said that the plenipotentiaries have begun to frame the final treaty of peace, immediately upon the signature of which the Diet will be requested to withdraw the Federal troops from Holstein. The King of Denmark has made about forty Swedish and Norwegian officers, who took part in the late war on the side of Denmark, Knights of the Order of Dannebrog. The Rigsdag of Denmark, which was opened by the King in person on August 5, and prorogued to October 3, has resumed its sittings. In the address of both Houses, the Landsthing and the Volksthing, great stress is laid upon the desire of the people to see the Constitution of 1849 carried out in its entirety. The Minister of the Interior has, however, stated in the House that the Government can as yet make no promise with regard to the Constitution of 1849, and that, in any case, it will require serious modifications. The Dagbladet of the 15th inst. suggested that if peace be made with Germany on the present principles, the basis of the present order of succession would be overthrown, in which case the legitimate heir to the Danish throne would be Prince Frederick of Hesse and not Christian IX. For making this statement, M. de Bille, the late plenipotentiary at the Conference of London, has demanded that the editor should be prosecuted for high treason.

The Prince and Princess of Wales, and the infant Prince Albert Victor, left Fredensborg on the 11th inst. They proceeded in the yacht Osborne to Travemünde, in the territory of Lubeck, and thence by train through Hamburg to Glückstadt on the Elbe, in the Duchy of Holstein. Here they were met by the royal yacht Salamis, in which the infant Prince was conveyed to England. The royal couple will perhaps visit Hanover and Brussels before their return; but their visit is not likely to extend its limits further. They have displayed some ingenuity already in avoiding Prussian soil.

With regard to the alliance of Russia and Denmark in the persons of the Czarewitch and the Princess Dagmar, some journals have expressed themselves in a very sulky and ill-mannered fashion. They declare that such an alliance will be very distasteful to the Scandinavian nationality, and indulge in very gloomy views of the future. This testiness can easily be explained by observing that, to all anti-Danish minds, the alliance of Russia and Denmark is a great source of disquiet; they look forward very uncomfortably to the day when the new Czar may choose to avenge the sufferings inflicted by the Germans on the country of his wife. However, this day is yet far off. The marriage is not to come off for another eighteen months, when the Princess will have wellnigh attained the age of twenty years. She will probably pay a visit to Russia next summer, and her fiancé is expected in Copenhagen about Christmas time. A marriage was projected between the only daughter of Charles XV. of Sweden and the Crown Prince of Denmark, but difficulties are said to have arisen against so promising a match.

GERMANY.

The policy of Austria and Prussia appears to diverge farther and farther daily. Some very angry articles have appeared in the Viennese Botschafter and Morgenpost, declaring that Austria is losing all her influence with the secondary States of Germany by her servile acquiescence in Prussian arrogance, and demanding a speedy solution from the Cabinet of Vienna of the difficulties which will now shortly arise in the Duchies. Thus much is known, that the Austrian troops have received orders to leave Jutland immediately, while Prussian officers have been sent to organise the national army of Slesvig-Holstein. After the signature of the treaty of peace, a Prussian division will be left in the Duchies, consisting of four regiments of infantry, two of cavalry, and two brigades of artillery. There are reports of a ministerial crisis in Vienna, and it is believed that Count Rechberg will tender his resignation on account of the present complicated state of foreign policy. In one point of view Austria has been successful; M. Pleuer has succeeded in some way or other in getting his loan of 90,000,000*l.* accepted; 30,000,000*l.* of it, however, are to be raised by a tax loan, a process apparently similar to the 'benevolences' of the times of the Tudors. M. Pleuer has gained some credit by his skilful management of this affair, which was generally believed to be hopeless. Austria has been blessed with a very good harvest, but the people complain that there is not a corresponding diminution in the prices. The seat of the commercial conference is to be removed from Prague to some other city not yet named, and Saxony and Bavaria are to take part in the future discussions along with Austria and Prussia. The Cabinet of Vienna intends before the reopening of the Conference to elicit from Prussia a clear and precise statement of the bases on which she intends to negotiate. Mr. Ward, the English Consul at Hamburg, went to Berlin to frame a new system of commercial relations with the reconstituted Zollverein, but was met with the answer that since the conclusion of the new treaty and the admission of other German States to the benefit of it, Prussia could no longer negotiate in her own name. A meeting has been arranged between the Emperor of Russia and the King of Prussia at Darmstadt, and again another at Berlin, later in the year, when the Emperor returns from Nice to St. Petersburg.

A renewal of the Constitutional contest in Prussia seems imminent; lulled to sleep, or rather smothered, for a time by the Danish war, it rises again with fresh vigour upon the restoration of peace. Parliament must meet on January 13, but no royal ordinance on the subject has yet appeared. There is plenty of work for them when they do meet; estimates will have to be voted, and thus the vexata quæstio of the reorganisation of the army will again be brought upon the boards. There will, of course, be long debates on the Slesvig-Holstein question, in connection with the loan which Government will demand, and the increase of the budget for the navy will also create discussion. Some skirmishing has already gone on between the organs of the Government and the Liberal party, which shows that neither side is inclined to concede an inch. The result of the whole business will of course be a dissolution beyond which no eye can at present pierce.

SWITZERLAND.

A daring and outrageous attack has been made upon the diligence running over Monte Cenere, between Bellinzona and Lugano, in the canton of Ticino. One of the passengers was mortally wounded, and the luggage of the rest was utterly ransacked; the Federal mails were also plundered. The police are on the tracks of the assassins.

GREECE.

A new Constitution is being discussed by the Chamber of Deputies; several articles have been carried with regard to the throne and the regency, of which the following are the most important and interesting:—

Art. 45. The Greek crown and its constitutional rights are hereditary, and descend to the immediate legitimate issue of King George I., in the order of primogeniture, male issue having the preference.

Art. 46. In default of a successor to the throne, one is to be chosen by the King, with the assent of two-thirds of the deputies.

Art. 47. Every successor to the Greek crown must profess the creed held by the Eastern orthodox Christian Church.

Art. 48. The crown of Greece and that of any other State can never descend to one and the same individual.

Art. 52. In case of the throne becoming vacant, the Chamber shall assemble without being convoked, and nominate a Greek citizen as provisional Regent. The Ministerial Council will exercise the royal authority in the name of the nation until the Regent takes the oath. Within two months at latest an equal number of representatives to the number of deputies shall be chosen by the people, who, together with the Chamber, shall then elect the new King, in which a majority of at least two-thirds of the entire number shall be decisive.

In addition to these a bill, introducing universal suffrage, has been voted. An unsuccessful attempt was made on the 11th inst. to assassinate the Minister of the Interior. Earl Russell has favoured the Greek Cabinet with one of the lectures for which his name will be for ever notorious; in it he condemns the anarchical demonstrations in Greece, and is especially severe upon a party calling itself 'the English party;' in the name of England he repudiates all factions. He further states, 'that in case of necessity England would, in conjunction with France and Russia, take measures for the maintenance of order and the strengthening of the reigning dynasty.'

SPAIN.

The election of the new Chambers is just now exciting much interest. The Government appear to be acting in a liberal and straightforward manner. Señor Gonzalez Bravo, the Minister of the Interior, has addressed a circular to the governors of provinces, recommending them strictly to observe the law, and to allow to every man the free and uncontrolled use of his electoral rights. The Progressist party asked and obtained leave to hold a public meeting under the presidency of Señor Olozaga, at which a committee was appointed including the names of General Espartero, General Prim, Señores Olozaga and Madoz. Some of the journals urge the Government not to remain aloof from the arrangements tending to guarantee the independence of the States of the Pope, which must be under the guarantee of Europe if the French quit Rome. By advices from Santo Domingo the former favourable reports are confirmed. The chiefs of the revolution have retired to Hayti, and were making proposals to the Spanish generals for the termination of the war.

PORTUGAL.

Can a constitutional party become extinct? Or, to vary the terms of the problem, can a constitution survive the extinction of one of its component parts? In old times we know pretty well that it was impossible. If a Cæsar destroyed the party of a Pompey, or an Octavian drove an Antony out of the field, his next step was to establish a despotism. The question arises now in Portugal. According to the Official Gazette, the Conservative party in that country is absolutely extinct. It goes on to state that 'a political transformation is therefore inevitable, the Reform party taking up the position of the Progressist party, and the Government remaining Progressists.' This is puzzling. Some one is evidently going to play at being Opposition, to devote himself to the ungrateful task for the sake of Constitution. Thus much is evident. But which side is to be the victim, whether the Reform party are going on the Opposition benches, or the Government mean to oppose themselves, is a problem for Lord Dundreary himself.

RUSSIA.

The Invalide Russe publishes a long article on the emigration of the Caucasians, of which the substance is somewhat as follows. The conquest of the Caucasus was determined in 1859; the plan originally fixed upon for the maintenance of order in the conquered country was first the dislodgment of the tribes from their mountain fastnesses, and next the establishment of military colonies of Cossacks on the plains which the conquered people would then be forced to inhabit. A habit had arisen among the Caucasians, even before the Russian war, of making family pilgrimages to Mecca; on the restoration of peace the custom increased to so alarming an extent that the governors were ordered to reduce it to the number of eighty families per year at most. Upon the advance of the Russians in 1859, the tribes flocked down to the coast in myriads, determined to take refuge in Turkey, on the same principle on which the former small emigrations had been conducted; the results were epidemic, famine, and disappointment. The tribes who had remained in the country submitted quietly to the Russians rather than undergo the perils of emigration. But, strange to say, the further advance of the Russian arms in 1863 was again, as on the former occasions, met by a sudden wild emigration; on this occasion no fears seem to have been strong enough to restrain the people. The Russians did a good deal for them: they provided them to a certain extent with food, passage-money, and medical attendance; but how inadequate the supplies were to meet the necessities of the case we know from the history of the last six months. The statistics of emigration during the first six months of this year give 230,718 as the number of emigrants from the borders of the Caucasus. Previous to this year about 400,000 souls have left Circassia and taken refuge in Turkey.

A strange affair lately happened in the town of Orel. A proprietor in the neighbourhood was to receive the sum of 4,300*l.* through the police-office of the town. On applying for it he was told that he could not receive it unless he presented the office with 500*l.* He immediately reported the case to St. Petersburg, and the money was thereupon paid over to him. On the same evening four men rushed into his study, their faces covered with black crape, and demanded his money. He had time, however, to seize a revolver and shoot two of the thieves; the others took to their heels. Judge of the surprise of himself and the police, whom he immediately summoned, to find, on taking off the crape masks from the two corpses, that the men were no other than the head of the police and his secretary!

ALGIERS.

Another smart engagement took place on the 29th and 30th ult. between the Arabs under Si-Lalla and the French column under General Jolivet. The general gives a lively and neat account of the affair, which must have been singularly exciting. He had gone to the head of his column after a very fatiguing day's march, partly to trace out the camp for the night and partly to send water back to his exhausted men from the well which they were approaching. Scarcely had he despatched a large part of his cavalry on this mission when an immense body of Arabs made their appearance on the neighbouring hills, and, rushing down upon him, completely cut off his communication with the main body: he was left with a body of barely 100 horsemen to contend against masses of natives. For an hour and a half the struggle was kept up. The general watched anxiously for the main body to arrive; but the ammunition of the little band began to fail before the head of the column came in sight. When at last they came, so straggling was the appearance of the main column that the Arabs left their sorely-tried foes to fasten upon what seemed to be even an easier prey. But the energy of the general was infused into his troops; again the Arabs were beaten off, and the soldiers allowed to form their camp in peace. The loss of the French in this gallant affair was 82 killed and 27 wounded, the proportion of the two showing the severity of the conflict. The Arabs lost upwards of 400 men. Si-Lalla, shortly after this, burnt the village of Sidi-Ali-ben-Youb under the very nose of the troops, and nearly succeeded in capturing the caravanserai. The general success of the French arms, however, has made a great impression on the natives, many of whose tribes are returning peaceably to their cantonments.

CHINA AND JAPAN.

The Taepings have lost the great city of Nankin, but are not yet extinguished; a party of them defeated a strong division of Imperialists on August 3. Under these circumstances the Government at Pekin has determined to continue the service of the Franco-Chinese corps, under Lieutenant d'Aigueville; that officer has accordingly been enrolling Europeans at Shanghai for a two years' service.

The united fleets of England, Holland, and France, have determined to force a passage into the inland sea past the batteries of Prince Nagato. It is expected that some resistance will be made, and some land forces have accordingly been summoned from China to support the naval movements; among them is a regiment of Beloochees, natives of the district adjoining Afghanistan.

SOUTH AMERICA.

A commercial crisis has occurred at Rio Janeiro in consequence of the failure of the banking firm of M. Soute, and other similar mischances.

The Government has decreed the suspension of cash payments for notes by the Bank of Brazil, and has given a forced currency to the bank's paper.

War has been declared between Brazil and Uruguay.

At Lima the popular tendencies are towards a reconciliation with Spain. The Government declare that they can now proceed with confidence, since there is a prospect of internal concord in Peru. They are willing to try all lawful means of pacification with Spain, but they refuse to give in to the principle involved in the seizure of the Chincha islands.

Señor Garcia Moreno, the President of the Republic of Ecuador, has taken the very decided step of declaring himself Dictator, and trying, condemning, and executing his rival and enemy, General Maldonado. For these acts he pleads, on the one hand, that the very existence of the republic was threatened by internal dissensions and foreign usurpations, and that consequently strong measures were needed in remedy; and, on the other hand, he shows that General Maldonado had lately made an attempt to assassinate him, which was luckily unsuccessful. The energetic course taken by the President has not been unfavourably received by the nation.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

New York: October 4, 1864.

The mail closes to-morrow morning too early for your correspondent to be able to say anything of the news which may be in from Virginia, where General Grant is delivering the blow which has been so mysteriously announced from time to time, for a week or two, as about to drive Lee into the entrenchments of Richmond and overwhelm him there. The Northern people seem to have been worked up again into a full belief that now Grant is going to succeed without fail. The telegraphic reports of the skirmishes preliminary to the grand attack read very like those with which the first battles of Grant, after he crossed the Rapidan, were announced to the Northern people as great victories, and welcomed by Mr. Lincoln with a solemn proclamation recommending a Te Deum for victory in all the churches. A little examination, however, shows that the Union troops have won a skirmish and seized some outwork of little value at an enormous cost of life, and that every foot of advance upon Richmond is to be won, if won at all, by dashing columns of men against well-defended breastworks, bristling at every point with artillery.

There are various rumours, from different sources, that General Sheridan in the ardour of his pursuit has got so far into the Valley of the Shenandoah as to find difficulty in getting back, and has sustained a defeat, but when, and to what degree, is not mentioned. But it is worth noticing that no mention has been made of the extent of his losses in the late battles in the Valley. All accounts of these are suppressed in the reports of the Government. The World newspaper of this morning gives an idea of how his army was handled in a statement, from private sources, that there are two thousand 'badly wounded' Federal soldiers in the hospital at Winchester, and twelve hundred slightly wounded had been sent to Baltimore. An aggregate of 3,200 in the single item of disabled by wounds shows how furiously the battle must have been contested.

Farragut has not taken Mobile, but has been sent round to try and take Wilmington.

Sherman is fortifying himself in Atlanta, and is much troubled about his communications, which are harassed by the Confederates to such an extent as to cause a good deal of uneasiness at Washington about his position. Except at fortified places, and along the lines of roads, which are guarded by large bodies of troops, the whole country in his rear, up to the Mississippi River, is in the possession of Confederates; and Forrest, Wheeler, and Roddy roam very much as they please, capturing towns and breaking up railroads. At the latest accounts they were about making a junction in force, which will require extraordinary exertions on the part of Sherman to keep himself supplied and stay in Atlanta in the vicinity of Hood's army, the command to which Beauregard has been assigned, and with the announcement of that change the spirits of the Southern people rose from temporary depression into confidence.

West of the Mississippi the Confederates have recovered Texas, Louisiana, and Arkansas, with the exception of a few garrisoned places, and a large force, under Sterling Price, is invading Missouri, finding supplies and recruits there, and frightening the Federals for the safety even of St. Louis.

The domestic controversy in the North is developing some strange traits of party and politics. The summary processes by which the votes of the border States are to be made sure for Mr. Lincoln have been put in force in Maryland. It was insultingly said in the Baltimore correspondence of the New York Tribune, a few days ago, that no ticket would be permitted to be voted for in Maryland which is not friendly to Mr. Lincoln. The impudent boast of the partisan was but the forewarning of the measures of violence to come.

The experiment of carrying the Border-State elections by this direct application of force is an audacious one. But audacity in usurpation has succeeded thus far. Why should it not continue to be successful in this crisis of the struggle for the perpetuation of power, for which a great majority of the Northern people have made and are making so many sacrifices of honour, and liberty, and rights?

As it is with Maryland so it will be with all the border States. Mr. Lincoln holds the thirty-two votes of Delaware, Maryland, Western Virginia, Kentucky, and Missouri, as absolutely in his hand to-day as if the vote had been cast, and the certificate made out. The Democrats see this, but are powerless to prevent it. Their hope is to make out of these transactions such a case of palpable fraud upon the elective franchise, such flagrant outrage upon the liberties of the people, such an audacious usurpation of military power for the purpose of seizing the supreme authority against the will of the people as will alarm the voters of the North, and create an indignant uprising here, which will overthrow the schemers in the very success of their schemes. The mockery which their appeals meet with among the oracles of the majority does not yet show any sign of fear for any formidable reaction. There are occasional protests made by devoted party friends against the indiscretion of these acts, and a few individuals among the dominant party openly censure them, but the great ruling masses of the party are apparently unmoved.

The friends of the Administration are not satisfied with the application of the military pressure by the Government against its adversaries, but have provided for a secret military organisation among themselves. The 'loyal leagues' (so called) throughout the country have been long known to be secretly armed. Indeed, it is one of the conditions of membership that every man shall provide himself with arms. The following is one of the series of resolutions just adopted by the General Council of the Loyal League Clubs of this State. It is part of the general organisation of councils in States where the Democrats have been disarmed by the State authorities and authorities of the Federal Government, by seizing such arms as they had provided for themselves, and making the introduction of arms and ammunition into those States, except by direct permit of the Government, contraband:—

'Resolved: That we earnestly recommend and urge upon the subordinate councils to organise military companies within their several bodies, to arm and drill with the utmost diligence, and with great caution, that no unnecessary occasion of offence be given our enemies.

By the State Council,
Isaac M. Schermerhorn, President.

Oliver T. Beard, Secretary.

These are ominous preparations for overawing the people at the polls, to be backed, as they will be, by the regular troops of the Government, if resistance should provoke disturbance. General Wallace's rule will then come in, that the people ought to be made to stay away from the polls if their coming to vote provokes violence.

The social condition of the Border States resulting from this war passes all comprehension of those who do not hear verbally the tales of eye-witnesses that cannot get into print. In whole counties and large sections of States the restraints of law are utterly disregarded. Bands of armed men range about, plundering and burning houses, and shooting or hanging objects of their animosity with as little remorse as they used to go out hunting wild animals. Desperadoes get up these gangs, now in the name of Confederates, harrying and robbing and murdering Unionists, now in the name of Unionists, waylaying travellers on the highway, and shooting them down as rebels, or firing their dwellings at midnight, and slaughtering all who attempt to escape from the flames. Thousands thus made homeless and despairing turn marauders themselves, and civil war thus creates bands of roving banditti, who know no other impulse than revenge and plunder. Missouri and Kentucky swarm with such ruffians, that abuse the name of both sides by pretending to belong to one or the other, while indiscriminately preying on both as opportunity offers. A fearful example of what state of things is thereby created in the wild Western districts is told in a late number of the Chicago Times, giving an account of one Bill Anderson, chief of a gang in Missouri, which captured a Federal train at Centralia, and afterwards shot twenty-four Iowa and Missouri soldiers who were prisoners. The Times says: 'Anderson told citizens whom he released that he was not a secessionist, but that Federal troops a year ago killed his father in Jackson County, ravished his two sisters, and put them in the female prison in Kansas City, and then burned down the building, destroying them by the flames. Also, that his mother died of grief. He swore that, as long as he lived, he would kill every man he met in Federal uniform. His lieutenant is young Beckham, whose brothers and sisters were murdered in Obion country by negro soldiers.'

The whole of South-western and Western Missouri teems with tales of just such outrages as made Bill Anderson mad,—and not of one side but of both sides—and of the wretches who have only their own bad instincts and villanous propensities to prompt them. How many years would it be, in a state of profound peace, before such a population could be made to sit down again peaceably with each other, or what would be the cost and the toil, and for how long, before order can be made to rule again? As it is in these districts of Missouri, so it is in all those States, and portions of States, where the population was divided originally in political sentiment, and the contending armies have alternately driven each other out, the victors when in possession giving license to persecute the conquered.

The monthly report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the 1st inst. has been published at Washington, and a telegraphic abstract received here. I copy from it the following statement of the condition of the public debt on September 30:—

	Debt	Interest
Bearing interest in coin .	$923,085,941	$54,608,445
,, .. ,, currency	564,585,874	27,170,197
Interest ceased . . .	356,970
Without interest . .	467,944,929
	$1,955,973,714	$81,778,643

The report for July 28, the last I have seen previously, gave the gross amount of debt at $1,805,523,564, showing an actual increase of $150,450,152 within thirty-four days, an increase of over $4,400,000 a day. A large part of this increase is made by the paying off of the arrearages of pay due to the army, which will help to put them in better humour about election time. Unpaid requisitions have been reduced about $45,000,000; but the accumulations cannot be kept down, for certificates of indebtedness have increased about $27,000,000. The general result is as stated. The expansion of the currency appears to be covered up in this abstract by counting the interest-bearing notes, which are used so extensively as currency, among the interest-bearing debts, as though they were funded.

The Secretary of the Treasury is out with a proposal for a new loan of $40,000,000 in five-twenty 6 per cent. gold-bearing bonds, the proposals to be opened on the 14th inst. It is but a small instalment of what he wants.

The drafting is going on in various localities, but the success is not by any means what is wanted for the purposes of Government. The roads are filled with fugitives rushing away from the draft—thousands of them crowding into Her Majesty's Canadian dominions. The wheel turns out the required names; but to find them and get them passed, and to organise them, is another part of the work of which the results are not so propitious. The Government finds it a very slow process; for a new and pressing order is out from the Secretary of War, which calls for renewed efforts to obtain volunteers, for the purpose of enabling General Sherman to maintain his position and carry out his further plans. In fact, the spirit for fighting, and the material for renewing armies in the North, are well-nigh worn out. It may be reasonably doubted whether all the recruits and conscripts raised under the last call will repair the losses by casualties of battle and sickness in the Federal armies since May. The calculations of Grant and the War Department are, that the South is still more exhausted, and must give in soonest. Everything is staked on the result of the new movements which Grant is making towards Richmond, which have commenced with a gleam of success that already seems to intoxicate the Northern brain with visions of a speedy end to the war.

This drafting has its grotesque incidents. The people of Hudson, in this State, made up a purse with which to pay bounties for recruits with which to fill their quota, and sent a committee down to Virginia to engage discharged soldiers. They effected their object, engaged their men, and paid out their money. Returning home with their recruits, Mosby overtook them, captured the party, and sent the committee home without followers and penniless; and the paying patriots must pay over again or stand the draft.

Another party of substitute hunters has come to grief in Canada. Several wealthy young men from Ontario, to secure their personal exemption from fighting, went over into Canada, but thought to make compensation by engaging Canadians to come over and do the real work. One of them had succeeded in hiring a Canadian, when the authorities arrested him for violating the British law against foreign enlistments, and have convicted him. The newspapers say he has been sentenced to eighteen years' imprisonment. If this be not a mistake for eighteen months, it is doubtless preliminary to a pardon—the sentence being for a caution to others.

Such items as the following are not very encouraging to men who have to go and fight on compulsion. It is a summary, made up by some curious hand, of the fortunes of the volunteers who went out originally to the wars as three-years men. Of seventeen regiments whose term has expired, and which have returned home, the original number was 37,001, the number which came back is 4,375, not one in eight! What a suggestive record of wholesale slaughter!

Among local incidents here is the veto of Major Gunther, on the resolution of the Common Council to have a general illumination in honour of the late Federal successes in arms. It shows Major Gunther to be a peace man of the most unequivocal and uncompromising cast; and a bold man, too, to proclaim such rational, civilised, and Christian sentiments, in the face of two infuriated parties who are rivalling each other in their demands for more blood, if the Southern people will not consent to their own disgrace and enslavement. There are many thousands who think with him, but will not dare to open their mouths to sustain him, assailed as he is for speaking unseasonably for a discountenanced truth.

LETTER FROM RICHMOND.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Richmond: August 26, 1864.

The situation in front of Petersburg has undergone some change during the past week. For the first time Grant's clever strategy has enabled him to gain some slight advantage—an exceptional circumstance, which the reader may feel assured the United States authorities and newspapers will make the most of possible. Having made his works in front of Petersburg so strong that they could be held for a time by a small force, Grant sent a heavy column across James River to his right, and as soon as he discovered that General Lee had detached a suitable force to contest his advance upon Richmond, if such was his design, he threw another heavy column against the Weldon Railway on his extreme left. Both of these demonstrations were intended to be feints or real attacks as circumstances might determine. If Lee should neglect the movement on the north side of the James, under the impression that it was made—like that on July 30, when the mine was sprung—to deceive him, then an earnest effort with an adequate force would be made to reach the capital, or at all events to turn the fortifications on the river, and if possible reduce them. If, on the contrary, Hancock's column on the north side of the river was met by a force sufficient to hold it in check and defeat any attempt he might make against Richmond, then the second column under Warren, which did not move for three or four days after the first had crossed the river, would march rapidly against the railway four miles below Petersburg, immediately entrench itself, and prepare to hold it until Hancock could be brought back from the north side of the James. Events took the latter direction, and the real attack or movement was made on the railway on the left.

To be more explicit: finding that his passage of the James had not escaped Lee, and that the latter confronted him with a sufficient force, not only to frustrate his designs, but to beat him in action, Grant, on the night of the 18th, ordered Warren to move out and occupy the Weldon Road, and fortify his position. As soon as the movement was discovered, Beauregard (Lee being on the north side of the James) directed Lieutenant-General Hill to proceed with Mahone's and Heth's divisions and dislodge the enemy. Hill encountered Warren's superior force at 3 P.M. on the 19th, drove him back down the railway about a mile, inflicted a heavy loss upon him, including 2,400 able prisoners and about 800 wounded who fell into his hands, his own casualties footing up not quite 600. For some reason, the fight was not renewed until Sunday the 21st, before which time Warren had been reinforced by the greater part of Hancock's troops, and had thrown up three lines of breastworks, the inner one of which was very strong. When Beauregard moved against him, therefore, at 9 A.M. on the 21st, with a slightly increased force, he found it impossible to drive him away. He beat him back out of the first two lines, and pushed him into the third; but here he found his position so strong—his lines extending across the railroad through a level field, and his flanks and rear protected as effectually as his front—that he determined to recall his troops, who had already suffered considerably. His loss on the 21st, however, did not exceed 800 men, including 200 prisoners taken from Hagood's South Carolina brigade. In the thickest of the fight, a Federal colonel seized the colours of a South Carolina regiment, and demanded a surrender. This, Hagood, who happened to be near at hand, declined to do, and called upon the Yankee to lay down his arms, which was also declined; whereupon the two officers engaged in mortal combat, their respective commands pausing meanwhile from their work of death to witness the conflict. The result is soon told; the Yankee was slain by the gallant Carolinian, and the colours brought off. The brave Brigadier-General Saunders of Alabama was killed on the 21st, the femoral artery having been severed by a Minié ball.

Grant still holds possession of the Weldon Railway. His picket line comes up to within two miles of the town. In thus extending his left wing he has stretched out his lines to a dangerous length, as he may find some day to his cost. The railway, though not without its convenience, is not indispensable to the Confederates. Up to a recent period it was a link in the only line by which they could move troops or draw supplies from the South Atlantic States; but since the completion of the Danville connection, they have a shorter, better, and less exposed route to their chief sources of supplies and men. Meanwhile Lee bides his time, waiting for the opportunity, which will almost surely come, when he can strike a blow that will end the campaign, and perhaps the war itself.

A telegram received from Mobile yesterday states that Fort Morgan had fallen. On the 23rd scouts from below reported that a large fire was seen at the fort, and that subsequently a loud explosion was heard, as if the magazine or the fort had been blown up. No further particulars have been received, so we are left in doubt whether that fine work was surrendered, blown up, or evacuated. It was believed that the attack upon the shore batteries and inner line of fortifications would be made at an early day. Reinforcements are crossing the Mississippi from the West, and it is believed they will reach Mobile in time to insure the safety of the place. The Federal column that was moving down through Northern Mississippi to cooperate in the attack has been forced by Forrest to retrace its steps. It seems that Forrest passed around this force and assaulted the works around Memphis, compelling Washburne and his staff to beat a hasty retreat into the city in their night-clothes in order to save themselves. Their camp and baggage fell into the hands of the bold Confederate chieftain. Major-General Frank Gardner is in command at Mobile, and Lieutenant-General Maury, lately promoted, has been placed in command of the Department of Mississippi until Lieutenant-General Taylor can bring his forces across the river and get them in position. In all the vast region lying beyond the Father of Waters hardly an enemy is to be found. The last Yankee has disappeared from Texas, and that notable invasion by way of the Rio Grande and Brownsville is an utter and costly failure.

LETTER FROM NASSAU.

NASSAU, BAHAMAS: September 26, 1864.

SINCE my last communication we have had nothing of striking moment here, but I am glad to report a great improvement in our prospects for the winter months. The scourge of yellow fever has almost disappeared, and merchants are rapidly finding their way back again. During the last ten days we have had quite a fleet of steamers in our harbour. Four have successfully run in from the beleaguered Charleston, and their handsome cargoes of cotton have put new life into the 'cotton gang.'

A remarkable feature in the development of the resources of the colony has at last taken a wider range, and after the small production of late years, Bahama cotton is now likely to show in the market. Several estates from 50 to 300 acres have been planted, and put under careful cultivation. The staple hitherto obtained is of fine quality, and will be appreciated by the Lancashire manufacturers.

The loss of the entrance to Mobile and the occupation of Atlanta, though discouraging to the Southern exiles here, has not abated their faith and hope in the ultimate triumph of their cause; and if the news this morning by way of Havana respecting the movements of General Kirby Smith's command be correct, Sherman will find his quarters in Atlanta anything but desirable.

The closing of Mobile will throw more business into Nassau, and our phantom commerce of the next few months is sure to be very lively, while in the North they are settling the question of the elections.

Among the finest steamers that have visited us is the Ella, a perfect model of a boat, admirably adapted for her traffic. The fine steamer Agnes Louise has been unaccountably, some say disgracefully, run on the rocks close to the Lighthouse, and has defied all efforts to get her off.

I shall hand you a list of arrivals by next mail.

THE MASSACHUSETTS SLAVE AND SLAUGHTER COMPANY.

THE following letter appears in the Courrier des Etats Unis:—

SIR,—I have the honour to make known to you a circumstance similar to that which I read in your issue of Wednesday.

The ship Guerland, that left Anvers for Boston with 251 passengers, hired as working-men, arrived on the 29th August, and anchored within a half-hour's sail of the port. She was there joined by three steamers, on board of which were Federal soldiers. The French and Belgian passengers who, according to the promise given by the agents, were to have received in advance, besides their passage, the sum of five hundred francs and the ordinary weekly wages, were called upon to sign an agreement in English, which was no other than articles of enlistment. They were informed that, they were no longer entitled to rations on board, and that after having signed, they would be transferred to the steamers that would conduct them to the place where they were to work, and where dinner awaited them. They insisted upon being landed in Boston, but this was categorically refused. After resisting for twenty-four hours (for they feared some deception), impelled by hunger and surrounded by soldiers, the greater portion, that is two hundred and twenty, signed and were transported to the fort, where they were compelled to put on the uniform, in despite of their protestations. Three of those who had signed, a Frenchman and two Belgians, persisted in their refusal to march, and were put in irons on a neighbouring island; they are probably still there. They are Sincrit, the Frenchman, and Albreght and Verheyden, Belgians. The remaining thirty-one refused to sign in defiance of threats, and were landed in Boston at their own expense, whence they started for New York. They are almost in a state of destitution.

Thus the agent, or rather the purveyor, of the Black Republican butchers of the North must have pocketed one hundred dollars per man, which makes a round sum, and they will tell us that the administration at Washington is not in complicity with this infamous traffic. It seems to me that these things, so often repeated, should open the eyes of European powers, and that the Government of Mr. Lincoln should be called upon, not only to prevent this traffic and to punish its authors, but also to liberate all its victims. Heaven alone knows how many they are, and how many are yet alive.

Make what use you please of this letter.

AUGUSTE DE MONTARGIS.

P.S.—The facts I have related are based upon authentic depositions, and two witnesses known to me are still here, Messrs. Michiels and Seray.

THE BARBARITIES IN KENTUCKY.—The following is an extract from a private letter recently received by a gentleman in Manchester from a resident in Kentucky, with reference to the atrocities committed in that State by General Paine:—'We have been "through the mill" since my last to you, and we are truly thankful that we are living. If there ever was a demon let loose among men, women, and children, we have had him in command at this post. Houses have been sacked and the contents sent north to the homes of these scamps who profess to be fighting for principle; taxes have been levied to the amount of $800,000 in this district (more than is in private hands or the banks of this place); tenants were notified to pay no more rents to property owners, but to pay to this ever-grasping monster, General Paine. This same fellow violated our mails and opened the letters, using any evidence he could glean as an instrument and a pretence to grasp what money or property the writers or receivers of said obnoxious letters were possessed of. Our guard-houses have been crowded for weeks with men against whom no charges were made, but who, from malice or because it was convenient, were put out of the way while our barbarous enemies practised their nefarious theory—"no submission; nothing but annihilation." In fifty-six days there were sixty-seven men shot without trial, judge, or jury, and many without any charge being preferred. Many coming into town to try to get out family supplies to preserve life have been put in prison, and some allowed to go home by paying what money they had. Expeditions have been sent out to burn and destroy. Mills, even, on which the people depended to get their corn ground, have been burned, and some have to go from twenty-five to thirty miles to get a little wheat ground to make bread. I cannot pretend to give you anything like a detailed account of the atrocities committed by these devils in human shape.'

THE POWER OF THE SOUTH.

EUROPE refuses to recognise the South because of her weakness. The North refuses to recognise the South because of her strength. The following is an extract from the New York Times:—

The skilful and pertinacious resistance which the slaveholders have made only proves how formidable a power of evil they will be if allowed to establish themselves as a nation.' So observes that profound political philosopher, J. Stuart Mill, in a private letter to a friend in this city. It is a pregnant truth. There are not a few men who make the fierceness and stubbornness with which this war is kept up by the rebels reasons for abandoning it; when in truth they are the very strongest of all reasons for our maintaining it to the very last limit of our endurance.

If secession were simply the subtraction of certain territory from our national area, it would be comparatively a slight evil. We should have territory enough left for the development of the mightiest of nations. Again, if secession involved only the juxtaposition of a comparatively weak Republic at the south of us, it would be a correspondingly small evil. A weak nation right under the shadow of a strong one is always really subordinate, notwithstanding its so-called sovereignty. The policy of the United States would still be the controlling policy of the continent. It is precisely because the 'Confederate States,' if possessed of independence, will not be feeble, but will be a gigantic Power of tremendous strength and imperious will, that we are called upon to do our very utmost to resist that independence.

The rebels have exhibited a most wonderful energy and skill in carrying on their struggle. No people on the face of the earth ever made so hard a fight with such limited means. It is difficult to say which has been the most extraordinary—their organising or their fighting capacity. Either, three years ago, would have been deemed incredible. Ninety able-bodied men out of every hundred within their limits they have placed in their armies, when the highest attainable proportion in all previous wars has been held to be twenty out of every hundred. These armies have been armed, equipped, clothed, and fed in a most serviceable way from what seemed the most meagre resources. In their actual warfare for three years they have displayed a combination of dash and endurance never before equalled in military history. All candid men, whatever their hatred of the rebellion, and whatever their admiration of our own heroic soldiers, are free to admit that the final triumph of our national armies will be due only to superiority in numbers.

The prolongation of the war, having thus fully brought out these prodigious military capacities of the Southern people, has fully established the necessity of a course of action which shall prevent their exercise against us hereafter. It has demonstrated that, at all costs, we must now so act that this people shall be in amity with us hereafter, and not in hostility; or, at all events, that their power to gratify hostility shall be reduced to the lowest degree possible. We of the North are a people devoted to industry. We want to give our undivided energies to the developement of all our matchless resources. We have neither time nor disposition to make fighting a business; and all our conditions of life are unfavourable to our becoming a military nation. A slaveholding Confederacy would be very differently situated in this respect. Its labour would be done by a servile black class. The body of its white people would be poor, unenterprising, and ignorant, just fit to be ruled by the slaveholding aristocracy, and to fill up great armies with which to fight its battles. And this aristocracy would surely have battles to fight. Its interests would be in constant collision with those of the free North, and its proud, imperious, unyielding temper would make the most of every cause for quarrel. There would be no earthly probability of our long remaining at peace with it, except by a constant submission, on our part, of a most degrading character. And yet, if we went to war, we should only have the same devilish skill and pertinacity, and fierceness, and cruelty to contend with that we have been encountering for the last three years, only all the more expanded and hardened. The contiguity of such a people, controlled by such influences, would be an insupportable curse.

FEDERAL BARBARITY.

(From the Richmond Enquirer, September 13.)

THE following letter, not written for publication, is from the daughter of a gentleman in Clarke County, Virginia, whose house was lately burned by the enemy.

Clarke County, Virginia, August 24, 1864.

My dearest Sisters, Since that terrible day that we were deprived of house and home, I have neither had time nor nerve to write to you, but now that an opportunity offers to let you hear of our personal safety, I must try to tell you of all that has befallen us. I feel almost frantic to think of it, and night and day the horrors of the scene are present with me. To-day, two weeks ago, my aunt, Mrs. S., was taken sick, and day after day she grew worse until on Thursday night, at half-past twelve o'clock, she breathed her last. Dear mother was with her and wrote immediately to father and myself to come, and just as I lighted the lamp to read the note the report of fire-arms reached our ears. I immediately extinguished the light, as we were surrounded by the enemy, and from what we had heard in the evening we conjectured the shots proceeded from the picket post which Mosby had attacked.

Of course, father and I could not go to mother until morning; he then went, and mother returned with him. Just at the moment of return sixty Yankees rode up to the house. One of their officers seized the horse mother rode, and demanded to know where she had been. Mother was completely overcome and could not answer. I replied, 'She is just from the deathbed of her sister, and if you have any heart or manly feeling tell me quietly your business, and I will attend to it.' He turned to father with an expression of fiendish delight on his countenance and said, 'I have orders to burn every house on your farm.' Father demanded the charges against him, and he (the captain) replied: 'Because Mosby murdered one of our pickets last night, and there was a light seen in this house, and we know Mosby came from this house.' We protested they had not, and told him the reason we had a light for a minute. Father then begged to be taken to General Custer as a hostage, and asked him to spare his house on account of his sick wife, sick son-in-law, and two helpless little infants. The captain replied, 'Men, to your work; take what you want and fire as you go.' 'Guard that man down here, and carry him up to headquarters.' 'That man' was my sick husband, and in my agony I fell on my knees to that brute and besought him to spare my sick husband and take me. With a mocking laugh at my request he sent his surgeon to examine him, and, thank God, the surgeon had a heart, and, instead of saying anything to Dr. B., said to me, 'Come, go with me, and I will help you to save some clothes.'

The house was then on fire, and the men plundering and firing as they went. My poor old father and myself went back to the captain, and besought him, for God's sake, to come and stop the men until we could get even a change of clothes. He replied, 'My presence is not needed;' and at last, when we began to throw some things out of the windows, and he thought he might pick up some valuables, he came up to the house. Nearly everything we threw out was stolen—clothes, jewellery, silver, and something of everything, they carried off. Some of them had bundles as large as a child before and behind them. One of them swore I should not take from the burning house my dear little boy Charlie, who was asleep, because they said he would grow up to be a rebel. I pushed by the man, and told him as soon as he was large enough I would put a gun in his hands and tell him of all we had suffered, and if he did not fight with an unequalled bravery he would not be my son. One of the brutes held my mother in the store-room while some others rifled it and set it on fire. One took me by the shoulders and threw me from the top to the bottom of the steps. The last time I was in the house I seized my box of jewellery; a man, or rather a devil, jerked it from me, and scattered the contents on the floor. I caught up one of my diamond rings, the bracelet sister C. gave me, the children's bracelets, and several other things, when the wretch seized me, and held me and got them from me.

In less than fifteen minutes the flames had enveloped the whole house. The labours of mother and father for thirty-three years were destroyed in fifteen minutes. They rifled father's secretary, where all his public and private papers were, and then set the pieces of furniture on fire.

The officers went off loaded with the richest part of the plunder. Not a carpet was saved, not a comfort, not a bureau, not a washstand, but one pitcher and basin. They stole two dozen handsome silver spoons, nearly all the jewellery belonging to mother and myself, twenty-six pairs of linen sheets and three hundred pounds of sugar were burned and stolen.

Oh! the worst is yet to be told. When the flames burst from every part of our dear old comfortable home, my darling mother's reason gave way. For twenty-four hours she was a raving maniac. She fainted away time after time, and after she became sensible, it would have touched a heart of stone to have witnessed her sorrow. She grieved for the home where her children had been born and bred and died, where she had seen sorrow and pleasure. Every corner and spot in it, and everything in it, was associated with some dear remembrance. My poor father bore it like a hero, and, with tears streaming down his face, said: 'Oh! my child, you have let the Yankees shake your confidence in God.' In my agony I had called out: 'Oh! God, why hast thou forsaken us?' Oh! no words can describe the horrors of that day. The next day (Saturday) we had to place the remains of my dear aunt in the grave without a word. The Vandals would not permit a minister to come out of Berryville or from the neighbourhood; we had to send to Loudon for a coffin and to put the grave in the garden. We had a supply of flour which could have been saved, but the wretches knocked the heads of the barrels out to prevent our moving it. The trunks containing the winter clothes were rifled: I lost nearly all my clothes.

What they did not carry off they set on fire. A handsome silk dress which mother had given me, and had been made but a few weeks, one of them took, and said 'he knew he was going to take that to his old woman.' I was reaching to the top of a press, getting down some house linen, when a demon took a large scrap-bag and two cambric wrappers and set them on fire just under me. I saw my danger, and sprang over to save my life, though now I feel the effects of the heated flames. Tell brother T. I fought for his picture, and when I found I could not save it I broke it to pieces. Some days afterwards mother and I went to General Custer's headquarters to try to recover some of father's papers and some of the silver. Of course we got none. But we told him of the conduct of his men and officers, and told him we would publish it to the world. They burned three houses; ours was the first. A short time after they left our house, Mosby passed by and overtook them, and killed, it is said, thirty of them. Even my purse was stolen, with every cent of money we had.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of THE INDEX, 13 Bouverie Street, E.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

Advertisements should be sent and Money Orders made payable to J. B. HOPKINS, INDEX Office.

The War.

IT appears to be admitted at Washington that GRANT's latest movement has proved a failure; that its results are utterly incommensurate with the losses incurred in achieving them; and that no substantial progress has been made towards the reduction of Petersburg or the capture of Richmond. Like every other advance it has developed defensive works, more formidable as they are nearer to the capital, and demonstrated only with more terrible accuracy how many thousands of Northern soldiers must bite the dust before that capital falls. General GRANT's tactics on this last occasion were almost a repetition of those which gained him his position on the Weldon Railroad. He had been very heavily reinforced with all the troops that Mr. STANTON could send on from the North, and is said to have had 100,000 effective men under his command. His position had been strengthened by the extension of the City Point Railway to Ream's Station, which enabled him to transfer troops rapidly to either wing, and this advantage, in addition to his superior numbers, gave him the opportunity for striking a sudden blow at any point in LEE's lines. Of the defences of Petersburg he had had experience enough. They were proved to be unassailable. It was arranged accordingly that an advance should take place almost simultaneously at the two extremities of LEE's position. With this view two whole corps were thrown rapidly across to the north bank of the James River under General BIRNEY, and marched directly upon the Confederate works. One of these corps took the river bank, and made for the fortifications about Chapin's Farm; the other took the direction of the Newmarket Road, with the object of capturing the strong position of Laurel Hill. The earlier operations of both corps were attended with some success. They found the outer defences weakly manned, and although the Confederates made a gallant stand and inflicted heavy losses upon their assailants, the latter steadily advanced. The most serious opposition at Chapin's Bluff was encountered at a work at the extremity of the fortifications of that important point, which was assaulted and carried under a heavy fire which cost the Federals dearly, General ORD, the commander of the corps, falling severely wounded, and General BURNHAM being killed on the spot. With the capture of this work the advance terminated. The Confederates made a determined effort to recapture it, but only succeeded in recovering one small redoubt. On the Newmarket Road the Federals met with a severe repulse. One or two small earthworks, scantily manned, they carried with a rush, though not without heavy losses. But the regular fortifications on Laurel Hill defied all their efforts. A division of negro troops was ordered up to the assault, and it fared as badly as all assaulting columns of black soldiers have fared during the war. Drawn up in front, driven to destruction, in all probability having as much to dread from a retreat as from the advance, the negroes in dense columns reached the ditch of the redoubt, some twelve feet deep, and then the butchery commenced. Of 2,000 living men who jumped into that ditch, writes a correspondent, not fifty returned alive. The advance was checked. The Federals had sufficiently tested the strength of the Richmond works, and the whole corps fell back upon the works carried earlier in the day. General BIRNEY's attack cost the Northern army some 3,000 killed and wounded. Its chief result was the discovery that north of the James River, as at Petersburg, siege operations of the most tedious and unpromising character would be necessary. How little the Confederates suffered may be appreciated from the fact that they fought under cover, and that two or three days later they were strong enough to assume the offensive, to rout KANTZ's division on BIRNEY's right with the loss of all his artillery, and even attack BIRNEY's whole corps. It is reported that the whole of the force, with the exception of the troops holding the fort at Chapin's Farm, that crossed the James River had at the latest date rejoined the main army. If this be so, we may conclude that GRANT has for the present abandoned the direct advance upon Richmond. But the expedition across the James River was only part of his programme. Almost simultaneously with the attacks upon Laurel Hill and Chapin's Bluff, General MEADE extended his left towards the South Side Railway, by which LEE obtained the bulk of his supplies. On this occasion he was not so fortunate as at Ream's Station. He carried one weak line of entrenchments, but at a considerable loss; for the Confederates, taking advantage of the gap caused by the extension of his line, fell upon the 9th Corps and doubled it up, capturing some 1,700 men, and throwing the whole force into confusion. Finally, MEADE found his advance checked by strong works heavily armed and manned, covering the South Side Railroad. And thus the fighting ended, with an admitted loss of some 6,000 men on the Federal side, leaving GRANT practically no nearer to Richmond than he was a month back, and the morale of his army suffering from one more potent defeat. The operations of GRANT's troops were doubtless intended to facilitate SHERIDAN's advance, but they failed in this respect also. SHERIDAN, flushed with success, had advanced against Broom's Gap, and been repulsed; and at the latest date had fallen back upon Harrisonburg, acting entirely on the defensive. In the meantime EARLY had been reinforced, and felt himself perfectly able to prevent SHERIDAN's further progress up the Shenandoah Valley, or across the Blue Ridge Mountains. Guerillas were cutting off the Federal supplies, and cutting off couriers, and it seemed very unlikely that SHERIDAN would be able to maintain his position in the Valley. When it is borne in mind that these results are drawn from purely Northern sources, that scarcely a line of news from the Confederacy is allowed to be reproduced in the Northern papers, and that LINCOLN's hopes of re-election rest on a good show of victories during the month of October, the prospect can hardly be deemed encouraging to the North.

But if in Virginia Northern armies make little or no progress, in the South-west the Northern cause is daily losing ground. Notwithstanding the studied obscurity of Mr. STANTON's telegrams, it is certain that SHERMAN's communications are in serious peril. It seems to be beyond a doubt that FORREST's and WHEELER's forces have effected a junction north of Atlanta, that the State of Tennessee is overrun by Confederate cavalry, and that no Federal train is safe in passing through that State, or in running from Chattanooga to Atlanta. It is true that Federal unofficial reports claim a victory over FORREST at Allatoona, and that other accounts represent him as driven to the Tennessee River, and prevented from crossing by Federal gunboats. But it turns out that the Confederate force which captured Big Shanty and was engaged at Allatoona was a portion of HOOD's army, which is said to have been operating to get upon SHERMAN's communications; and between this column and FORREST's cavalry there was a distance of 100 miles. Even according to Federal accounts, however, it is plain that the Confederates are in strong force at half a dozen points on SHERMAN's single line of railroad. We hear of them at Big Shanty, close to Marietta, at Dalton and Resaca, in Georgia; at Fayetteville and on the Nashville and Chattanooga Railway; on the Nashville and Louisville Railway, and fifteen miles south of Nashville, everywhere running off trains, capturing supplies, intercepting despatches. Whether HOOD's whole army has been thrown upon SHERMAN's line of communications we cannot venture to guess. Such a movement would be one of the boldest, and possibly one of the most decisive, of the war. But there is a strange contradiction between the despatches of General THOMAS, announcing Confederate defeats, and the reports of the Southern newspapers, which declare SHERMAN's position untenable; and time alone will show who is correct. All that we know is that at the latest date the bulk of HOOD's army was at West Point, west of Atlanta, striking northward. Another week or fortnight may elapse before we shall hear anything like the truth from the South-west. But in Missouri the truth cannot be denied. There the Federal prospects are most gloomy. General PRICE, in the possession of all the railways of the State, had appeared before Jefferson City with a force of 20,000 men; SHELLY was not far from him; MAGRUDER and KIRBY SMITH were, it is said, marching upon the last Federal garrison in Arkansas. It is quite probable that by this time a great battle has been fought involving the destiny of Missouri for many a year, and that Arkansas has been freed from the presence of the Northern invader. The struggle is intensifying in every quarter. But, despite the lying telegrams and other electioneering devices of Mr. LINCOLN's partisans, there is good reason to believe that the Confederacy has during the last month gained many substantial advantages.

Our Indian Empire.

ONCE upon a time King CHARLES II. paid a visit to Westminster School. He was received by the Head-Master of the day, and conducted over the establishment with all the honours due to majesty. In one point only the KING was surprised to see an apparent disrespect: the Doctor, with all his humility, never once took off his cap to the KING. His MAJESTY enquired the reason for such peculiar behaviour. 'Sire,' replied the Doctor, 'if my boys believed that even your MAJESTY is a greater man than I, I shall never keep them in order at all.' The present Governor of Madras, Sir WILLIAM DENISON, has been placed in charge of a vast district inhabited by a mixed population of Orientals, the majority of whom require the same treatment as schoolboys. This population he is busily engaged in ruling prudently with all his power, at the same time that he administers the laws of the Imperial Parliament of England to the British residents within his Presidency. Suddenly Sir CHARLES WOOD enters on the scene. Sir CHARLES WOOD, Indian Secretary, and temporary Emperor of India, without the courtesy or the goodhumour of the Merry Monarch, who willingly accepted the schoolmaster's reason given in our story, makes certain enactments, passes certain ordinances in the teeth of Sir WILLIAM DENISON's advice, without regard for Sir WILLIAM DENISON's credit or dignity in England or India. What will be the result of a course of policy conducted on this model? Will the words of the Westminster Head-master be fulfilled, and the degradation of the Governor in the eyes of his subjects be followed by a general disorder? or shall we gradually see the dignity of the office dwindle away on the refusal of all high-spirited men to accept so unworthy a post? Neither alternative is very satisfactory to contemplate.

Let us see what is the nature of the dispute between the Secretary and the Governor. Upon the amalgamation of the Royal and Company's armies, and the dethronement of the Leadenhall Street Company from the Empire of India, a certain number of English officers serving in the Sepoy regiments were thrown out of employment; to mitigate the hardship of this, the Government of the day, with the consent of Parliament, gave guarantees securing certain benefits to the local India officers. A few weeks ago, however, Sir CHARLES WOOD sent out certain instructions to the Governor, by which the benefits of the Parliamentary guarantee were considerably curtailed. What Sir WILLIAM DENISON, the Governor of Madras, thought of these instructions, we may gather from the latest Indian telegrams; they tell us that he refuses to carry out the instructions, on the ground that they are opposed to the Royal wishes, and are a flagrant violation of the guarantees given to the late Company's officers. This is pretty round talking. It means simply that one of two English Ministers has committed a crime for which, in the days of bluff King HARRY VIII, he would have lost his head without more ado. Either Sir C. WOOD is guilty of the offence imputed to him, and has given an important order directly contrary to the Royal wishes; or Sir W. DENISON has committed an act of insubordination which, in a country like India, is little short of mutiny. The question is now in the hands of the public. A final decision will of course not be arrived at before the receipt of fuller details; but we warn the Indian Secretary that the minds of the jury are decidedly prejudiced against him. The rule of the criminal courts not to mention previous convictions against a prisoner until he is again found guilty has no counterpart in the system of natural justice; and no man can think of Sir C. WOOD in his relations with India without remembering the names of LAING, of WILSON, and of TREVELYAN, three able men and valuable public officers, sacrificed to the jealousy and interference of the head of our Indian Office. In India, indeed, no further condemnation will be required than that which has already been passed by almost unanimous acclamation. Every mail teems with reports of the dissatisfaction prevailing in our Eastern Empire with the multitudinous, wearisome, vexatious, contradictory, supercilious regulations received from the Indian Secretary. Nothing can be more natural than that the inferiors in the office should follow in the steps of their leader, and that red-tapism should reign triumphant, secure in the impunity which, for some reason or other, Sir C. Wood continues to enjoy. What follows? If the system is not exploded by a vigorous effort of the English people, either we shall see the object of the present Indian Government attained, and India completely ruled from the council-table in England, or disorders of the most serious character will arise in India itself, which will compromise our very existence in that country.

No doubt every man has a right to his own opinion; and though Sir C. Wood sincerely holds that centralisation in a London office is the greatest boon which can be given to India, we must not therefore heap up faggots to burn him at the stake. But we may ask, with painful surprise, out of what materials he has evolved this theory—whether from historical experience, which generally contradicts it; or from the peculiar circumstances of the case, which are certainly not more in its favour; or, finally, from an intense appreciation of his own power to extract good out of a bad system, and a weakness for displaying himself in the cast-off clothing of the Great Mogul. He seems to be blind to the fact that India, ever since our first occupation of an insignificant factory on its shores, has been to us in the position of a military dependency; whatever it may have been to certain individuals, or to certain merchant firms, to the Government of England, in a political point of view, it has been, and will continue for some time to be, an Algeria. A fatal blindness to this truth brought about the great mutiny of 1856; a similar blindness in later times will produce the disastrous result of an estrangement between the two countries. Is the fact doubted? Apply the test suggested lately by a French politician. From the empire of India take away its military organisation; and what have we left? A swarm of savages exulting a second time over the mangled bodies of the few remaining merchants. Again, take away from the same empire the whole of its present commercial system, agriculture, ships, labourers, and everything, leaving the military only as possessors of a new unexplored country. In ten years all things would be restored: commerce and capital would flow into the country like a returning wave, burying beneath it all traces of the former destruction. The very life and existence of British India therefore depends on the military; its commercial greatness is entirely subsidiary to its physical strength, and must throughout be subordinated to it. If another proof were required of the same fact, we may find it in Mr. Laing's Address to the Young Men's Christian Association at Kirkwall. 'After all,' he says, 'men, not measures, are the great requisite of India.' Can the same be said of any of our commercial colonies? Of Canada, or Australia? There measures, not men, are principally needful; Federation Acts, Lands Acts, Franchise Bills, and so on, would be equally beneficial to these colonies if they grew like turnips out of the earth, instead of being elaborated in human brains. In India a man is wanted—a dictator—whose personal influence may be felt throughout the country, and who above all things can be swift and strong in punishment; in other words, he must be the head of a strong military organisation.

If it be granted that India has all the essentials of a military colony, we are at a loss to see on what ground Sir C. Wood justifies his continual interference in its affairs. It is very doubtful whether the duty of every Colonial Secretary should not be very much that of Deus ex machinâ, to appear at critical times as a sort of terrestrial Providence, to punish wrongdoers, correct the effects of their crimes, and read every body a good lecture. This is, in fact, a rough representation of the functions performed by the Colonial Office; but India, forsooth, being a country pre-eminently requiring a strong administration, is subjected to a hierarchy of officers, so contrived that at first sight the main duty of each official appears to be to act as a check on his colleagues, instead of governing those committed to his charge. As we said above, we are not aware of any instance in history in which such a system has been successful; but we can see that the Romans, our great masters in the art of colonisation, carefully avoided it. We are inclined to think that even Charlemagne was not much addicted to the use of it. On the other hand we know that the chief difficulties of the Spaniards in the New World arose from the petty interferences of the Cabinet at Madrid; and, lastly, we observe that the French, after relaxing their hand for a short time in Algeria, have been forced to tighten their grasp again, and re-establish an absolute military despotism.

We must not underrate the temptations to which our Indian secretaries are exposed, temptations of singular power to a mind steeped to the lips in the slough of red-tape, and passionately attached to bureaucracy as the culmination and noblest expression of human intellect and power. We can fancy the Indian Secretary, in the sanctuary of his office, turning over with glistening eyes and sincere admiration the well-thumbed pages of that Indian history the secrets of which he has, alas! so signally failed to discern; and as his glance rests on the names of Clive, of Hastings, or Dalhousie—the great proconsuls who ruled the nations with a rod of iron; who dared, in their pitiless, resistless course, to trample upon the rights of nobles and princes of the earth, the dignity of an ancient empire, aye, and often upon the laws of God himself; and swept 150,000,000 souls as it were into the hollow of their hand—we can fancy him rejoicing in his heart that he is in a position to eclipse these illustrious men. He sees the Government pens, ink, and paper lying invitingly at his elbow; he knows that constant mail packets are waiting to do his behests; and with the spirit of emulation burning in his heart, and the pride of advancing civilisation radiant from the very nibs of his pen, he indites a despatch to the Governor-General of India, to teach him how to elect clerks for his offices, or to regulate the amount of spelling required from a native exciseman.

Acadia.

This is the proposed title of a State yet in embryo—the name by which the world is to know the youngest born nation of the Anglo-Saxon race. A new kingdom, fused out of many provinces, some of them hardly known to us save through blue-books and geographical treatises, is to be added to the realms that acknowledge the sovereignty of Queen Victoria. A few days ago the leading politicians of British America met at Halifax to consider the possibility of uniting into one Federal State the various colonies comprised under that geographical designation. Their enterprise has the warm sympathy of the colonists and the cordial approbation of Her Majesty's advisers; nor do we think that it is likely to meet with any other feelings than those of thorough satisfaction and hearty congratulation from any party in the mother-country. The interests involved are too serious, too national, to be seized upon as the battle-ground of faction; for English statesmen, in or out of office, rarely forget the duties and responsibilities of loyal subjects in the ardour of partisans, and the title of 'Her Majesty's Opposition' aptly represents the relation of the party out of power to the Sovereign and to the country. And, as we are sure that no factious objections will be raised, so we hardly think that any real objections can be felt to a scheme so well calculated to remove embarrassments that have of late caused no little uneasiness to the Colonial Office, and to remedy defects which have threatened at once the security of the Canadas and the peace of the Empire. What difficulties may await the authors of the proposed Federation are inherent in the nature of their scheme, and in the conditions which they have to satisfy; it is hardly likely that any artificial obstacles will be raised by wilful opposition, either in England or in the colonies. In adjusting the details of a union which is to embrace provinces of diverse circumstances, distinct interests, and very unequal power and importance, hitherto for the most part connected by no other tie than that of a common allegiance, and more closely attached to the mother-country than to each other, many difficult questions have to be answered, many conflicting claims to be reconciled, many jealousies to be appeased, many qualms of local patriotism to be set at rest. But so clearly do the interests of all parties tend in the same direction, so manifest is the value of union to all, and so peculiarly anxious for its accomplishment are the two provinces whose superior power and consequence might induce them to put forth demands which their neighbours would not easily concede, that we have little fear lest these difficulties should prevent, or long delay, a consummation desirable alike to Great Britain and to her colonies, to Canada and to Prince Edward's Island.

Federalism is just now in disfavour—a disfavour as unreasonable as the exalted opinion of its value formerly entertained by nearly all American nations and by certain classes of European theorists. It is in disfavour because the greatest experiment of the kind which the world has seen has just culminated in a disruption the most complete, and at the same time the most sanguinary, that has ever yet befallen a nation. And yet, fairly considered, neither the secession of the South nor yet the war waged upon it, in defiance of federal law as well as of natural justice, by the rest of the late United States, proves anything whatever against the federal principle. Of course, if any one has claimed for that principle the nature of a universal panacea, applicable to all cases, and capable of curing all political disorders, such a theory is effectually refuted by a disaster which demonstrates first that no federal tie can really unite nations essentially different in character and institutions, and next that eighty years of federalism will not correct the vices of a self-conceited and overbearing people, fostered by a democratic polity and a Pharisaic creed. But all that rational politicians have ever claimed for federalism is that, while a far weaker form of government than consolidated monarchy or republicanism, it may yet serve sometimes to prepare a homogeneous people for political consolidation—as in Holland—and often, as in Switzerland, to bind together in effective union, excluding alike foreign conquest and civil war, States too diverse in character, race, and language, or too far separated by distinct interests, to form a single consolidated nation. It is pure evil to substitute a federation for a consolidated State, where, as in Mexico, no local diversities make consolidation intolerable; it is almost unmitigated gain to unite, by a federal bond as strict as they will bear, States whose separation makes them weak and unprogressive, with which consolidation is impossible, but which are sufficiently akin to each other to work harmoniously together in a connection which yet leaves to each the control of at least a portion of its purely domestic business. And the closer the bond—so it be not close enough to be irksome—the greater the gain.

Now the separation of our North American colonies has certainly been a hindrance to their growth in strength and prosperity. It has made them, in the first place, singly weak in the presence of a greedy and overbearing neighbour. It has kept back the advance of the maritime provinces by preventing the formation of that close commercial connection between them and Canada which a political union would certainly have fostered. It has generated in each of these minor provinces all the evils which belong to a community too poor in numbers to be great or dignified in spirit—a petty provincialism of character—bitter local feuds, such as invariably grow up in a small society with no outlet for its energies in a wider field than its own—narrow views, paltry schemes, factions for parties, and a vestry for a parliament. Men of real capacity and dignity have felt it beneath them to take part in the politics of a society no bigger than an English borough; and thus the government of the colony, involving the direction of all its internal legislation and administration, has too generally been left in the hands of the same class who find objects of ambition in the municipal offices of Marylebone or the Tower Hamlets, and who, quite capable of controlling policemen and watching over poor-rates and sewerage, are utterly unfit for the functions of general government, on however small a scale. Lastly, local factions which, if the whole of the colonies were united, would be held in check by a large public opinion and by a central power, exercise an uncontrolled tyranny within their own little sphere. The quarrels of Ribandmen and Orangemen in Newfoundland have been much what they would be in Belfast, if Belfast were left to make a civil and criminal code for itself, and to govern itself without the intrusion of soldiers or the interference of the county constabulary when its streets are made the scene of a murderous encounter.

While it is time that separation should cease, consolidation is for the present clearly impracticable. The great distance between the settlements, in winter often impassable, and the different stages of organisation and civilisation which they have reached, render it desirable that each should have on the spot a local Government, in close relation with local opinion. And in the case of the two colonies now united, Upper and Lower Canada, the distinctions of race, religion, and character, have made the union a source of discord rather than of harmony. The Upper Canadian party, fighting for an increased share of power to which their greater wealth and population entitle them, and the Lower Canadians, refusing to be governed by their neighbours, just as the South refused to be ruled by the North, have brought all public business to a deadlock. Nothing more than a federal tie is possible between them; and this conviction it was which suggested, as a practical and immediate policy, the idea of a federal union of all the colonies.

That union will create a State powerful enough for self-defence and great enough for self-respect. Men like Mr. M'Donald, who have felt that even a Canadian Parliament hardly afforded them a fitting sphere, will be proud to share in the government of a country with an ample seaboard, a large commercial navy, and an almost unlimited extent of fertile territory; and their services, when once all the best talent and energy of the colonies has been drawn towards political life, will be available not only to the central, but also to the local Governments. With 70,000 seamen, with a large and constantly increasing amount of shipping, and unlimited means for shipbuilding, with a population not far short of 4,000,000, and likely to double itself in ten or fifteen years by the emigration steadily setting in from Europe, with some half-million of men in the full vigour of manhood, leading for the most part an active outdoor life, and capable of being trained, by proper arrangements, into an excellent national militia, and supported in case of need by the English navy and by a small but thoroughly disciplined English army, the Confederation would be well able to make head against the only enemy whom it could possibly have to fear. The new State will therefore enter upon its career with the fairest prospects. Already it will have as large a population and almost as large a territory as the United States possessed in the days of Washington; and some even of those who met in conference at Halifax may live to see it capable of taking rank with a second-rate European kingdom. In the future history of North America, it will probably play no unimportant part. If, as seems most probable, the establishment of Southern independence should be followed in due time by the separation of the Pacific States from the Union, and this by the division between the East and the West, Acadia will be second in power only to the Southern Confederacy. In any case, her strength will be an important element in that balance of power which must replace in the Western hemisphere the despotic ascendency of one overgrown and overbearing nation; and in alliance with the Confederate States, and in dependence on England, she will exercise no trifling influence in preserving the peace of the New World.

In two essential respects the new State will have an advantage over its predecessors in the experiment of federalism. In the first place, there is much less jealousy of the proposed federal Power than existed among the thirteen United States; and it will be possible to intrust to it much wider powers than have been wielded by the Congress at Washington, and consequently to establish through the colonies a uniformity of laws and a unity of judicial authority which has been denied to their neighbours. If, as was lately rumoured, it should be proposed to make the delegates of each province to the central Parliament serve also as the local legislature, the likelihood of conflict between the federal and colonial Goverments, and the disposition of the latter to be jealous of its own independence, would probably be reduced to a minimum. Again, Acadia will be a confederation not of republican States but of colonies, owing allegiance to a common mother-country, and ruled by representatives of the Sovereign; and the Federal Government itself will partake of this colonial character. In lieu of a President with Ministers appointed by himself for a fixed term, there will be a Viceroy, independent of his subjects, with Ministers responsible to, and in practice removable by, the Parliament. This circumstance will enable the Acadians to combine with the advantages of federalism those of constitutional monarchy. No periodical elections will overthrow a government entirely acceptable to the people, and force upon the country the bitterness and the confusion of a contest for the Presidency; no government that has ceased to possess the confidence of the people will be able to retain power to the end of an appointed term. The Ministers will, of course, have seats in the Federal Parliament, and hold precisely that relation to it which they now hold towards the provincial legislatures. For the first time the world will see an example of a true Federal State with a constitutional monarchy at its head; and half the jealousies and conflicts which have broken the peace and endangered the existence of other confederacies will be saved to Acadia by this cause alone.

Nor is there the slightest reason to believe that the union of the colonies among themselves will tend in any way to weaken the tie which binds them to the mother-country. It is said that they will be the better able to dispense with our protection; but they will not be so strong as not to feel that protection an advantage, or so powerful as to lose their sense of pride in belonging to the most powerful empire in the world. Separation would still lower each individual colonist in his own esteem; he would cease to be an Englishman, and become an Acadian—a citizen of a third-rate Power. Nor is it likely that any conflict will arise between us and the Federal Government. To interfere with its internal affairs would be absurd; our absolute authority over its foreign relations is so clear and so undivided as to be liable to no misconception or dispute. On the other hand, the Federation will often stand between the mother-country and individual colonies in cases where, wanting such intervention, a quarrel might not improbably occur. It will spare us the necessity of controlling the vagaries of the Irish population of Newfoundland, or contradicting any ultra-Catholic legislation of the French of Lower Canada; and is likely to be far more tractable and rational than the local governments of minor colonies, in proportion to its consciousness of a greater power and a more real dignity. If it should prove inexpedient to gratify the loyal feelings of the people by giving them for Viceroy a Prince of the blood royal, it might not be inexpedient to acknowledge in another way the importance and the attachment of their country, and to insert among the titles of the Queen the name of a State more populous than Scotland, richer than Ireland, and likely in future ages to rank second to no portion of her dominions, except England herself.

THE QUARTERLIES.*

The masterpiece of the Edinburgh Review is the article on 'The Five-year-old Parliament.' It is exhaustive and not tedious, elaborate and not laboured; yet it is marred by the simple but fatal error that it is nothing more or less than a Whig electioneering manifesto. It undertakes to prove that from the moment when Lord Derby was driven from office in 1859 to the publication of the 246th number of the Edinburgh Review, the conduct of Lord Palmerston's Administration has been absolutely faultless. To argue that, on the whole, in spite of errors and weaknesses of no ordinary magnitude, the Government has deserved well of the country, might be within the bounds of possibility; but to propose to oneself the alternative 'aut Cæsar, aut nullus,' and to say that the Government is 'Cæsar' and the Opposition 'nullus,' is a conclusion which would be monstrous if it were not absurd. At first we had a faint idea that there was a pricking of the conscience while the details of the method by which Lord Palmerston and Lord Russell crept into office were being explained. To enter under a promise of Reform with a deliberate intention of repudiating the obligation, was a bad beginning. But thrones have been won by doubtful means and yet occupied with credit; and so pardon might have been granted even to Lord Russell, if he and his friends had quitted themselves like men in their usurped places.

No less than nineteen magnificent claims to applause are put forward. Of these the first six, having relation to finance and commerce, are the work of one man. Of the remainder, no less than seven are very doubtful, leaving six wonderful achievements for the members of the Government other than Mr. Gladstone to do in a period of five years. Even the foreign policy of Lord Russell is an object of admiration. 'He has preserved peace with America and with Europe.' The manner and the price are of no consequence. For the pearl of great price all has been sold, and in wealth and trade is the reward. Of peace with America we will but observe that it has been maintained by a careful obsequiousness to the belligerent whom Lord Russell believes to be the more powerful of the two. Indeed, Mr. Lincoln says, 'Lord Lyons is our friend abroad,' and Mr. Lincoln is notorious for standing by his friends. But as regards peace with Europe, let the foreign policy of the article form the test of Lord Russell's success. 'Whenever our own rights are affected we are strong enough to protect them: but we are not really concerned in many of those questions to which an exaggerated indirect importance has in former times been attached.' If, then, we are not concerned with any rights but our own, why does the policy of Lord Russell meet with approbation? Is it not admitted that to threaten and to cave is undignified? Is it not notorious that the English public has blushed for the part played in the cases of Denmark and of Poland? Nay, is it not the fact that the unprecedented situation has been witnessed of a Government in a free country acting in a diametrically opposite direction to public opinion? It is not merely that friends are sacrificed, and the honour of England in the eyes of the world is tarnished. There is a mischief greater than that, namely, the working of a breach between the people and objects whom they delighted to honour. M. Guizot once did similar offices for the King of the French.

When, however, we turn to the financial part of the question, approbation and not censure must be awarded to the splendid efforts of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. We extract the following summary of his achievements.

> In 1859 the income-tax was 9*d.*, it is now 6*d.* in the pound: the commodities subject to Customs' duties in 1859 were 419 in number; the Customs' duties are now substantially confined to 14 articles, upon all the most important of which the charges have been largely reduced. Allowing for new duties imposed, the relief given to the public by the abolition or reduction of Customs between 1859 and the close of 1863, amounts in round numbers to 4,500,000*l.* a year: of these, 3,200,000*l.* were, in the last-named year, replaced to the Exchequer through the increased consumption of the few articles remaining subject to duty. Within the same period the excise upon paper and upon hops was abolished, and other changes were effected in duties of Inland Revenue, by which relief was given to the public of, in round numbers, 1,500,000*l.* a year; 1,000,000*l.* additional was imposed upon spirits and upon licenses, but another 1,000,000*l.* has been derived from the enlarged demand for articles under Excise. Nor is this all; the present year has witnessed further reductions in the duties upon sugar and upon fire insurance, so that the total amount of indirect taxes remitted since 1859 exceeds 8,000,000*l.* a-year, while the income-tax has been reduced by nearly 5,000,000*l.* At the same time, the national debt, funded and unfunded, has been diminished by between 16,000,000*l.* and 17,000,000*l.* Notwithstanding the enormous reductions of the national burdens, Mr. Gladstone, after bringing the income of the country to a level with the expenditure, has been able, for now three years in succession, to meet Parliament with a surplus. On the 7th of April last, after proposing a remission of 2,750,000*l.* within the current year, he could anticipate a revenue of upwards of 67,000,000*l.*, and once more look forward to an excess of receipts over outlay.

Then again the trade with France by the operation of the treaty has shot up from twenty to forty millions sterling, and there are symptoms that purer wines at a cheaper rate are improving the public taste. To attribute an increase in trade to a party is a questionable mode of eliciting praise. Yet, whether the Government or the merchants are to monopolise the credit, it stands as a fact that although the trade with America has decreased by 28,000,000*l.* since the war, yet the annual value of the trade of the United Kingdom, which in 1858 was 300,000,000*l.*, rose in 1863 to nearly 450,000,000*l.*

The article concludes with an attempt to glorify the Liberal, and to condemn the Conservative party. The reflection does not occur that all the reforms and all the progress so magnificently portrayed could never have been realised except with the active cooperation of the opposition. Lord Stanley at the Merchant Taylors' dinner proclaimed that no difference of political connection should prevent him from doing justice to the authors of the improvement effected, and that is the feeling of many gentlemen of the opposition.

'Archbishop Whately' is scarcely a success. There is no grasp of the mental organisation of the man who ought not only by his works but by the actions of his life to have furnished sufficient data for a lucid explanation even of so remarkable a phenomenon. For an Archbishop, Dr. Whately, though perfectly ready to put faith in mesmerism, clairvoyance, table-turning, spirit-rapping, and all the arts and methods of modern thaumaturgy, believed very little of that vast mass of fact or doctrine from which theologians carve such portion as best suits the bias of their moral and intellectual faculties to hold out as their creed. Whately was deficient in the imaginative powers of adoration; he went at every point of faith, at every mystery of deep and sublime doctrine, in a 'cut and thrust' style, as if his logic, or that of the knot of men with whom he shared his opinions, and on whom he leaned for support, was the test of all things in heaven and in earth. Beyond doubt he lived at a time when too much weight could scarcely be attached to words like the following:—'We must not be deterred from this duty (of plain speaking in Biblical interpretation) by the fear (so often put forward) of what is called "unsettling men's minds." It is true that every man's mind is likely to be somewhat unsettled, if he has been taught to build on a foundation of sand, and you seek to place his building on a rock.' Such a warning was only too necessary in the days, scarcely even now entirely past, when men were asked not only to accept the dogmas of this or that school or section of theology, but even to swallow cut-and-dried arguments for such acceptance. But there was an absence of leadership in Whately, not in the sense of a lack of administrative talent for which he deserved high praise, but in the sense of a destitution of that nobility of genius which attracts disciples, inflames the souls of ardent followers, and stamps the impress of one man's creed and character on a generation. Whately was too matter-of-fact, had too great a contempt for authority, to reach the ideal of a spiritual pastor. He was all logic, and statistics, and dry argument, and probabilities, and the like. He did not excite love or admiration. He had to be content with the public appreciation of his sound sense, his rigid impartiality, his freedom from sectarian zeal, his unswerving probity. Perhaps the most amazing thing about Whately was the difficulty that every one has experienced in discovering why he was made Primate of Ireland. The experiment was a success, but not even the Whig leaders can give any rational explanation of the choice. It is, indeed, painfully suggestive of the remark made to us by an American gentleman, 'that it was impossible for any man to affirm that he would not be elected President of the United States.' The career of the Archbishop as the framer and promoter of a scheme of education commencing so auspiciously in conjunction with Archbishop Murray, and closing disastrously under other circumstances, needs no repetition. The most pleasing feature in the Archbishop's plans and acts was his conduct in aiding the reform of the Poor Law. With some serious defects that piece of legislation has done wonders for the agricultural classes. Many of its faults have been born since the birth of the Act, and are even the creatures of a diminution of pauperism. Perhaps the expense of the present machinery is the most culpable feature; and guardians themselves are not only aware of the existing mischiefs, but also ready with suggestions of suitable remedies. It is probable that many years will not elapse before fresh legislation is attempted in this department of social organisation.

The Edinburgh has also a spirited article on 'Weber's Life of Marshal Saxe,' and in it a tolerably complete picture is given of the great military chieftain, equally conspicuous in corporal strength and mental vigour, equally successful in the contests of Venus and of Mars—a man to whom a seraglio was an indispensable part of a military equipage; to whom the excitement of war was varied by the delights of the gaming-table; who never fought a battle that he did not win, and never besieged a place that he did not take; who wrestled with and threw a scavenger at Newmarket, and defeated the English Guards at Fontenoy.

There are also articles on 'Robert Browning's Poems,' on the two 'French Anti-Clerical Novels,' Le Maudit and La Religieuse; on 'Coniferous Trees;' and on 'Angus, its History and Traditions,' with some account of the progress of the linen trade in Forfarshire. That industry has been much developed by the cotton scarcity. In addition to the competition with cotton goods into which linen goods have now come, there is an enormous demand for the coarse articles used for munitions of war, ducks being used for tents, hessians, and sackings; and for these the United States are excellent customers, as is clearly shown by the following figures:—In six months of 1862 the value of linen exported from the United Kingdom to the United States was 852,975*l.*; in six months of 1863, 1,087,033*l.*; and in six months of 1864, 1,780,499*l.* In the latter period the value was represented by 54,977,429 yards.

The Westminster contains a valuable article on the laws of marriage and divorce, and the contents are not the less worthy of study because they consist of much information and very little suggestion. An accurate knowledge of the history of the institution of marriage, with especial reference to the state both of the early Roman law and the civil law, can furnish the only basis for a proper adjustment between the contending or combined ideas of a civil contract and a religious ceremony. The reforms brought about by 4 George IV., c. 76, removing the severity and retaining the caution of Lord Hardwicke's Act, and by the action of the Legislature in the establishment of the Divorce and Matrimonial Court, are admirably explained, and the crying abuses of the Scotch law, as well as the strange anomalies of the Irish law, render the reader impatient of the continuance of such a system. At the same time, nothing can exceed the sensibility of both men and women in such matters, and the Legislature is compelled to proceed with a delicacy that embarrasses its operations and makes all its efforts one-sided. Indeed, the patchwork condition of the law plainly indicates that the good old English plan has been followed of relieving iniquities and encouraging anomalies. Every one will agree that the objects to be attained by State regulations for the celebration of marriage are—first, the discovery of obstacles by notice; second, such a method of making the contract that the intention of the parties shall not be in doubt; and third, the perpetuation of testimony of the act done. Whether the proposition of compelling the interchange of consent before the civil officer will prove acceptable is not clear; but inasmuch as the religious celebration would remain intact, it is difficult to see how any shock would be dealt even to the most exalted conception of the sacred mystery. Whether or no the English law be left untouched, the scandal of the Yelverton case leaves no doubt as to the necessity of a reform in the Scotch and Irish systems.

The article on the Patent Laws—to take a jump from religious and social rights to mechanical matters—furnishes another field for legislation. It is rather startling to find that owing to the heavy fees, which, however, the Royal Commission has not considered excessive, the larger proportion of patents are allowed to lapse at the end of three years; but it is still more amazing to hear that it is seriously proposed to examine, by means of a Board, into the utility of an invention. Such a system would probably have discarded the most mighty discoveries of modern science, besides constituting a gross usurpation of the rights of popular judgment. Every one admits that a new Patent Court must be established. Not only would it secure a more scientific body of men to act as judges, barristers, and agents, but it would sweep away the double action of law and equity, which, in patent cases, is absolutely intolerable. The article is an able defence of the principle of patent laws, and contains valuable suggestions on the amendment of the present law.

While discoursing on the reform of law, it is right to direct attention to 'Modern Phases of Jurisprudence in England.' We regard the work of Mr. Maine on ancient law as a masterpiece in this field of enquiry. He rejects, as contrary to fact and as irreconcilable with the possible conditions of society, all the once-honoured notions of men meeting to frame a social compact. He relies for the means of revealing the mysteries of primitive law on the theory of patriarchal life. The records of early Roman writers, the phenomena displayed by the Greek communities, the customs of Germany, of the Slavic populations, even the modern habits of the Hindoo villagers, combine to enforce the truth of this principle. The original unit of society was not the individual but the family; the tendency of society is to raise the individual to distinctiveness and to obscure the family. Each family was an independent or even sovereign community, ruled by a despotism, looking for its laws in the breast of the chief; an aggregation of families has gradually formed a tribe or a nation. So, again, in the law of contract. Mr. Maine justly observes that the love of truth does not exist in primitive races. The virtue is of gradual growth. To take one proof. The ceremony which accompanies the promise, and not the promise per se, binds the obligor. No pledge is valid without the form, and the form makes valid the offspring of duress or deception. The relief of equity is a thing of yesterday, and was only created when men grasped the substance of truth, and not its mere shell. The article also touches, in speaking of Mr. Stephen's view of the criminal law of England, on the distinction between felonies and misdemeanors, once so clear and rational, now almost an arbitrary and technical division of offences. Of the obligations imposed on every member of a community with reference to public order and to the security of life and property, one portion seems to be recommended by the current principles of morality, and another, not contained within the spirit of any confessed moral code, yet falls within its scope and spirit, and assumes in the breach forms not easily embraced in exact technical terms. The offences against the former were defined as felonies—those against the latter as misdemeanors. The line has now become merely arbitrary with the disappearance of the broad principle of the distinction, and it is not improbable that the simple word 'crimes' will usurp the double functions of the two ancient offences. There are also articles on 'The Life of Jesus by Strauss,' on 'Dr. Newman's Apologia,' 'Mr. Tennyson's New Poem,' and, to conclude the list, a rather severe examination of Mr. Charles Dickens's claims to immortality as an English classic. We are told that 'his intellect is crushed and dwarfed by his emotional faculties,' and that 'he is unable to take an extensive or an intensive view of the subject.' 'His plots are pronounced inartificial, his genesis of character rude and unphilosophic, while his literary execution oscillates with tolerable evenness between the intensely vulgar and commonplace, and passages of the most striking beauty.' Hard measure this for the author of 'Pickwick Papers' and of 'Dombey and Son.' Were we inclined to be harsh, we should dilate on the truth of the saying about the class of persons to whom the defects of great men furnish much consolation.

In the Dublin Review two articles deserve attention, one because it affords a remarkable illustration of the dress in which Catholic imagination clothes the objects of its survey, the other because it combines just criticism with a pleasing method of instruction. 'The Christian Schools of Alexandria' attempts to draw a picture of Alexandria in all the pride of her commercial and intellectual splendour, and rapidly glances at the names and ideas of Philo and the school of Neoplatonists. Numenius, Ammonius Saccas, Porphyrius, Iamblichus, and Proclus are passed by with scarce a word of comment. Even Plotinus, the strange theorist, nursed, it is averred, for years instead of months at the breast, yet a weak miserable valetudinarian, so ugly or so etherialised as to deny himself to the artist's canvas, so mighty that he could blast the sacrilegious pupil who dared to attack the master, so favoured that a demon of no ordinary power was his visible guardian, is only worthy of mention. His wondrous system of the Triad with its principles of the Good, the Mind, and the Soul, with the Logos, the effulgence of these two; his method of interpreting mythology, resembling the method applied by Origen to Scripture; his remarkable theory of the nature of evil, are neglected. Perhaps such speculations had no charm for a Catholic; perhaps even the beautified edition of Creuzer could not overcome a natural repugnance to the riddled Greek and obscure arguments of the fantastic native of Lycopolis. The reviewer has his eye firmly fixed on Clement of Alexandria, and after a glance at Cantenus, the first doctor of the catechetical school of whom history has left account, he hurries on to the hero of his tale.

The whole argument, which is an attempt and a failure, to prove that Clement was a good Catholic, is based on the one broad principle consistently held by the Church of Rome, that the whole world of physical and metaphysical causes and effects is to be regarded as a portion of the domain of the Church. We admit that the idea is sublime, even to sublimity, for what effort of faith can be more magnificent? But to prove the truth of the assertion that 'Clement simply held up the crucifix,' would tax the genius of Bossuet; nay, even if such a proposition could be demonstrated, the insuperable task would remain of proving that Origen did likewise. Clement, as we understand him, believed in a progress in parallel lines, if not in a combination of religion and philosophy. For him faith, in its humility, was not sufficient, for 'while the believer has stopped short at the point of faith, the Gnostic has attained to the true philosophy of Christianity:' or, to use the more plain language of St. Augustin, 'The grand purpose of the Christian is, that he should behold with the eye of reason also that which he already grasps with the confidence of faith.' The remark made on the allegorical system of interpretation, that it was the fashion, is a very just one. Origen admitted that it came direct from Philo and Aristobulus, and called in the example of St. Paul to his defence. Clement did not, and Origen did, lose sight of the obvious meaning of the text, and so far Clement was better than his successor. Every passage of Scripture has a definite sense, which was prominently before the writer or in the intention of the Spirit. This meaning it is the duty of the expositor to unfold. This is a golden rule laid down by Mr. Newman in his work on the Arians. Who will affirm that Clement did not disregard it?

'Surnames in relation to the History of Society' admirably exposes the defect of Mr. Ferguson's work on 'English Surnames.' The latter book quietly ignored the fact that the British Isles, and it may be added England herself, contains many persons not descended from the Teuton, that there are such strains as Celtic in our blood, and therefore that it is possible that there may be surnames the roots of which are not to be found either in old Norse or Old High German. If Mr. Ferguson were to write a book on the pedigrees of the equine species, he would probably derive all the Derby winners in existence from the blood of the desert. The article is suggestive, in that it draws particular attention to names that had their origin in devotion, and is entertaining on the kitcheners, carvers, falconers, bowyers, and butlers of the ancient castle. The idea, moreover, that a name dictates a calling is pleasing. 'Why was Nicias a general, Law chief justice, Mr. Cubitt a builder, or Mr. Truefitt most perfect in his appliqués?

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN FRANCE.

FROM A CONFEDERATE CORRESPONDENT.

PARIS: October 19.

SHERIDAN'S campaign in the Shenandoah has been, generally speaking, appreciated at its just value by the Parisian press. The Pays estimates the losses he has incurred and the advantages he has gained, and shows to what they may collectively be reduced.

Sheridan's victory, says the France, is simply one of those sanguinary feats of military skill which the fortune of arms turns at one time to the side of the Confederates, at another to that of the Federals; it can have no serious result whatever.

Sherman's position at Atlanta is likewise regarded as by no means dangerous to the Confederates. On this the Pays remarks as follows:—

Unless Sherman should succeed in quickly reestablishing his communications, the capture of Atlanta will prove of little value to him. His expedition, whose commencement appeared so promising, will have a disastrous termination, and the remnant of his army will find it no easy matter to escape the vengeance of an exasperated people.

A similar observation is made by the France. In this journal, the American question is now for the most part treated by the Baron de Bazancourt. This distinguished writer, whose high authority in military matters is so well known, surveys the operations of Sheridan, Sherman, and Grant, and justly perceives in the redoubled activity of these generals tactics which have been dictated by Mr. Lincoln with a view to influence the electors. According to M. de Bazancourt, these tactics will in all probability fail in their object, since Lee is on his guard, and is fully preparing himself to receive the grand blow which the movements of Grant and his lieutenants announce.

In another article M. de Bazancourt examines the moral situation of the Federal and Confederate armies. He shows that if Grant were to experience a sudden check a fatal blow would be dealt against the North, whilst, on the other hand, even the fall of Richmond would fail to weaken the Southern cause. The view here taken is a very exact one. It seems to be generally believed in Europe that the capture of the Southern capital would at once put an end to the war and decide the fate of the Confederates; M. de Bazancourt, however, proves that such would not be the case:—

It would be (he says) the capture of a town, and nothing more. The seat of the Confederate Government would simply be transferred to another point where the North, exhausted as it is [illegible] of men, money, and troops must again pursue, besiege, and fight. Lee [illegible] Richmond supposing such to be [illegible] could [illegible] a new army out of the remnant of the present [illegible] no longer in Virginia he will be in the West as well as everywhere where partisans of the Confederacy are to be found. His retreat would be still a [illegible] gain, and he would [illegible] by remaining on good [illegible] let those who [illegible] the war at any cost think of this. Let them [illegible] or rather let them [illegible] to ascertain [illegible] as to the real state of things, and then let them tell us if they can see what course the North will [illegible] to [illegible] to replace those which at the present time it possesses with so great difficulty, let them tell us how the North with the poverty of its finances, will be able to raise money adequate to its [illegible] and how it can ward off a financial crisis which may prove its ruin.

The opinion above expressed by the Baron de Bazancourt is confirmed by a private communication received by the Patrie from a Frenchman who is at the present moment engaged on a mission in America. The despatches published by the Government, say this correspondent, are of its own invention, and their object is simply to bias public opinion. He further states that Richmond is neither attacked nor threatened, and that Grant is not in a position to lay siege to the Confederate capital.

In the Patrie, M. Ancaigne also examines the situation of the Confederates as it now presents itself after the recent events, and considers it by no means critical. He remarks that however victorious they may be, 'the three Northern generals appear to be brought to a stop in the centre of the provinces which they pretend to have conquered, very much like foxes caught in a snare.'

The above statements will convince you that the French press of the present day does not allow itself to be duped by the reports of fresh victories imported by the Yankees.

It is of course unnecessary to say that the opinions just stated are not shared by the journals of a more or less Republican tendency. The Temps, which daily becomes more and more attached to Federal interests, sees Richmond seriously threatened, and the Opinion declares point-blank, that it is all over with the slave capital. Amen!

The Presse also considers Richmond to be in danger. According to M. Chatard, the position of Lee, of Petersburg, and of the Confederate capital is gravely compromised by the successful movements of Sheridan in the Shenandoah Valley, and he is unable to perceive what attempt Lee can possibly make in order to baffle the skilful tactics of an opponent 'who is his equal both in prudence, energy, and strategy.' For an Opposition journal this judgment respecting Lee may be considered fair enough.

The Siècle is triumphant. According to this humanitarian journal, whose sole policy consists in the expression of a double hatred, part of which it bestows on the priests, and part on the slave-dealers, the American contest has assumed its last phase, the Confederates are running in breathless haste to demand pardon, and true patriotism is at last to meet with its reward. This great and noble result will be due to the Northern generals, who have carried military glory to so high a pitch without at the same time compromising American Democracy!

Your readers will doubtless consider that the writer of the above lines undertakes to speak on a subject of which he knows nothing: but what will they say of a writer who, in the same journal, thus expresses himself relative to the issues of the coming election?—

Lincoln being elected, the following will be the results. The South will lose courage and abandon the contest: the lands reduced to barrenness by servile labour will be again rendered productive by the labour of the freeman: the Confederates, who know only how to fight and who are supported by the sweat of others, will purify and regenerate themselves by the exercise of their own brains and of their own hands.

The following would be the calamities resulting from the election of McClellan. The North would be irremediably abased and the South exalted: the great Republic would divide itself into three portions incapable of governing themselves, and the United States would enter upon an undefined future of misery which would reduce it to the condition of Spanish America. The sad consequences of so fearful a catastrophe would be felt even in Europe: the fall of the Republic would there produce a confusion, a disorder, and a discouragement by which tyrants would profit!

These strange remarks conclude with words of encouragement to 'the robust-shouldered, iron-fronted, firm-lipped' Lincoln, and prayers for the welfare of the American brethren.

You will not easily credit it, but this article—a very masterpiece of delirium and absurdity—bears the signature of one of the most eminent writers of the day, M. Henri Martin, the celebrated historian of France. What a remarkably strange History M. Martin's must be if in it he judges of the men and matters of his own country in the same way as he has judged of those of America!

The Pays reverts with energy to the frauds committed in Europe by the Federal recruiting officers. Basing its statements upon the recent disclosures communicated to the Courrier des Etats Unis by one of the victims of these people, it relates that 251 passengers, engaged at Antwerp as workmen, were compelled, on their arrival at Boston (of which the Federal recruiters have made a kind of flesh and blood emporium), to sign a contract which they did not understand, and which obliged them to assume the Federal uniform.

THE FEDERAL 'WHITE TRASH.'—We observe another indication of the degradation of the 'poor white trash' among the Yankees. Sherman has declared he will not exchange our soldiers for Yankees whose term of enlistment has expired. Whose fault is it that the term of these soldiers has expired? Certainly not that of the soldier. He has complied with his contract: his Government has violated theirs. They owe him protection. They have guaranteed him the right of civilised warfare. They have exacted from the soldier the last day of service that was due; they then abandon him to the horrors of a prison life, without hope of release until the end of a war that daily seems more interminable.—The Richmond Enquirer.

THE LIVERPOOL BAZAAR.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

Liverpool: October 18, 1864.

The well-known law in the meteorology of England, by which, when anything remarkable is fixed to come off on a certain day, whether fête, archery-meeting, cricket-match, Cesarewitch Stakes, inauguration of somebody's statue, or grand contest of the Royal Yacht Squadron, that day will infallibly dawn dark, dismal, dreary, and everything else disagreeable beginning with d, has been happily pretermitted in its application to the opening of the Southern Bazaar. The morning broke beautifully over Liverpool, its domes and steeples, over the 'forest of masts' in the Mersey, over the fair lawns and the flaring furnaces of Lancashire, brightening the russet foliage of the park and the dun surface of the downs with real Confederate sunshine, supplementing the English autumn with something of the glory of the American fall, and inspiring us (by us I mean all who felt an interest in the Confederate cause) with the augury and earnest of success. Not even the ten thousand chimneys of the second city of the United Kingdom pouring out their dense columns of smoke could blacken the blue of the sky, and at the meridian, the hour when the Bazaar was opened at St. George's Hall, the day was as fine as was ever seen in the sunny South, or in Italy itself. As if to cheer us, too, there came hopeful news from Virginia, and the happy throng that assembled in the Exhibition Hall in the early afternoon had matter of congratulation among themselves as they entered the building, and burst into exclamations of delight at the scene which was presented therein.

I am not strong in description, and was never skilful in driving a team of adjectives. I am, therefore, not over sanguine that I shall be able to convey to your readers any adequate idea of the brilliant and confusing spectacle, to produce which so much zeal, taste, skill, industry, and liberality, have been employed. Too much credit cannot be given for the energy and administrative talent shown in the general management of the benevolent enterprise, and the gentlemen of the Committee deserve warm praise for the hearty cooperation they have lent to the carrying out of the numberless and perplexing details of the Bazaar.

A steady stream of visitors flowed into the edifice from 12 o'clock throughout the day, and at 4 P.M. the great hall was crowded, floor and galleries, to its utmost capacity. The coup d'œil from the gallery was truly magnificent. All that the imagination can call up to produce a grand and striking effect—the pomp of architecture in the noble room itself, masses of colour in banners and canopies, fabrics of all gorgeous tints, the loveliest women here, there, and all around—the eye was bewildered with the multiform beauty that it surveyed. But when one descended from the gallery to the floor of the hall, and turned from stall to stall, vainly attempting to settle for himself which offered the greatest attraction, slowly making his way through a weltering sea of crinoline, and in that dangerous navigation everywhere coming upon sparkling eyes and fair faces not to be forgotten, it was surely then that he lost himself in the charming confusion and intoxicating whirl. Night could not increase the throng, but it heightened the splendour, as the blaze of gas fell down upon the tables and the toilettes, and was reflected from the glittering objects of steel and silver, crystal and ivory, that were exposed for sale, or gave a yet warmer tint to the scarlet hangings and parti-coloured banners that drooped above the heads of the visitors.

As yet I have dealt only in generalities in attempting to portray the Bazaar. It is time that I should come to particulars. Let me say, then, that the stalls for the sale of articles were occupied as follows:—

Virginia: The Countess de Dampierre, Mrs. Patteson, Mrs. M. G. Klingender. North Carolina: Mrs. Spence, Mrs. F. Worthington. South Carolina: The Lady Wharncliffe, Mrs. Prioleau. Georgia: Mrs. Bulloch, Mrs. Trapmann. Florida: Mrs. Cassin, Mrs. Patrick. Alabama: Mrs. Malcomson, Mrs. Pratt. Mississippi: The Countess of Chesterfield, The Hon. Mrs. Slidell. Louisiana: Mrs. Byrne, Mrs. T. Byrne, Mrs. F. Rodewald. Texas: Mrs. A. Forwood, Mrs. W. Forwood, Mrs. W. Heyn. Arkansas: Mrs. Sillem, Mrs. J. Willink. Tennessee: The Lady M. Beresford Hope, Mrs. F. Hull. Kentucky: Lady de Hoghton, Mrs. G. W. Oliver.

In attempting to present some picture of the stalls, I am greatly embarrassed, for to tell what ornamentation surrounded them would most imperfectly describe their attractiveness. The Virginian stall was surrounded by pictures of General Lee and Stonewall Jackson, and it offered to the patriotic Confederate a subscription to a superb sword which was designed for presentation to General Lee. The Mississippi stall was graced by the presence of Mrs. Slidell and one of her daughters, as well as of the Countess of Chesterfield, and no visitor could pass it without an investment in some of the articles of luxe and utility which were displayed so attractively for sale. The Alabama stall, presided over by Mrs. Malcomson, was rich in everything that could tempt the eye, and some specimens of Dieppe work in ivory secured the admiration of all. The prominent stalls of Kentucky and Tennessee occupied, perhaps, the most eligible positions, inasmuch as they occupied the central part of the hall, and no one could move through the crowd of visitors without seeing all that they exhibited for the allurement of the public. Nor was the South Carolina stall behind the rest in the profusion of its articles of taste, not to mention that it was superintended by Lady Wharncliffe, assisted by Mrs. Prioleau and Mrs. Eustis. But discrimination is invidious where every table had its bevy of admirers and patrons, and the only difficulty seemed to be which State had achieved the greatest success. The stalls of Kentucky and Tennessee, in addition to their more advantageous position in the very centre of the hall, had the prestige of the presence of Lady Mildred Beresford Hope and Lady de Hoghton.

The portraits of Confederate Generals which adorned the room were excellent likenesses, especially that of General Beauregard, which was placed very near the entrance to the hall; and of all the articles so rich and beautiful that were presented to the visitor, none had a higher interest than the crosses made from the wood of Fort Sumter, which Miss Eustis had the privilege of offering to the purchaser.

I should not omit to state that concerts were given in the small music hall of the building, both in the morning and afternoon, by Mr. Henri Drayton, in aid of the general fund. It is also to be noted that two salles à manger were provided for the visitors by the Committee of Management, where ladies and gentlemen might procure lunch and dinner that rivalled in excellence of cuisine the restaurants of Paris.

It is not to be assumed, of course, that all the patrons of the Southern Bazaar were thoroughly in sympathy with the Confederates in their struggle with the Federal Government, because the cause of wounded prisoners appeals to the humanity of every class, and the Englishman who espouses the side of the North might with perfect consistency lend his aid in behalf of an undertaking which seeks to alleviate the sufferings of the unfortunate. But it may reasonably be claimed that the decided success of this fair demonstrates that the vast majority of the people of Liverpool regard the Confederate cause as one that challenges the sympathy and approbation of mankind.

The receipts of the Southern Bazaar may be set down as having reached the sum of 10,000*l.* as the result of the first day's operations, and we cannot doubt that 15,000*l.* will be realised before its close.

Liverpool, October 19, 1864.

The old constitutional murky sky of Britain has succeeded to the brief blue of yesterday, and Liverpool to-day is as gloomy as if there were 'no sun,' which poor Tom Hood said was the characteristic of November. Scarce light enough penetrates the blackened window-panes to enable one to read the telegrams in the Times, and out of doors, rain, soot, and mud conspire to make the city unspeakably disagreeable. That 'entire absence of comfort' which the old lady in the country remarked upon as belonging to the days of the French Revolution, impresses the pedestrian, or the occupant of the Hansom cab, as he walks or is whirled along the oozy, viscous, clammy pavements, splashing or being splashed. The transition from yesterday is almost Tartarean. But we could not hope that the regal sunshine which lent its pomp to the opening of the Southern bazaar would long endure, and we must therefore accept the darkness and the moisture as climatic conditions of the season and the locality.

There is, however, one bright, cheerful, pleasant place in Liverpool upon which the elements exert no depressing influence—the interior of St. George's Hall. The exhibition seems all the gayer for the outside gloom. The rich colouring of the decorations; the beautiful stuffs, wares, porcelains, jewellery upon the stalls; the pretty scarfs and badges of the fair ladies; the flags and the flowers, all make up a kaleidoscopic brilliancy of effect, as the ever-moving throng presents each moment a new combination to the eye. There is an air of unreality in the whole affair: it is like a scene out of the opera, or an illustration of the "Arabian Nights:" and the idea is constantly suggested of the agency of the fairies, which illusion is kept up by the music floating through the ample spaces of the great hall, and the sounds of merriment from the promenaders, and is only dispelled when one sits down to turtle soup, roast mutton, and Clos Vougeot, in the Civil Court room, transformed from a temple of Themis into a dining-room, where the precedents quoted are Soyer's, and the briefs are tempting bills-of-fare.

The arrangements for lunch and dinner are capital, and speak well for the prevision of the members of the Southern Club, by whom they were made. The silver and crockery were furnished by Messrs. Dismore, Messrs. Elkington, Messrs. Letherland, and Messrs. Livingston & Stonier, while the carpeting was supplied by Mr. Jeffery, liberal tradesmen of Liverpool. The furniture came from the rooms of the Southern Club, temporarily despoiled for the benefit of the bazaar.

Of the objects of especial interest disposed for sale there is the embarras des richesses in the enumeration. Still three or four may be mentioned. The Alabama stall presents a beautiful model of Milan Cathedral, made of pearl shell, and an automaton rabbit that plays the fiddle; and whoever loiters to look at these curious pieces of workmanship will find himself in danger of parting with a 'fi'pun' note' before he escapes from the fascinations of the ladies who preside there. A large and handsome flag, the work of Lady de Hoghton, surmounts the orchestra stand, from which the excellent band of Mr. Streather discourses at intervals 'Dixie,' 'My Maryland,' 'God save the Queen,' and other appropriate airs. A magnificent piece of silver work, designed as a present from the owners of the blockade-running steamer, Banshee, to Colonel Lamb, Commandant of Fort Fisher, at the mouth of the Cape Fear River, attracts universal attention. It represents a coast-line of the Atlantic ocean, surmounted with pieces of artillery, and a trim, keen, fast-sailing, Clyde-built steamer, lying in security at anchor below, while the palmetto tree lifts its delicate branches from the shore. There is also a cunning model of a yacht full-rigged and ready for a cruise around 'Virginia Water,' or any other lake in a royal or republican pleasure-garden. At the Mississippi stall, where Mrs. Slidell presides, there are to be seen some exquisite specimens of embroidery, altogether irresistible when offered by that lady or one of her graceful assistants. Mrs. Prioleau, and Lady Wharncliffe, who worthily represent South Carolina, have, besides a wonderful assortment of elegant utilities and inutilities, a collection of autographs, comprising Lee, Davis, Beauregard, and his Holiness, the Pope. At the Arkansas stall there is a model of the Florida, which Mrs. Sillem and Mrs. Willink are glad to show to the curious visitor. I have already mentioned the sword, designed for presentation to General Lee, at the stall for Virginia, where Mrs. Patteson and Mrs. Klingender so sweetly officiate, assisted, in the absence of the Comtesse de Dampierre (who, to the regret of all, is detained in France by indisposition), by Miss Soutter, a charming representative of the Old Dominion. A sumptuous piece of silver ornaments the Kentucky stall in the centre of the hall, the design of Mrs. Oliver, who shares with Lady de Hoghton, the administration of this tasteful counter. It typifies the Confederacy in the shape of a female draped with the Southern flag and crowned with 13 stars, with the palmetto overshadowing her. There are many portraits of Confederate generals and statesmen hung around the hall. The best is a full-length of Beauregard, and the worst is a half-size of General Lee. There should have been a fine full-length picture of President Davis over the stall of Mississippi.

The most striking feature of the bazaar is the disposal of the chances in the numberless raffles of all sorts of articles, and the visitor is assailed the very moment he enters the hall with solicitations to take a ticket for a bouquet-holder, or an odour bottle, or a rug, or a watch, or anything else that he may or may not want. He must be a very impracticable person, or one who has learnt well the difficult task of saying 'no' to a pretty woman, who can go through the hall without parting with several sovereigns, and getting in exchange tickets which only the blind goddess of Fortune can make of any value.

The only drawback upon the success of the bazaar to-day has been the immense crowd of persons in attendance. At one time the difficulty of locomotion was as great as it ever was at a drawing-room at St. James's, and the mass swayed to and fro through the hall in hopeless and inextricable embarrassment. The eccentric Mike Walsh of New York once said that it required as much ability to cross Broadway in the afternoon as it did to be a Member of Congress or Governor of Rhode Island, and I am sure that moving about the bazaar this morning with comfort and rapidity was more than could have been done by a Cabinet Minister.

Altogether there never was a greater success in England than the Southern Bazaar. The best people of Liverpool and its neighbourhood have come forward to manifest their sympathy with the wounded Confederate prisoners, and the hearty cooperation that has been given to the enterprise by the generous mercantile class of this great city reflects lasting honour upon the Liverpool Exchange. The Latin poet tells us that faithfully to have studied the arts softens and ennobles character; but there is something in commerce as well that elevates and dignifies life, and inspires a genuine admiration for courage in a great cause.

In my letter of yesterday, I placed the results of the bazaar in l. s. d. at 10,000*l.* This estimate was based upon the amount that had been already subscribed, 7,500*l.*, to which was to be added the receipts of the first day's operations. It was slightly under the mark, as will be seen by the following statement of the exchequer at the close of the bazaar last night:—'The amounts taken at different stalls were as follow, each stall it should be remarked, being called by the name of one of the Confederate States:—Virginia, 250*l.*; North Carolina, 300*l.*; South Carolina, 300*l.*; Georgia, 200*l.*; Florida, 100*l.*; Alabama, 250*l.*; Mississippi, 150*l.*; Louisiana, 300*l.*; Texas, 150*l.*; Arkansas, 100*l.*; Tennessee, 200*l.*; Kentucky, 150*l.*; Missouri, 100*l.*—making a total of 2,550*l.* The money received at the entrance doors was 275*l.*; that realised by the sale of season tickets, 270*l.*; making a grand total of 3,170*l.*'

This 3,170*l.* added to the 7,500*l.* already subscribed will show an aggregate for the first day of 10,670*l.* which will doubtless be swelled before the close of the bazaar to 15,000*l.*

A handsome Shetland pony presented by Mr. Tait, of Limerick, and named 'Varina Davis,' in a spirit of compliment to the wife of President Davis, was put up for sale by raffle. The chances were sold in hot haste, and the money received amounted to 120*l.* The pony was won by Mr. H. O. Brewer, Alabama, who immediately presented it to the Bazaar in order that it might be the object of a second raffle.

I cannot close this letter without mentioning, among the gentlemen of the Southern Club who have actively participated in the affairs of the bazaar, the names of Mr. Spence, Mr. Prioleau, Mr. Stoess, Mr. Oldenshaw, Mr. A. B. Forwood, and Mr. F. A. Patteson. Others, there are, of whom I am not informed, that have rendered important services, and made the fame of Liverpool for liberality and public spirit yet brighter and more enviable.

Lastly, I ought not to omit the name of Mr. Ashbridge, the indefatigable Treasurer of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund.

THE DEMOCRATIC PRESS ON M'CLELLAN.

To the Editor of The Index.

New York: October 4, 1864.

Sir,—Notwithstanding the stratagem by means of which the war principles of the Democratic candidate for the Presidency (M'Clellan) have been substituted for the peace resolutions adopted at the Chicago Convention, the Peace journals are one by one giving way to the general pressure of the other organs of their party: and if they do not declare their adhesion to M'Clellan, at least they no longer oppose him. In New York State, outside of this city, there is but one Democratic paper, the Franklin Gazette, that yet holds out against him, and its editor is preparing to discontinue his paper—hardly the duty of a journalist, one would think, in these revolutionary times. In New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, every Democratic journal supports the nomination of M'Clellan. The Columbus (Ohio) Crisis is the only opponent he has in Ohio, against more than eighty supporters. The Hillsboro' Gazette of that State hesitates at present; but that its editor will yield to the exigency, there can be little doubt. In Indiana, Dawson's Fort Wayne Times is the only journal that has hesitated, and it is now preparing to follow suit. The New York Freeman's Journal and the Metropolitan Record have also ceased their opposition to the Presidential nominee of the Chicago Convention. In no other Northern State is there one Democratic paper in opposition to him. 'The people so will it,' says the Freeman's Journal, 24th ult., 'and it will not do to be wiser than the generation with whom we must live. Peace men, even if they do not recognise the powerful party they might have had, must act and make their influence felt. Since they were not ready to rally (upon the appearance of M'Clellan's letter, in which he declared that he would carry on the war until the Union was restored) and to bring the War men to terms, we hold, as our present advice, that they ought to give the M'Clellan ticket an active and a potential support. The day will soon come when the masses of the people will require the terms that we wished now to secure for the country. The majority of those who will vote for M'Clellan will vote for him as the last hope for peace. Their voices, and their brave hearts, and their strong arms, must not be without leaders in that hour.'

The sentiments of the Metropolitan Record were, on the same date, expressed as follows:—'We have done all that lay in our power to secure the nomination of a Peace candidate for the Presidency, up to a point when it seemed to us that, in consequence of want of united action in our ranks, success was impossible, and we have unsparingly condemned a departure, for the sake of expediency, from the true and time-honoured principles of Democracy. All this we have done in compliance with our own sense of right; but having thus defined our position in the present canvass, our opposition shall cease at this point. We cannot consent to set aside the counsel of sincere friends—friends who are as tenacious of principle as we profess to be—friends who prefer, however, to fight the battles for those principles within the Democratic party than outside of it; and their counsel is that we cease to oppose the election of General M'Clellan. This we shall do. We are willing, in view of their tried and well-established devotion to principle, to comply with their urgent desire; but here the matter ends, as we are resolved to be free, when M'Clellan is elected, to oppose him on the first indication of a return to the war policy as a means of restoring the Union. We shall advise no man to vote against M'Clellan, and we hope that the change of Administration for which such a unanimous wish is expressed will, as is so confidently believed by our friends, be really for the better. As for ourselves, our opinions and views remain unchanged. We believe that the South is entitled to the selection of her own form of government, and that the North, in the endeavour to force her into a compulsory union, is violating the principle of universal suffrage, which we claim to be the foundation of our Democratic system. By this right we shall continue to stand, for it is a right older and more valuable than even the Union itself, much as it is prized by every man who loves free institutions.'

If, indeed, M'Clellan should be elected, and resolve to continue the war, he will find a stronger opposition to him than that which now confronts Abraham Lincoln. The Peace party will then embrace in its ranks not only the Peace Democracy, but that portion of the Republicans which will oppose him upon party grounds, and find fault with every measure of his administration. Above all, the party now in power will oppose the admission of the South on any other terms than as military dependencies or conquered provinces, deprived of equal rights with the so-called loyal States. The true policy of General M'Clellan will therefore be found in the inauguration of peace, which affords the only hope for the freedom of the people and a union of the Northern and Southern Republics on a firmer foundation than that on which the United States rested before the commencement of the present war.

The Burlington (Iowa) Argus, 15th ult., well illustrates the sentiments of the 'far West' upon the subject of M'Clellan's election. 'The existence of the Republican party,' it says, 'depends upon its retention of power and the continuance of the war. The present Administration cannot restore the Union if it would; it has gone too far, committed itself too irrevocably to unconstitutional measures, which make it utterly impossible for any settlement with the South. On the part of the North it has become a war of relentless conquest, seeking the subjugation or extermination of six or seven millions of people, with whom we once lived in terms of fellowship and union, and with whom we had fondly hoped to live again under the old star-spangled banner. It clinches its arguments against the reelection of Abraham Lincoln in this wise. 'Simply as a matter of dollars and cents, can we as a people stand another term of Lincoln imbecility? The land already groans under the taxes imposed upon the people. Every branch of industry feels the burdens, and is already straining every nerve to meet the demands of the creditor, who knows no mercy but the strict letter of the law. In the last year we have travelled rapidly on the road to remorseless taxation. In what condition will four, three, two, or even one year, of the same rule, find the mechanics and labouring men of the land? At the East, in our large cities, strikes and unions have been resorted to, to obtain the increase of wages actually demanded to sustain life. Here at the West, where our paucity of numbers has prevented such organisations from succeeding, the poorer and middle classes have had to curtail every expense of tea, coffee, and the little luxuries of life upon which Americans have heretofore prided themselves upon their ability to enjoy. Many are living upon only the cheapest articles of diet, economising in dress and comfort, and still living without prospect of any change for the better. On the contrary, another year like the past must add still more to their wants and necessities, and raise still higher taxes and expenses. If any one doubts these facts, let him visit the shops and business places in this city. Let him ask the coopers, the tinsmiths, the wagon-makers, the tobacconists, and the score of other trades who are paying five per cent. of their gross earnings monthly to the tax-collector, how much they have left when their work is done. Tell them their tax is to be doubled with every successive year of Abraham Lincoln's reign (and no Republican dare deny the inexorable logic of such a result), and ask them if they can afford to reelect this Administration. The senseless cry of disloyalty and Copperhead has lost its effect. No man who feels the gripe of Abe Lincoln's tax-gatherers upon his purse as he closes his month's account, will call his neighbour a traitor for daring to vote against the power which would confiscate its entire contents. While the mass of the people have grown poorer while the war progressed, the favoured few, the pampered pets of Abolitionism and Shoddy, have waxed fat over the plunder of the Government. Millions of Government bonds are now held by these Administration favourites free from tax, and their interest payable in gold. What is good enough for the masses is not good enough for these favourites of Lincoln. Gold they demand as the price of their patriotism, while the nation labours for greenbacks worth 40 cents on the dollar. Can the nation afford this thing to continue another four years? Can the lifeblood of the nation stand this eternal drain upon its current? Ye have taken Joseph and Simeon away. Will ye now take Benjamin also? The cry of lamentation and woe is arising from the hearthstones of every family circle, and instead of the willing sacrifice, the fatlings of the flock, the last hope of declining years, the widow's staff and the orphan's trust, are to be dragged to the field of carnage, to satiate the implacable animosity of an imbecile ruler? Can the nation afford to reelect Mr. Lincoln? The people in its heart of hearts answers No.

'Governor Seymour,' says the Bangor (Maine) Democrat, 'never declared a more evident truth than when he said, in the Chicago Convention, that the great and all-pervading sentiment of a party shapes, directs, and controls the action of its Administration. In the present political contest there is but a single issue—peace or war. The controlling sentiment of the Republican party is war; and if Abraham Lincoln is elected, we shall have interminable war. The controlling sentiment of the Democratic party is peace; and if their candidate is elected, we shall have immediate peace. Let the issue be clearly and fairly understood. The Democracy are struggling for an early and honourable peace; the Republicans are striving for the further prosecution of this war of subjugation and national ruin.'

The position in which General M'Clellan now stands towards the Democratic party and the Peace journals is stated with some force and much truth in the Daily News of this city, on the 24th ultimo:—

'In almost every instance those Peace journals that have signified their purpose to support General M'Clellan have done so under protest and because there remained no alternative except to withdraw entirely from participation in the canvass. The War Democracy deceived themselves, we fear fatally, in accepting this reluctant support as a sign that the Peace men generally will vote for the candidate who has betrayed their principle. The position of a public journal in a political campaign materially differs from that of the individual citizen. Pecuniary and other interests render it a great sacrifice for the journalist to place his paper outside of the pale of his party. It is like the act of the devotee who shuts himself from the world within a monastery. One by one, therefore, we have seen our quondam Peace contemporaries yielding to the pressure of material interests and departing from the strict letter of their faith. But with the individual the ordeal is less difficult to pass. The great majority of Peace men will remain true to their doctrine, and disfranchise themselves rather than cast their votes for one who, in denying the platform upon which he was nominated, proclaims himself in opposition to the paramount article of their creed. If this is doubted, let General M'Clellan put himself in communication with the masses of the West, the stronghold of the Peace Democracy. He will hear either the loud outburst of defiance or the sullen murmur of discontent. Let him commune with the resolute farmers of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, who find the fruits of their honest toil withering in the pestilential atmosphere of civil strife, and he will understand that he has abandoned the surest element of his success in response to the selfish counsels of demagogues and time-servers. There is another class that he has driven from his camp by asserting the war policy, from which it was hoped he would deliver them. We know of many Abolitionists who, weary of the war, and conscious at last that their philanthropy has erred in selecting the path of carnage and destruction to fulfil its mission, would have given their quiet but valuable support to any candidate pledged to favour a cessation of hostilities. As it is, the two opposing candidates stand upon the same platform so far as relates to a prosecution of the war, and as upon that point there is no choice between them, the Peace Abolitionists will naturally incline to act in concert with the party that they originated and brought into power. Under any circumstances, General M'Clellan might have counted upon the support of the War Democracy. He has committed the folly of paying them more than they asked, and of denying the Peace Democracy that upon which they insisted.'

M'Clellan is accepted now by the Peace men, declares Mr. Lincoln's especial organ in this State, the New York Times (17th ult.), 'because they take him to have neither independence of character nor decision of purpose. They take him because, as the Daily News had it, he has pledged himself privately to bring about, in the event of his election, an immediate cessation of hostilities. They adopt him because he is the creature of circumstances, and can be made an abject instrument of men of native will. It has been charged, and the accuser holds himself prepared to furnish overwhelming evidence of the truth of his charge, that General M'Clellan was consulted two months ago as to the peace resolutions in the Chicago platform. "Early in the month of July last the platform, with its peace planks, almost word for word, as adopted, was presented to General M'Clellan, and was by him approved both in letter and in spirit." To this charge neither the organs of the soi-disant War Democracy, nor the "hero of Antietam" himself, have dared to reply. It was but reasonable, then, that the consistent men of the party who were swindled into accepting the Chicago candidate, on the faith of his personal pledges and those of his immediate following, should bitterly resent the attempt to foist their man before the public as the destined conqueror of the South.'

Perhaps in no portion of this Northern Confederacy is the peace sentiment stronger than in the North-western States. Through the instrumentality of a number of State-rights and Peace men of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Iowa, who have been in consultation ever since the M'Clellan contretemps at Chicago, it has been determined to call another Peace Convention, to meet at Cincinnati, Ohio, on the 18th instant. It is felt that the outspoken expression of the peace sentiment which pervades the minds of the people was prevented at the Convention at Chicago, and an authoritative expression of their views is to be obtained through a Convention of volunteer representatives of the Peace Democracy. No nominations for President or Vice-President will, it is expected, be then made or seriously proposed. The Convention will assemble purely and simply to obtain a clear enunciation of the cardinal doctrines of Democracy.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

THERE has not been any alteration in the Bank rate of discount. The improved aspect of the money market will, unless any adverse contingencies should arise in the commercial world, render any further advance at present unnecessary. At the same time, there is not any prospect of its being lower for some time to come, and until there is an end of the mercantile suspensions, which are now of daily occurrence. Within the last few days the demand for accommodation, both at the Bank and in Lombard Street, has been rather less pressing, but amongst the brokers the terms for discount rule at 9 per cent. and upwards. The joint-stock banks are working at about $8\frac{3}{4}$ to $8\frac{7}{8}$. There is plenty of capital in all quarters, and the supply appears to be rather on the increase than otherwise. On the Stock Exchange the demand for money is rather limited at present. The rates for short loans have been 6 per cent., and at present they are from 4 to 6. The last and most unfavourable intelligence is from Brazil, where there has been a commercial crisis; but its effects, though serious, have not been very potential in London. The majority of the English houses escape with very little loss, and the principal firms compromised are those of Portuguese or local origin.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The bullion market is still wearing a favourable aspect. The amount of gold sent into the Bank during the week has been 260,000*l.*, against which there have been no withdrawals whatever; and so long as the rate of discount remains at its present high figure, there is not much probability of any adverse movement. The arrivals of specie have not been very large; they comprise 408,431*l.* from the West Indies and Pacific, 44,100*l.* from New York, and 7,864*l.* from Alexandria, making together 460,395*l.* There has been very little doing in the silver market, there not being at present any demand for the East; a few transactions, however, have taken place at $61\frac{1}{8}d.$ to $61\frac{1}{4}d.$ per oz. In Mexican dollars there has been nothing doing, and the nominal price is $59\frac{3}{4}d.$ to 60*d.* per oz. The advices from Australia announced the sailing of the Clyde from Melbourne with 63,084*l.* The S. E. H., previously advised with 44,000*l.*, is still out, but her arrival is daily expected.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The improved state of the money market has had a beneficial influence on the English stock market. Business has been more active than for some time past, and prices have further improved, though the highest price of the week was not sustained at the close. The brokers are now operating with more freedom; still they are restrained to a certain degree by the uncertain state of affairs in most commercial circles. The foreign market, however, although fairly active as regards business, has suffered a relapse in nearly all stocks of a speculative character, but the adverse influence is chiefly to be attributed to the political relations of the various countries interested. There is an exception, however, with regard to Turkish, which show an improvement. Consols left off this evening at $88\frac{3}{8}$ to $88\frac{1}{2}$ for money, and $88\frac{1}{2}$ to $88\frac{5}{8}$ for the account, which, as compared with this day week, is a rise of $\frac{3}{8}$ per cent. Exchequer Bills are rather firmer, the March issue being at 10*s.* to 6*s.* dis., and those of June at 20*s.* to 12*s.* dis. As regards foreign securities Greek shows a decline of $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., the present quotation being $21\frac{1}{2}$ to 22. Mexican are $25\frac{5}{8}$ to $25\frac{7}{8}$, being a fall of $\frac{3}{8}$ per cent. Spanish Passives are $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. lower, and the Certificates $\frac{3}{8}$ per cent., the respective quotations being $29\frac{3}{4}$ to 30, and 13 to $13\frac{1}{4}$. Turkish Six per Cents. of 1854 are 88 to 89 ex div., being a rise of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and those of 1862 at 69 to 70, or an advance of $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The recent advices from America being again regarded as favourable to the Southern cause, the market for American Government and Railway securities has once more become exceedingly dull and heavy. The dealings this week have been greatly circumscribed, but, on the whole, prices have been fairly sustained. The transactions comprised:—United States, 1881, at 47, $47\frac{1}{2}$, 46, $47\frac{3}{4}$, 45, 44, $43\frac{1}{4}$, $43\frac{1}{2}$, $42\frac{1}{2}$, and 43 ex d.; Virginia State Six per Cents., at 28; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York section, first mortgage, 72; Erie, $100 shares, all paid, at 41, 42, and 41; and Illinois Central, $100 shares, all paid, $51\frac{1}{2}$, $52\frac{1}{2}$, 52, $50\frac{3}{4}$, and 51.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market for this security has been a steady and improving one, advancing on the receipt of good war news, followed by numerous purchases, with few variations during the week. The closing price is 64 to 66.

MERCANTILE SUSPENSIONS.

A fiat in bankruptcy was opened at Leeds District Court, on Tuesday, October 11, against James Cunliffe, shipping agent, trading under the firm of James Fort & Co. The bankrupt has disappeared. The following suspensions have been announced:—Messrs. Bendir & Co., merchants and commission agents, of Mark Lane; Mr. Louis Speltz, a commission merchant and broker, of Liverpool, with liabilities for 320,000*l.* Mr. Thomas Burrowes, of the Stock Exchange, has been declared a defaulter, and stands charged with obtaining money under false pretences. Mr. Henry Ledgard, of Wood Street, in the drapery trade, liabilities about 25,000*l.*—Mr. E. Coombe, in the Spanish trade, liabilities not stated, but they are believed to be considerable.—Messrs. Brown, Buckley, & Co., of Great Tower Street, East India brokers, liabilities about 200,000*l.*, of which about 100,000*l.* is covered by securities.—Messrs. A. Drosten & Co., of Mark Lane, in the corn trade, liabilities about 7,000*l.*—Messrs. Monninger & Denninghoff, London, commission merchants, associated with the petroleum and oil trades, liabilities said to be between 80,000*l.* and 100,000*l.*—Messrs. Cuadru, Enciso, & Co., London, in the Spanish trade, liabilities about 60,000*l.*—Messrs. Francis Gibbs & Co., of Sydney, with liabilities reaching to 140,700*l.*, of which 73,000*l.* is due to English creditors.—Messrs. Rudge, Moreira, Brothers & Co., of Great St. Helen's, in the Brazilian trade, with 100,000*l.* liabilities. Messrs. Paul Joske & Co., of London, in the wine trade, liabilities about 40,000*l.* Messrs. Bullock and Fernyhough, of Mincing Lane, colonial brokers. From the manufacturing districts, accounts have been received of numerous small failures, the majority of them being in the neighbourhood of Blackburn. At Manchester, Messrs. Barrat & Wilson, calico printers, have suspended, with liabilities extending to about 60,000*l.* From Brazil, the accounts by the mail just arrived are of a very alarming character. Four banks at Rio de Janeiro have failed; the names are Messrs. Sonto & Co., Messrs. Gomes & Filho, M. Oliveira Bello, and Messrs. Montenegro and Lima. The two first named are the largest bankers in the place. In addition to these, the suspensions are announced of ten or twelve commercial houses, most of them of high standing. From Spain, also, the accounts are very discouraging. The New York advices mention, among other failures, those of Messrs. Maxwell, Wright, and Co., of Baltimore; later accounts state that the failure is likely to be less disastrous than was first supposed. The property of the firm is said to be very large.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The prospectus has just been issued of the Colonial Trading Company (limited), with a proposed capital of 500,000*l.*, in 20,000 shares of 25*l.* each, only one-half of which are to be issued in the first instance. The object of the undertaking is to afford to manufacturers and traders in Great Britain and the colonies direct facilities not presented by any existing banking or other institution. The business, as set forth in the prospectus, will be 'the undertaking of agencies for colonial governments, merchants, manufacturers, insurance, colonial railways, mail, and other companies. Traders, either in Great Britain or the colonies, can supply their wants, through the Company, paying for same either on arrival or at such times afterwards as may be arranged. The Company will provide, at moderate rates, convenient depôts for storage, including bonded stores, sampling, show, and sale rooms. In England and abroad the Company will make temporary and other loans on merchandise, produce, and ships, and will leave the borrower the option of sale, of repayment of advances by approved bills, or of exchange of merchandise.' Branches and agencies will be established in the colonies and foreign countries, and an agreement is said to have been made with an old-established and successful firm for the transfer of its business and connections.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

The produce trade continues extremely dull in every department, purchases being made with increased reserve in consequence of the dearness of money and the renewed uneasiness that has been caused in reference to commercial credit by the recurrence of failures. The corn markets have been firmer than most others, and quite late rates have been obtained for wheats of all kinds. American flour also maintains its value; passing operations are, however, extremely small, and the firmness is attributable solely to the very moderate supplies coming forward at the moment. For seeds there is very little enquiry, and easier rates must be taken for both linseed and rapeseed, to effect sales of any amount. Oilcake offers on lower terms, American barrels 10*l.* 10*s.* to 10*l.* 15*s.*, bags 9*l.* 10*s.* to 10*l.* per ton. Provisions sell steadily, but are not active. The finest qualities of American butter command a fair sale at 112*s.* to 118*s.* Inferior sorts hang on hand. There is still a good demand for the best dairies of American cheese at 58*s.* to 62*s.* per cwt. Bacon is dull at 52*s.* to 54*s.* for singed sides. For middles, the demand is confined to the better qualities, which are scarce. Pork is very dull, as also is beef: but the stock of the latter is now very much reduced. Petroleum has declined to 2*s.* for American refined, at which only moderate parcels could be placed. Oils in general are lower; linseed offering at 34*s.*; brown rape at 41*s.* 6*d.*, and pale at 44*s.* 6*d.*; sperm is neglected, and the price is quite nominal at 64*l.* to 56*l.* per ton. Tallow continues to droop, and is about 9*d.* lower than on this day week. Sugar has been further depressed 1*s.* per cwt., and prices are now below those current prior to the late speculation; but in the present position of monetary affairs, there is no apparent disposition to take advantage of the moderate rates now ruling. A favourable feature in this market is that stocks of refined are low, and manufactured goods relatively firm. Coffee is at length participating in the prevailing dullness, and prices are tending in buyers' favour. Common black leaf teas have further declined $\frac{1}{2}$d. per pound, and large parcels continue to be brought to public sale. Rice is neglected. Fine saltpetre sells at 29*s.* 1*d.* with short prompt. The spice trade has undergone very little change except that there is even less doing, and East India ginger is again cheaper, Bengal selling at 39*s.*, and Cochin at 61*s.* and 67*s.* The jute market shows renewed depression, prices to-day having further given way 15*s.* and 30*s.* per ton; common to fine may now be quoted 9*l.* 0*s.* to 25*l.* 10*s.* Hemp is nominally unaltered. The metal trade is stagnant, and sales are almost impracticable, even at decidedly lower prices. Spelter offers at 22*l.*; Straits tin at 96*l.*, and Scotch pig iron at 50*s.* 3*d.* cash.

Liverpool, Wednesday, October 19.—In the early part of the week our cotton market was greatly depressed and irregular, but within the last day or two there has been rather more doing, and prices slightly improved. Still business generally is very flat, and at present there does not appear any reason to anticipate a permanent improvement. It is considered in some quarters that for some time to come the lowest price of cotton has been touched, but certainly this is not the general impression. To-day, in consequence of adverse news from Manchester, the market has been extremely dull and depressed. The sales this week have reached 32,000 bales, of which 13,000 were on speculation and for export. The total sales this year have been 2,043,547 bales, and to the same period in 1863 they were 2,108,204 bales. There have been imported this year 1,798,446 bales, and to the same period last year 1,233,861 bales. The trade have taken this year 1,247,558 bales; and to the corresponding period in 1863, 1,094,571 bales. The exports this year have been 456,152 bales; last year they were 396,504 bales. There have been taken on speculation this year 312,556 bales; same in 1863, 585,244 bales. The estimated stocks at the present time are 382,150 bales; at the corresponding period last year they were 162,634 bales. During the week American cotton has been sold at 2*d.* per lb. lower than on the week previous; Egyptian, about the same; Brazil and Bahia, 1*d.* per lb. decline; East India, from $1\frac{1}{4}$d. to 2*d.*; and China, from $\frac{1}{2}$d. to 1*d.*; but from this decline there has since been a fractional recovery. The quotations this afternoon were:—American descriptions, according to quality, $19\frac{3}{4}$d. to $24\frac{1}{4}$d.; Pernambuco, $23\frac{3}{4}$d. to 24*d.*; Maceio, $21\frac{1}{4}$d. to $21\frac{1}{2}$d.; Bahia, 21*d.* to $21\frac{1}{4}$d.; Egyptian, $12\frac{1}{4}$d. to 29*d.*; Smyrna, $14\frac{1}{2}$d. to $15\frac{3}{4}$d.; Surat, $8\frac{3}{4}$d. to $16\frac{1}{4}$d.; Bengal, $9\frac{1}{2}$d. to $11\frac{1}{4}$d.; Scinde, $9\frac{1}{2}$d. to 11*d.*; and China, $11\frac{3}{4}$d. to 13*d.*

For the last two days very great depression has prevailed in all the Manchester markets, and it has been the more severely felt in consequence of manufacturers anticipating that the worst was passed, and that the lowest prices have been touched, and an attempt was in consequence made by many of the manufacturers to advance the selling price of cloths from 1*d.* to 2*d.* per lb., but buyers would not submit to any advance, but would only give orders at a further reduction. In shipping yarns there has been very little business doing, and prices close with a tendency to a further decline. In home trade yarns the rumours of further failures have had a very depressing influence; there is evidently a general want of confidence, which causes quotations to be very unfavourable. There has been very little doing in cloths, and manufacturers find great difficulty in effecting sales. Some few transactions are recorded at fair prices, but in general terms are lower. The telegraphic advices from India just to hand are very unfavourable. The markets there are reported to have been paralysed by the bad accounts to hand from England. The latest quotations were:—Cloths, $\frac{7}{8}$ Grey Printers, 6*s.* 6*d.* to 13*s.* 3*d.*; $\frac{9}{8}$ Grey Madapollams, 5*s.* 9*d.* to 8*s.* 9*d.*; $\frac{9}{8}$ Grey Printers, 8*s.* 9*d.* to 15*s.* 9*d.*; $\frac{4}{4}$ Grey Shirtings, 10*s.* 3*d.* to 22*s.*; Water Twist, No. 20, 1*s.* 7*d.* to 2*s.* 3*d.*; No. 30, 2*s.* to 2*s.* 6*d.*; and No. 40, 2*s.* 6*d.* to 3*s.*; Mule Twist, No. 20, 1*s.* 5*d.* to 2*s.* $0\frac{1}{2}$d.; No. 30, 1*s.* $7\frac{1}{2}$d. to 2*s.* 3*d.*; No. 40, 1*s.* 10*d.* to 2*s.* 6*d.*; No. 50, 2*s.* 1*d.* to 2*s.* 9*d.*; No. 60, 2*s.* 4*d.* to 2*s.* 11*d.*; No. 70, 2*s.* 7*d.* to 3*s.* 1*d.*; No. 80, 2*s.* 9*d.* to 3*s.* 3*d.*; No. 90, 2*s.* 11*d.* to 3*s.* 5*d.*; and No. 100, 3*s.* 2*d.* to 3*s.* 11*d.*

A MISSION TO DAHOMEY.

This Day is ready, at all the Libraries, in 2 vols., with Illustrations,

A MISSION TO DAHOMEY: Being a Three Months' Residence at the Court of Dahomey, in which are described the Manners and Customs of the Country, including the Human Sacrifice, &c.

By Captain R. F. BURTON,

Late H. M. Commissioner to Dahomey, and the Author of 'A Pilgrimage to El Medinah and Meccah.'

From the Times, October 5.

'Captain Burton, that exemplar of modern travel in its widest sense and its most interesting phases, has recently returned from the mission with which he was accredited by Her Majesty's Government to the King of Dahome, and now gives the story of that mission and the results of his experience in the form of two handsome and acceptable volumes for the edification and enjoyment of his expectant fellow-countrymen. His direct charge, as stated by Lord John Russell, was to confirm the friendly sentiments expressed by Commodore Wilmot to the King on the occasion o. the visit which he made to that chief in December and January, 1862. Thus, Captain Burton took with him the necessary instructions and presents, and passed three months in the country and capital of Dahome in communication with the remarkable potentate who governs that peculiarly interesting community. He witnessed the grand customs and the yearly customs of that grotesquely ceremonious people, including the evolutions of their army of "Amazons," and the traces of their cruel human sacrifices, of which he himself, with proper taste, declined to be an actual spectator; and he brought away impressions of the Dahoman proclivities which are really very curious and instructive, though they were not very satisfactory to himself nor to be commended to the imitation of the gentle philanthropists who patronise the Dahomans or their congeners under the fallacious impression that they can ever be elevated up to the same level of being as themselves. Captain Burton's book is a rude but honest blow to delusions of this kind, and speaks for his courage and candour in the exposition of the conclusions to which he has come in virtue of an ample experience, in which he has had few, and perhaps we may add scarcely any, equal competitors.'

THERE are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17 Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24 Rue Lord Byron.

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

THE most significant feature in the news brought by the Asia is an omission. Is Mr. Stanton sick? Has he turned traitor to his party? After for many weeks manufacturing victories with singular boldness and rapidity, the supply stops at the most critical juncture. We have an important budget of news, but we look in vain for a Federal triumph. A mail goes out to Europe, and Mr. Stanton's pen does not kill fifty thousand Confederates and win a great battle. Perhaps Mr. Lincoln has bidden the invincible Stanton to rest upon his laurels, deeming the discomfiture of his political rival certain, or because he is resolved, if the people are so disloyal as to put him in a minority, that he will throw the sword into the scale, and so continue to reign. But there is another reason for the remarkable omission. The military situation is awkward. Mr. Stanton could not invent a victory without the most stupid dupe in the country seeing that it was a bogus victory. It was manifest, for example, that Grant was 'advancing by his rear,' and under such circumstances the most fervid 'loyalty' could hardly believe that Grant was advancing on Richmond. However, the election is at hand, but not yet over, and before the event is decided we doubt not that Mr. Stanton will add a score or two to the thousand and one victories already gained by his terrific pen.

ON the 7th inst. a battle took place on the Charles City Road, which resulted in the capture of all the positions held by the Federals between that point and the Newmarket Road. The Confederates took 500 prisoners, 300 horses, and drove the enemy within the works of Fort Harrison. The loss of the Confederates was small, but we regret to add that it included General Gregg, who died at the head of the Texas brigade, which he led into action.

Sheridan has retired to Strasburg. A letter in the New York Daily News says that his losses were so heavy, and his position so serious, as to cause General Grant to return to Harper's Ferry. Sheridan's military failure will not be compensated for by the burning of mills, barns, and farming implements.

General Burbidge admits that he was defeated at Saltville with heavy loss, and had to retreat precipitately. Altogether the news from the Old Dominion is highly favourable to the Confederates.

General Sherman reports that the Confederates have captured the garrisons at Big Shanty and Ackworth, and held some miles of the railroad. Later intelligence informs us that the Confederates have captured Dalton. On the 8th inst. Sherman writes, 'I am watching him (Hood) in case he tries to reach Kingston or Rome.' The Southern papers report that Rome has been taken. Sherman says that he has abundance of provisions at Atlanta, and it is fortunate for him, for his communications are interrupted. He observes, 'Atlanta is perfectly secure to us, and the army is better off than in camp.' Likely enough the army is safer in inactivity; but to remain inactive is not to pursue the work of conquest. It is not very promising when an invading army is on the defensive.

General Price, having for a few days been before Jefferson City, is moving northward destroying bridges of the Pacific railroad. General Forrest is said to be 'escaping across the Tennessee River,' which means that he is successfully carrying out his campaign, and that the Federals have no effective force to oppose to him. An attempt to dispute the passage of the Tennessee River resulted in the defeat of the Federals, with the loss of their transports and all their artillery. Unless there is a sudden change in the fortune of the war, Mr. Lincoln will not go to the polls with a halo of victory.

AFTER being long disabled by his wounds, General Longstreet is in the field. He is in command of the troops lately under General Early. The last-named gallant officer is not replaced from any dissatisfaction with his conduct, and will not have much breathing-time from active service.

GENERAL BEAUREGARD has been appointed to the command of the Department of Tennessee and Georgia, and the Department of Alabama, Mississippi, and East Louisiana. Generals Hood and Taylor will retain the command of their respective armies, though, as the Department commander and ranking officer, General Beauregard will repair to any part of his command at will where he deems his presence necessary. It has not transpired where General Beauregard will fix his headquarters.

THE Federal General Sheridan, with characteristic effrontery, boasts that in his recent retreat to Strasburg he devastated a wide region lying between the Blue Ridge and the North Mountains of Virginia, destroying two thousand barns and seventy mills, with a vast quantity of hay, farming implements, meal and flour. Such energy in destruction will call forth the cordial approval of his Government and endear him to the heart of the Yankee people. That it is not legitimate warfare—that any European general who should have committed such an outrage would have been branded as an enemy of the human race—is of no consequence to them. They will say as the French said at Balaklava, Ce n'est pas la guerre, mais c'est magnifique! It is not every general that can work a famine over a hundred square miles of territory. But General Sheridan did more. He burned down every human habitation within a radius of five miles of the spot where a subordinate officer of his command—one who had been shot by the Confederates for participation in the devastation of the mills and barns—met his just doom. The work of Southern conquest goes bravely on indeed, and the unhappy people of the ruined district, whose dwellings have been burnt over their heads, will, of course, hereafter become excellent citizens of the restored Union. Let Sheridan have his due measure of credit for 'reconstructing' by demolition, and inspiring love for the Union by fire and sword.

THE death of Roger B. Taney, Chief Justice of the United States, which occurred at Washington on the night of the 12th instant, is an event which would have produced a profound impression in the days of the old Union, but which will be received with indifference now by the mass of the people. To the Government it will give satisfaction, for by so well-timed a departure the Chief Justice has afforded President Lincoln the opportunity of appointing his successor. Judge Taney belonged, indeed, to the purer and better age of the Republic. To much learning he added a rare equanimity of temper, and his courtesy and dignity on the bench were not more remarkable than the fearlessness with which he uttered and the firmness with which he maintained his opinions. To no one would the justum et tenacem propositi virum more fitly apply than to this venerable man, who was unawed by popular clamour, and unseduced by executive patronage. His decision in the Dred-Scott case and his more recent dictum in upholding the rights of the citizen against military despotism in Baltimore, rendered him the subject of obloquy and hatred in the North, and his last days were saddened by the mournful spectacle of liberty overthrown and law outraged by a reckless dominant faction. But his name will live in association with that of John Marshall, whose ermine he wore so purely and so well. Chief Justice Taney had attained the advanced age of ninety-four. He lived and died in the tenets of the Roman Catholic faith.

The accession of a Black Republican to the bench of the Supreme Court vice the late Chief Justice, will make that high tribunal the mere servant for recording the foreordained fiat of a party in any case involving the rights of the States. And all who think the Southern people could have committed their liberties safely to the arbitration of such a tribunal will now see how worse than futile would have been the hope of having the balance evenly held in matters that were as near to them as life itself. The Supreme Court was a mockery of justice in all sectional disputes, and must ever have been so by reason of the very nature of its organisation and the mode of appointment of its members.

ANOTHER remarkable letter is published in the American papers from Francis P. Blair, bearing date at Silver Spring, October 5, 1864, which permits us to see something of what is going on behind the scenes in the intrigues of the Presidential campaign. This letter was not captured by Confederate cavalry, but is given to the public by Mr. Blair himself, to set Mr. Lincoln right on the question of his having offered a command to General M'Clellan if that gentleman would but withdraw his claims as a candidate for the Presidency. Mr. Blair tells us that he went to New York as a self-appointed commissioner in the interests of harmony among the friends of the Union, just as Kirk, alias Gilmore, and the melancholy Jacques went to Richmond on the blessed errand of peace, and, like Kirk and Jacques, he had no authority to speak for Mr. Lincoln at all. Oh, no! The President had no knowledge whatever that he had left Silver Spring, and what he said to the New York editors and politicians was wholly on his own personal responsibility. Some tender interviews he held with the amiable Bryant, the philosophic Greeley, and the incorruptible Bennett, and with General M'Clellan he had the pleasure of a long and free conversation, in which he certainly gave the General to understand that if he would resign all aspirations for the Presidency, and write to the President asking a command, that command would be given him. General M'Clellan promised to ponder the propositions of Blair, but pleaded the domestic trouble of a sick child in the country as a probable bar to a second interview. Mr. Blair returned to Washington and made known to President Lincoln the results of his mission, who received them kindly and courteously, but without indicating approval or disapprobation. It seems clear enough that Blair did not make this offer to M'Clellan without an assurance from some quarter that it would have been ratified at Washington in case it was accepted; but M'Clellan was astute enough to decline. That's all.

WE give in another column the address recently issued to the people of the United States by the Democratic Central Committee, as a part of the political history of the times. The address is signed by the Hon. Auguste Belmont, a gentleman of very high consideration in the councils of his party, and well-known as having filled the important position of Minister Plenipotentiary at the Hague during the Administration of President Buchanan. The Central Committee speaks for the whole party, and this address commands, therefore, a larger degree of attention than would the speech or letter of any individual Democrat, however distinguished he might be.

THE council of war recently convened at New Orleans for the examination of the Confederate General Page, charged with destroying the works, armament, and munitions of Fort Morgan after he had surrendered, has acquitted him. The findings of the council were approved by General Canby. The council reported the facts in the case to be, that the white flag was hoisted on the glacis of Fort Morgan about the hour of six o'clock on the morning of the 23rd of August last; that no public property was destroyed after that time; that the spare gun carriages were destroyed by chopping and sawing several days before the surrender.

THE elections recently held in Ohio, Indiana, and Pennsylvania, would seem to indicate the triumph of the Republican party, though both sides claim to have gained the advantage, and further returns are needed to settle the matter beyond dispute. In Pennslyvania, it is said that the Republicans prevailed by a very small majority in the home vote, which it was expected would be swelled to 15,000 by the vote of the army.

THE value of greenbacks has rapidly decreased. On the 13th the price of gold at New York was 209. We need hardly remark that these violent fluctuations must completely disorganise business.

ENGLAND.

THREE men of some note in the political world have addressed their constituents on foreign and domestic politics during the past week. We have elsewhere commented on their orations. In this place it will be sufficient to quote such portion of their speeches as had relation to the American war.

Lord Stanley, M.P. for King's Lynn, said on that subject:—'Neither party, as I believe, is half beaten yet; and considering the determination which the North has shown, I think it likely, as I did three years ago, that with its enormous superiority of force it will occupy and overrun in the end the whole territory of the South. The North may succeed so far as to gratify its feeling of revenge and its desire for supremacy; but when it has done that its political difficulties will begin. I cannot realise the manner in which a Republican community of 20,000,000 is to hold, consistently with its own principles of government, or, indeed, with any principles of government, another community of 6,000,000 or 7,000,000 utterly disaffected to its rule. That is the real perplexity of the American future. As to the drain of men and money, I do not attach much weight to it. The overflow of Europe will fill up all gaps in the population, and although I should be myself equally sorry to be a creditor either of the North or of the South, yet a country with the gigantic natural resources of America cannot be permanently ruined. All we can do, all we ought to do, is to let them fight it out.

Mr. Bernal Osborne, M.P. for Liskeard, said:—'I say, that we have pursued a right course towards America, and that we have no business to interfere. That war was to be lamented for the sake of our common humanity; but at the same time as Englishmen we cannot help remembering that those people, upon both sides, who are showing this indomitable perseverance, and making this stupendous struggle—that those people are descended from ourselves. We must feel pride in that. The reason they have to fight is great; for if the Southern States are separated from the North the greatness of America is set for ever. Therefore it is a great struggle; I can fully understand it; I can fully enter into it; but I can give no opinion as to the result. Looking at it as a sensible man—looking at all the circumstances, I cannot help thinking that, however long the contest may be, it must be like that of two gladiators in the arena, with whom, science being equal, weight will tell, and I believe the North will eventually make a solitude and call it peace. It is not for us to vindicate either party; it is for us to stand by and be as little offensive to either as we are capable of being.'

The Solicitor-General (Sir R. P. Collier, M.P. for Plymouth) addressed himself at considerable length to the policy of neutrality adopted by the Government. He eulogised the conduct of the Northern prize courts, and said that no great cause of complaint against them existed. But he thought that the number of Irish emigrants entrapped into the military service of the Northern States 'by means employed no doubt merely by subordinate officers, he did not say by the responsible officials of the American Government,' furnished matter of complaint. He justified the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government in the prosecution of the Alexandra and the detention of the steam rams; and he quoted Mr. Baring as an authority for the assertion that the Foreign Enlistment Act and such seizures under it did not press hardly on traders. He repudiated with indignant scorn the pretence that the trading classes of this country were fairly represented by a few contraband traders, whose interest was directly opposed to the interests of the great mass of the community, and whose gain was in the loss and calamity of their country. He did not propose to speak on the general question of the American war. As to its future he would not attempt to prophesy. It was very easy to utter a prophecy, and it was impossible to contradict it at the time, but events might contradict it in the future. He would do no more, therefore, than express the hope which he most fervently entertained, that out of this horrible strife, out of this immense amount of evil and suffering, almost unparalleled in the history of the world, God in his own time would educe that great good—the abolition of slavery.

THE colliers' strike in South Staffordshire, after the temporary lull mentioned last week, has broken out with renewed fury. On the Monday and Tuesday following the meeting at which the committee abnegated its functions, nearly the whole of the pits in the Bilston district were at work. The Tipton and Dudley districts, to some extent, followed this example. However, on Wednesday matters took a different turn; a large party of men assembled before daybreak with drums and bands, and marched through Deepfields and Tipton on their way to Bilston. The superintendent of the county constabulary, accompanied by a force of policemen, followed them, and barred their road whenever they attempted to diverge towards the pits. On the next day the demonstration assumed a more threatening aspect. Three large bodies of men, all armed with sticks, and marshalled in order with the precision of soldiers, marched to Earl Dudley's pit, on the Dudley and Tipton road, with the determination of driving the working colliers out of those mines. At the point where the road to the pit joined the main road, Major M'Knight, the deputy chief constable, with twenty-five policemen, confronted them. The colliers raised a furious shout and charged. The small body of police drew their cutlasses, and after a short mêlée repulsed the colliers, capturing 19 men, who were at once conveyed to Bilston and locked up. Later in the day intelligence was brought that 6,000 colliers from Tipton, armed with sticks, were marching to a meeting at Dudley. The 19 captured colliers were brought up before the magistrates, and remanded for a week. On the same day the Lord Lieutenant of the county, the Earl of Lichfield, sent to Birmingham for 80 Lancers. During the two following days the Lancers rode through the district to show that the military force was ready for any emergency. A meeting of no less than 15,000 persons has been held at Tipton, at which speeches of an excited character were delivered. A vote of censure was passed on the police for their violence, and a strong determination to 'stand out' was expressed. It was also resolved to employ counsel to defend the 19 prisoners.

M. LEPROVOST is intent on rescuing our bodies and saving our feelings from railway outrages. He has invented a carriage which differs from the present style of English railway carriages in the single particular that a longitudinal passage runs from one end of the train to the other. Along this passage an official can parade at ease, ready to render assistance in all emergencies. Persons seated in one compartment can neither see nor be seen by those seated in the adjoining compartment. He has therefore attempted to frame an article which, while permitting the English or French traveller to enjoy solitude, will save him from the violence of a mad or a murderous companion. M. Leprovost is scarcely ingenious, and he is assuredly not admirable. Perhaps he imagined that a close resemblance between the railway carriage and the police van would raise such unpleasant associations in the mind of a 'ticket-of-leave' traveller as to deter him from criminal enterprise. Switzerland, or, for the matter of that, the Great Eastern Railway in this country, can furnish designs more worthy of imitation than the marvellous contrivance of M. Leprovost.

ACCORDING to the returns of the Board of Trade it appears that, in the year 1863, the number of passengers killed on the railways in the United Kingdom was 35, and the number wounded was 401. Of the former list no less than 21 were killed by accidents arising from their own misconduct or want of caution. Of the remaining 14 deaths, 7 were caused by a heifer which had strayed on the line, and which almost succeeded in refuting the dictum of George Stephenson. Inasmuch as 64,391 season-ticket holders and 204,635,075 ordinary passengers were conveyed, it follows that only 1 out of 14,615,362 was killed by causes beyond the control of the individual; while the injured from similar causes were as 1 in 511,587. The total number of passenger trains was 2,917,660, and therefore a death occurred in 1 passenger train out of 486,276, and an injury in 1 train out of 59,544. To take another calculation, we may suppose all the trains to pass one spot at an interval of one minute. In such case, 337 days and nights would elapse before one of the six trains in which fatal accidents beyond the control of the killed persons came up, and 41 days and nights would elapse before a train destined to cause an injury beyond the control of the injured came up. Indeed, the mere fact of travelling on a railway is conducive to the preservation of life. For lightning killed 18 people in England and Wales alone, while, exclusive of suicidal acts, 2,463 persons were drowned, 1,219 suffocated, 216 poisoned, 111 shot, and 5,397 killed by fractures and contusions in one year. But the worst yet remains to be told. The streets of London kill at a frightful rate. No less than 25 persons were killed in the last 21 days of September 1863, and September is a month in which the traffic is comparatively slight. Even at this rate, which is a bad rate for obtaining a correct sum, 433 persons would be killed by street accidents in one year—that is, more than 31 times as many as were killed by railway accidents 'beyond control.'

SOME weeks since an application was made to Her Majesty's Government requesting permission to ship forty tons of coal on board the Federal ship Sacramento at Dover. In reply, Earl Russell informed the United States Minister that as it appeared that this vessel had been furnished with eighty-seven and a half tons of coal at Cork on July 29, and with a further supply of twenty-five tons at Plymouth on August 17, Her Majesty's Government could not permit the Sacramento to be again coaled at any port in the United Kingdom until the expiration of three months from the last date. The Commissioners of Customs have issued a circular to the outports, calling attention to the case of a supply of coal to a Federal steamer under an evasion of the law. The cargo was shipped on board a vessel at a British port without due clearance by the proper officers of customs, and the cargo was received out at sea on board a Federal ship-of-war.

THE sporting world has witnessed the last great two-year-old race and the last great handicap of the year, and nothing now remains for speculation or entertainment but to watch the efforts of shrewd owners to make a few hundred pounds to keep things going during the idleness of winter. On Monday last, in addition to the spectacle of a disastrous defeat of Mr. R. Ten Broeck's Paris by General Peel in a match for 500*l.*, there was the excitement of the Criterion Stakes. This race, with sixty-three subscribers of 30*l.* each, is run over a course of 5 furlongs and 182 yards, and the running ground, occupying that portion of the heath which lies nearest to the town of Newmarket, is stretched on a decided incline. Fifteen animals came to the post, and Lord Westmoreland's Brahma was made the favourite at 2 to 1. The odds of 3 to 1 were betted against the pair of Count F. de Lagrange, Le Mandarin and Gladiateur, 6 to 1 against the Duke of Beaufort's Koenig, 8 to 1 against the Duc de Morny's Monitor, and 10 to 1 against Mr. Naylor's Chattanooga. In the event the race was left to Chattanooga, Brahma, and Monitor, who drew away entirely from the ruck, Chattanooga winning by two lengths, and Brahma defeating Monitor by the like distance for second place. Chattanooga is the son of the veteran Orlando and Ayacanora. The latter mare is the daughter of the famous Pocahontas, and therefore sister to Stockwell, Rataplan, and King Tom. Indeed, now-a-days the record of racing is but a history of the triumphs of the descendants of Pocahontas. On the following day the Cambridgeshire Stakes attracted enormous crowds of visitors to Newmarket Heath. This race is a handicap sweepstakes of 25*l.* each with 100*l.* added. Horses struck out immediately after the publication of the weights are only mulcted in a penalty of 5*l.* Eighty nominations availed themselves of this right, forty-nine animals came to the post, and the remainder paid 10*l.* forfeit. The original number of subscribers was 221. The course, a distance of one mile and 240 yards, is, from the nature of the ground, unrivalled for severity, and the last five furlongs are those which constitute the Criterion course. The position of Mr. W. Robinson's Gratitude in the Cesarewitch race, where she only succumbed by a head to Lord Coventry's mare, had directed universal attention to her chances, but on the morning of the race Lord Wilton's Stockinger was made favourite at 100 to 30; the odds of 5 to 1 were laid against Gratitude; 6 to 1 against Lord Stamford's Brick, who, as a three-year-old, promised marvels of success, but was debarred from fulfilment or failure by an accident; 100 to 8 against Lord Strathmore's Saccharometer, the handsome son of Sweetmeat, whose fortune in early youth gave promise of greater deeds in mature age; 100 to 8 likewise against a colt by Daniel O'Rourke, out of Highflyer's dam; 100 to 7 against Ackworth; and 100 to 1 against Baron Rothschild's famous mare Tomato. One hour was consumed in vain efforts to effect a start of forty-nine horses all eager to secure a good place in a short and scrambling contest; but at length the patience of the public was rewarded by the fall of the flag to an admirable advance. At a quarter of a mile from home Gratitude appeared in front, with Ackworth, Tomato, and the Highflyer colt in close company. At the cords Gratitude resigned the contest; Ackworth and Tomato joined in single combat, and after a most splendid struggle the Baron's mare succumbed to Ackworth by a head; the Highflyer colt was beaten by three lengths, Columbia was fourth, and Gratitude fifth. The favourite Stockinger was nowhere, and Brick ran only half a mile. Ackworth, who was sold a fortnight since by Mr. Harry Hill to the Marquis of Hastings, after running into the third place for the Cesarewitch stakes, is the son of Lord Derby's Fazzoletto and Consternation. It is said that Lord Hastings has won 30,000*l.* on the race.

THE November session of the Central Criminal Court was commenced on Monday last. The Recorder of London, Russell Gurney, Esq., in charging the Grand Jury, recapitulated the substance of the depositions against Franz Müller on the charge of murdering Mr. Briggs.

The trial of Müller is to take place this day.

The counsel for the Crown are the Solicitor-General, Mr. Serjeant Ballantine, Mr. Hannen, Mr. Giffard, and Mr. Beasley. The counsel for the prisoner are Mr. Serjeant Parry, Mr. Metcalfe, and Mr. Besley.

The Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer is the presiding Judge.

There is no doubt that Afzul Khan is a prisoner in the hands of his brother the Ameer; and it is affirmed that the former is in irons in the Fort of Tasharghur.

It is now stated that Sir Charles Trevelyan will not resign his office of Finance Minister.

The Bombay Legislative Council has passed a Bill for the suppression of time bargains.

AUSTRALIA.

The colony of Victoria has exported 919,341 ounces of gold during the first six months of the present year. This sum must be diminished by the subtraction of the product of the New Zealand mines, and increased by the added quantity of deposits in the Treasury and the banks during the same period, namely, 1,133 ounces. The net yield of the Victorian gold-fields was therefore 759,461 ounces. The average number of miners in the half-year was 83,175, of whom 60,067 were Europeans and 23,108 were Chinese. If then the value of the gold be taken at 4*l.* per ounce, the average weekly earnings of each man will be 1*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.* As compared with the first six months of 1863, there is a falling off in the yield, owing to the diminished number of hands, but an increase in the earnings per man. In the first six months of that year the number of miners was 92,292, and the total yield 1,578,079 ounces.

NEW ZEALAND.

The published despatches of Lieutenant-General Cameron furnish additional particulars with reference to the submission of the Tauranga tribe. No operations were undertaken against the natives subsequently to June 7. On July 25, 133 natives of Tauranga, including some chiefs of rank, delivered up their arms to Colonel Greer, commanding in that district, and signed a declaration of allegiance to the Queen, leaving their lands at the disposal of the Governor. A request was further made that Sir George Grey, the Governor, would meet the natives at Tauranga to arrange the terms of submission; and it was expected that W. Thompson and other chiefs would be present, but it was not to be hoped that all the tribes would give in their adhesion to pacific measures. The Governor has issued an address to the natives, the style and manner of which are sufficiently curious to merit quotation:—

Sir George Grey's Address to the Hostile Natives of Tauranga on August 6, 1864.

At present I am not acquainted with the boundaries or extent of your lands, or with the claims of individuals or tribes. What I shall therefore do is this. I shall order that settlements shall at once be assigned to you as far as possible in such localities as you may select, which shall be secured by Crown grants to yourselves and your children. When this has been done and the boundaries of your lands have been ascertained, I will inform you in what manner the residue of your lands will be dealt with; but as it is right in some measure to mark our sense of the honourable manner in which you conducted hostilities, neither robbing nor murdering, but respecting the wounded, I promise you that in the ultimate settlement of your lands the amount taken shall not exceed one-fourth of the whole land. And in order that you may, without delay, again be placed in a position which will enable you to maintain yourselves, as soon as your future location has been decided seed potatoes and the means of settling on your lands will be given you.

I now speak to the friendly natives. I thank you warmly for your good conduct under circumstances of great difficulty. I will consider in what manner you shall be rewarded for your fidelity. In the meantime, in any arrangements which may be made about the lands of your tribe, your rights will be scrupulously respected.

(Signed) G. Grey.

Tauranga, August 6, 1864.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

The Governor has stated that the Home Government will shortly decide whether Caffraria shall be incorporated with the Cape Colony. The difficulties to be encountered in the execution of the project are the persuading the Caffrarians that union with the Cape Colonists would be to their own advantage; the redistribution of the franchise in such a manner as at once to represent the Kaffrarians and to secure the influence of the midland and western districts, and further the means of defending the frontier; and the civilisation of the savage tribes beyond the border. The natives, at the latest advices, had shown no disposition to rise, and the commander of the forces was at Grahamstown. A rich harvest was expected, trade was good, money plentiful, and provisions cheap.

THE CONTINENT.

FRANCE.

The Czar and Czarina of Russia left Darmstadt on the 18th inst. to proceed to Nice, where Her Majesty intends to pass the winter. They were welcomed on their arrival in French territory at Mulhouse by General Fleury, aide-de-camp to the Emperor of the French. They arrived at Marseilles on the 21st, and passed the night in that city; they did not, however, stay to examine the magnificent works of the new port, which might excite the envy of the greatest monarch in the universe, but left early on the morning of the following day. They were received with all due honours at Nice by the French authorities and the Russian visitors. Their Majesties are of course travelling under the strictest incognito: the Czar being anonymous, and the Czarina bearing the title of Countess Borodinska. A Russian frigate is on its way to Civita Vecchia to take the Crown Prince of Russia to Nice after his visit to Rome. Nothing seems to be clearly known as to the future movements of the Emperor of France. Report says that he will shortly pay a visit to Nice, and that the Czar will go to Compiegne on his way back to St. Petersburg.

Quite a panic has been created among the holders of certain French stock by a rumour that the Treasury were preparing to sell up all the certificates of the last loan, the payments on which were in arrears. To this it was added that a serious diminution of bullion had taken place during the last week in the Bank of France, to the extent of about 15,000,000 francs; and lastly, that the Government were intending to put out a fresh loan. The effect of these reports was so mischievous that all the official and semi-official organs were obliged to contradict all three points categorically. They said, with regard to the first, that the arrears in the instalments of the last loan were too insignificant to require such a measure; as to the second, that, so far from a diminution, there was a slight increase in the bank stock; and as to the third, they denied it positively.

The Franco-Italian Convention being practically done with for the present, the papers have begun to discuss the revived question of a Congress, building their hypotheses upon a letter which the Emperor is supposed to have written to M. Rouher on that subject. It is said that this communication urges the expediency of assembling a Congress for the sake of adjusting existing differences, and arriving at a pacific solution of the present serious difficulties. The general reduction of European armaments is also advocated. It does not yet appear that any more practical details of the proposed Congress have been suggested, and until that is done the idea is of the most barren description. A Congress in the abstract may be a very beautiful object, but a Congress of statesmen assembled without anything definite to talk about verges on the ridiculous.

The Convention will be discussed both in the French Senate and in the Chamber. It will be supported in the former by the Cardinal Archbishop of Paris, in his maiden speech; in the latter by M. Jules Favre, the great lawyer of the Opposition. It will be curious to see how far the arguments of the Churchman and the Liberal will refute each other while directed towards the same object.

The statue representing the town of Lille on the Place de la Concorde has been mutilated by an individual of whom it is only charitable to suspect that he is insane. At 3 o'clock in the afternoon, in the midst of the bustle and traffic of the day, he was seen to clamber up the pedestal with great activity, snatch the heavy iron sword from the hand of the statue, and smash with vigorous blows the face of the figure; then, after breaking one of the arms and a foot, he demolished at one blow the mural crown with which the head is adorned. The crowd around then succeeded in stopping his fury; he broke through them, and attempted to escape by flight, but was caught by a sergent-de-ville, and lodged in durance vile.

Never was the plea of extenuating circumstances, for the abuse of which so many a sneer has been directed against French justice, so evidently applicable as in the awful crime which we are about to relate. Two young people were walking along the high road on a fine evening in autumn, the girl leaning on the arm of her swain and listening to the unconscious poetry of his conversation. Their course took them by the side of a lovely garden, in which they could see the roses in full bloom. 'What exquisite roses! and how I should like one of them!' was the natural expression of feminine wonder and acquisitiveness. The enamoured youth without a word climbed the wall, leaped down into the garden, and with open knife was preparing to attack the devoted flowers when, enter the watchman, who collars the lover, and drags him off to justice, leaving the lady, like the Peri at the gate, all weeping and disconsolate. The luckless swain was accused of robbery in the night-time, accompanied by forcible entrance over a wall into an inhabited house close to the high road, while the open knife was produced to prove premeditated violence. Every point required by the Code Pénal to form the gravest offence known short of murder was amply proved; the penalty is penal servitude for life. We await with anxiety the result of the trial.

A measure is now in the course of preparation to provide against the gradual destruction of land on the slopes of the Alps. The evil against which it is directed ill illustrates curiously the effect of the inconsiderate and short-sighted progress of civilisation. These slopes have been from time immemorial pasture-lands, of no very great value, but still sufficient from their size to support very large flocks and herds. As the modern ideas of agriculture gained ground, the pastures were turned into arable land, and thoroughly ploughed up. Then came some of those torrents of rain for which the slopes of mountains are proverbial, and lo! the land loosened by the plough, and kneaded by the rain into one immense and slippery mass, glided quietly off the rock on which it rested into the plain below, leaving the proprietor to get what crops he could from the bare stone. This phenomenon was early observed; steps were taken to check the practice of ploughing the slopes in the year 1669, and the salutary measures remained in force till 1791. In that year all such legislative restrictions were abolished as so many fetters on the liberty of the subject. The evil reappeared with all its accompanying miseries. Not only was the higher land absolutely destroyed, but the plains also suffered from the unwelcome acquisition of a new layer of soil, the cattle diminished for want of pasture, and the inhabitants died or were forced to emigrate through famine. It is now absolutely necessary to revise the laws of 1669 framed by the great Colbert. The whole of the mountain slopes are to be put under forest law; it will be forbidden to cut wood there except under certain restrictions, and even the cattle are to be kept off them until a new soil is completely formed. When a strong growth of trees and underwood has bound the land well together, sheep will be admitted into the steeper pastures, and heavier cattle into those where their weight will be of less risk. The one animal which will be completely excluded is the goat: this creature is so destructive both to woodland and pasture, in consequence of its fatal predilection for the bark of trees and its habit of uprooting every plant of grass the blades of which it nibbles, that it has long been forbidden in the forest. Even now in many parts of Switzerland the number of goats in a community is limited to one to each person, and even then must be led out to pasture with a cord.

The French are a military people with a vengeance. A private in the 16th Foot has been condemned to death for the following crime. He was on duty in the guard-room at Dieppe on August 15, the fête day of the Emperor, on which occasion double rations are served out to the soldiers. Not content with these, however, he and his comrades subscribed and sent for some more cognac to drink His Majesty's health. When the turn of Julien Guyonnet came to go on sentry duty, he was a little elevated; however, he took his firelock and went. A quarter of an hour had not elapsed before he appeared again, and on being ordered by the corporal to return to his duty, he laughed and declined, saying that on that day the Emperor wished all his soldiers to enjoy themselves. Of course such insubordination was not to be endured. The corporal repeated his order, but was answered by insult. At last the drunken man became violent, and attacked his superior officer; it was then necessary to carry him off and put him in irons. He was brought before a court-martial at Rouen, who, after hearing the evidence, found him guilty, and condemned him to death: nothing less would satisfy the offended majesty of military discipline. The sentence has been confirmed by the Superior Council, and now nothing stands between the wretched toper and his fate but the possible clemency of the Minister of War.

The following statistics will be interesting with regard to the supply of cotton from Egypt to the great markets of Europe. During the past eight months the amounts exported have been as follows:—

	lbs.	Value
To England . .	94,700,635	. . £10,192,905
To France . .	22,224,168	. . 1,874,085

making the value of the united exports for the whole year about 15,000,000*l.* The corresponding imports of coin into Egypt in payment for this amount have been:—

Gold from France	1,538,236
Gold from England	1,521,973
Silver from England . . .	4,552,527
Total . . .	7,612,736

leaving a balance in favour of Egypt of the value of 4,454,254*l.*, which, however, is pretty well accounted for by an estimated excess of 1,000,000*l.* in the imports of coin during the first eight months of last year over the exports of cotton. Three years only have been required for Egypt, with a population of 3,350,000 inhabitants, to grow this amount of cotton, which is nearly equal to that furnished to England by India and Brazil in 1856. It is remarkable that $\frac{1}{2}$ of the Egyptian cotton is grown by the fellahs, or peasant proprietors, although there are some very large landholders in the country. The French journals dilate upon the growing figures of the Egyptian trade with rapture, and prophesy of the day when Marseilles will be the Liverpool of the East.

Motives of policy on the one hand, and of courtesy on the other, make it advisable that no disrespectful expressions should be used of Austria or Russia, and the Charivari, not being likely to find this out by its own sense of right, has been privately admonished on the subject. Apparently the same favour was not shown to another comic paper, the Nain Jaune, which appeared on Saturday with its first page unbelieved by print, except the heading of an article 'On allemande?' and the signature of the writer. It has been officially communicated that the suppression of the article has not any political significance, but the statement is supposed to be rather jesuitically worded.

ITALY.

The Chamber of Deputies was reopened on the 24th inst., under the presidency of S. Cassini. The new Ministry were in their places, and the members of the former Administration were also present. General della Marmora laid the Franco-Italian Convention on the table, together with the diplomatic correspondence connected therewith. In presenting it to the Chamber, he said that the sanction of it was a political necessity, and its benefits immensely superior to its inconveniences. He considered that the transfer of the capital was the preparation of a satisfactory solution of the Roman question, and any sacrifices which it involved were called for in the name of the national dignity, independence, and unity. From the correspondence laid on the table it appears that the Italian negotiators declared that the Convention simply and only undertakes on behalf of Italy that she shall renounce all violent measures against the Papal States. Signor Lanza brought forward a bill for the transfer of the capital to Florence, and requested that it might be declared urgent. The bill fixes the credit required to meet the expenses of the transfer at 7,000,000 fr. During the day of the reopening of the Chamber, the town was perfectly quiet, in spite of the many anonymous threats of disturbance which had been circulated. Arrangements had been made for calling out the national guard in case of need. This was done as a special compliment to the citizens of Turin, who thanked the Minister of the Interior for his confidence by the mouth of their syndic Signor di Rora. A committee of nine members of the House has been appointed to enquire into the causes and nature of the sanguinary disturbances which took place in Turin on the 21st and 22nd ult. A report has been published on this subject by the municipal junta of Turin, which inculpates the 'guards of public security' in the highest degree. There is no doubt of the excesses committed by that body, which has been disbanded in consequence; but the extent of provocation given to them by the people remains yet to be ascertained. By an official report of the casualties in the two days' riots, it appears that there were 52 killed, and 187 wounded now in the hospitals, but it is said that a great number of the wounded were taken to their own homes, and therefore have not been counted. Of the killed five only were Turinese, and of the wounded 85; this confirms the belief that the excesses were mainly due to the presence of agitators from the neighbouring provinces.

The report of disarmament in Italy has been negatived by the Italia Militare, which asserts that, whatever economical measures may be carried out, the strength of the army is not to be diminished; the soldiers on furlough are capable of recall in a few days upon any emergency.

On the 16th inst., a band of forty refugees from the South of the Tyrol, dressed in Garibaldian blouses, and carrying a tricoloured flag, appeared in the province of Udine within the Government of Venetia. They were commanded by an ex-captain of Garibaldi's army. They attacked and plundered the barracks of the gendarmes in Spilembergo and Maniago, and took possession of the treasury of the tax-collectors in those townships, leaving a formal receipt in its place. They were preparing to advance further into the country when they heard of the approach of Austrian troops, and dispersed in consequence. The inhabitants showed no willingness to join them. Some arrests have been effected, and the frontiers are strictly watched.

This week has been very fertile in on dits with regard to the royal family of Italy. In the first place, we are told by the Opinion Nationale that the King was subjected to a brutal attack while on the way from Mandria to Turin, but the informant goes into no details on the matter. Again, in political canards, we have one which is a rechauffée of an old story, that Victor Emmanuel is only awaiting the successful accomplishment of the transfer of the Government to Florence to abdicate the throne in favour of his son. This has been positively and circumstantially contradicted. Lastly, with regard to the said Prince Humbert, who has been wife-hunting lately without any great success, it is said that a marriage is proposed between him and an Archduchess of Austria, who will bring him Venice as her dowry. It is to be feared that this news is too good to be true; besides, who in this age of progress would be satisfied with so old-fashioned a way of getting over a difficulty? It would be a clear fraud on the rights of the party of progress not to have a revolution.

By the way, it ought to be mentioned that the Ex-Grand-Duke of Tuscany has lodged a protest against the transfer of the Piedmontese Government to his capital. The protest is founded on the provisions of the treaty of Zurich.

It is said that the evacuation of Rome, which is to be effected gradually, is about to commence. A regiment, or thereabout, will be withdrawn every quarter. The Legitimist party in Paris are using every effort to form a legion for the Pope; the command has been tendered to Lamoricière, who, taught by painful experiences, has replied that when a real army was once formed, he would be happy to take charge of it, but not till then.

DENMARK.

It appears that the statements made by us last week, on the word of that usually infallible chronicler, Mr. Reuter, with regard to the movements of the Prince and Princess of Wales, were somewhat premature, and applied in truth to the infant Prince Albert Victor only. His princely parents left Copenhagen on the 22nd inst., in the Osborne, following, it is true, the footsteps of their precocious progeny, who has thus early learnt to travel alone. They left Copenhagen amidst the acclamations of the people. It is noticed that the Prince of Wales is bringing back with him a specimen of animals with which England is supposed to be tolerably well supplied, in the shape of some pairs of fancy rabbits from Sweden, which will eclipse all the glories of the lop-eared ones dear to readers of Bell's Life. Considering that another Englishman is importing a few Prussian horses to teach ours how to trot, we may say that England's supremacy is really becoming imperilled.

The Vienna Conferences are wellnigh closed, and the news of the signature of the treaty of peace is expected daily. The German commissioners have ordered their officials to retire from the territory of Ribe, which is therefore to be left in the possession of Denmark, though enclosed within the Duchy of Slesvig.

The Danish budget for 1865-6 has been submitted to the Rigsdag. The total receipts are valued at $8,722,301, and the expenses at $6,161,281.

Great irritation has been felt in Jutland in consequence of the demands made by the Danish Government for the arrears of imposts from April 1, 1863, to April 1, 1864. It is of course impossible to satisfy these demands after the harrying which the unfortunate Jutlanders have suffered at the hands of the Germans, and serious troubles are consequently expected should the Government insist on the exactions.

GERMANY.

We mentioned last week an idea thrown out by the editor of the Danish Dagbladet that the rights of King Christian to the throne of Denmark are invalidated by the coming treaty of peace. This notion has been taken up by some parties in Germany, who seek to prove that on this principle the rights of those who renounced their claims to the throne in favour of the present King are restored to them, and especially those of the Landgrave and Prince Frederick of Hesse. We have very little doubt that German ingenuity, building a new edifice on every fresh concession made to it, would finally succeed in proving the title of some German princelet to every throne in Europe, and even to the reversion of President Lincoln's refreshing little kingdom in America.

The Kreuz Zeitung, however, is very indignant at the claims of small Germans, particularly when they demand a small allowance of power in the Duchies. That journal states that, up to the time of the signature of the preliminaries of Vienna, King Christian IX. of Denmark was legitimate sovereign of Slesvig-Holstein (pretty cool this!), and argues thereupon that the succession to the Duchies is a matter to be settled by the signataries of those preliminaries. In fact, it denies the right of the Federal Diet to interfere in the matter at all. This is of the greater importance as the article is evidently from official sources. The Duchies have certainly 'fallen among thieves.' Their inhabitants continue to demand the recognition of Duke Frederick VIII. as their lawful sovereign; but such a measure would be much too straightforward for Prussia. 'An assembly of legal advisers is to be convoked by Austria and Prussia, with the approval of the Diet; and the legal decision having been given and properly considered, as well as the general interests of Germany' (rather a wide clause, which may admit some very Prussian interests also), 'a final resolution on the subject will be passed.' In the meantime the Federal Diet is going to send in to Slesvig-Holstein its little bill for the expenses of an army of occupation. Prussia has 'invited' this army to retire on the signature of peace; but Austria is violently opposed to their departure, not being sufficiently satisfied of Herr von Bismarck's honesty to leave him in uncontrolled possession of the land.

The Landtag of the Duchy of Lauenburg has carried a motion to annex Lauenburg to Prussia, and the offer has accordingly been made; but Prussia is too wary to accept the offer, and tells the Lauenburgers semi-officially that in virtue of the late treaties Austria is joint-tenant with her in the territory of the Duchies. This, of course, is pleasant for the good people of Lauenburg, who thought that they were making a present of themselves to Prussia, and are told by way of thanks that they already belong to her and another Power. However, the neighbours of Prussia must by this time be, like the eels, used to skinning. It is pretty clear that Austria would approve of no such annexation; she is now arguing hotly against the necessity of making Kiel and Rendsberg Federal, i.e. Prussian fortresses; her partisans say that at Rendsberg there is no necessity for a fortress at all, and that, if a port be wanted on the Baltic, Danztic will be infinitely preferable to Kiel for Federal purposes.

Herr von Bismarck goes from Biarritz to Berlin, viâ Paris. His pursuit of health in France must have been somewhat impeded by the wicked rumour of a Holy Alliance between Russia, Austria, and Prussia, which La Presse thought fit to revive out of the columns of the Morning Post. The Prussian official organs have denied with a holy horror the truth of any restoration of cordiality between themselves and Austria—a superfluous trouble on their part, as nobody believed the story.

The Liberal Government of Baden has been met by a demand from the Progressist party in that State, to which, with all its liberality, it declines to accede. It involves no less than a subversion of the whole existing system, the introduction of universal franchise, the suppression of public religion, a reorganisation of the army, &c. The Bismarckites crow with delight over this rebuff received by one part of German liberalism from another.

The third son of the Crown Prince and Princess of Prussia was baptised on the 18th instant at Potsdam, in the presence of the Archduke Leopold of Austria. Many addresses of congratulation on the birth of this prince have been received by the King and the Prince—one in particular, from the magistracy of Berlin, which was answered by the King in a very crusty spirit, significant of his sentiments towards those dignitaries. The Crown Prince received them very cordially, and spoke with feeling of his duty to bring up the child so as best to be of service to his country.

Some choice military anecdotes are flitting about. One is with regard to the three brothers, the Counts Schmising Kerssenbruck, who were cashiered for expressing their deliberate opinion that duelling was an immoral practice, and contrary to the laws of God. Some of their co-religionists, Roman Catholics, have petitioned the King in favour of the three martyrs, and have received a magnificent snub for their interference, on the peculiar ground that they are endeavouring to sow religious quarrels in the army. Then there is a dark mysterious story about some iniquity committed by two Prussian officers in the garrison of Glogau; the details are not published, and apparently there is good reason for their suppression. All we know is that two girls were inveigled by these officers into their quarters, and that the next morning one of them was carried out dead, and the other was taken home in a state of insensibility, from which she only recovered to find herself horribly 'mutilated.' The officers were not reported, but were simply transferred to another garrison. Once more, an English lady of venerable age was travelling in Northern Germany with the attendance of one servant only; on arriving at Kiel she found great difficulty in obtaining lodgings, and was at last, after much trouble, admitted to a room which had been just vacated by some Prussian officers. She locked her door and went to bed; in the middle of the night a noise disturbed her; she woke up to see two officers standing by her bedside; with great calmness she requested them to leave the room; the officers only laughed at her, told her the room was theirs, and bade her get up and vacate it instantly. She then requested them to look at the letters of introduction lying on her table, addressed to some of their own superior officers; the sight of these quieted them considerably; they contented themselves with swaggering out of the room, and banging the door wide open. She was not satisfied until she had brought them back and compelled them to shut it. The next day she lodged a complaint against them, and was so lucky as to have sufficient influence to force an apology out of them. We forgot—there is another anecdote: the Prussian army who served in Jutland is to receive a commemorative cross, the Cross of the Assault of Düppel.

GREECE.

The King has complained to the Assembly of the slowness of the debates, and fixes one month as the period within which the constitution and the electoral law shall be drawn up; should that time be exceeded, the King reserves to himself full liberty of action, and throws the responsibility upon the Assembly. He has further declared that he will not sign the constitution unless it contains a provision for the creation of a Council of State. In consequence of this declaration the provision was carried by a vote of 130 to 124, ten members refusing entirely to vote.

RUSSIA.

An agricultural exhibition is being held at Moscow, which is chiefly remarkable for the number of peasant exhibitors which it has brought out. Some of these have taken a two months' journey from Siberia, driving their cattle along with them to exhibit them in Russia. The curse of Russia at the present moment is the number of incendiary fires which take place. At Limbirsk, 1,156 buildings were destroyed by fire; and at Ekaterinoslaw the alarms were continuous for three weeks together, during which 25,000*l.* worth of property was destroyed. At Orenburg, 660 houses were consumed, and in the province of Kieff 28 fires have occurred. Threatening letters have been found in several places, and the police are on the alert, but as yet no clue has been found to the conspiracy which evidently exists.

An ironclad turret-ship has lately been launched at Cronstadt, named the Smertch (the 'Trumpet'). She is three-masted, the main and mizen being of iron, hollow, and triangular in shape. She carries two turrets and five steam-engines, two for the screw, one apiece for the turrets, and one for the ventilating machinery; she also carries furnaces for filling shells with molten iron. Her rigging is entirely composed of iron cables and wire.

SPAIN.

We have no further news from Spain on the South American difficulty since the reported declaration of war by Peru. The journals still urge the Government to keep the Chincha Islands as guarantees until Peru shall have given satisfaction. The Bank of Spain is about to increase its capital by 75,000,000 reals (about 1,000,000*l.*), for which purpose the shareholders have been summoned. A project is on foot for planting a colony of 1,000,000 Irish in the north of Spain. The Correspondencia of Madrid assures us that the plan is daily developing itself in the most favourable manner.

ALGIERS.

The fighting still continues in this province between the French and the revolted Arabs. The results, in a purely military point of view, appear to have been invariably favourable to the Europeans, but the ferocity and determination with which the natives fight augur ill for the well-being of the colony for the next few years. The losses of the French are not large; the assaults of the Arabs appear to have more fire and fury in them than real effectiveness. Several brilliant deeds of arms are recorded, one of them being the death of Lieutenant de Moncey, a name familiar in the wars of the first Napoleon. He was killed while charging in advance of his line; the Arabs attempted to get possession of his body, but his two orderlies defended their dead master, and were able to save him from the ignominy of capture after death, though at the price of their own lives. The three bodies were buried side by side, even as they had fallen. The two insurgent chiefs, Si Hamza and Si Lalla, are still at large, and likely to do further mischief.

MEXICO.

A telegram has been received viâ New York, and therefore requiring considerable confirmation, that during the absence of the Emperor Maximilian from the city of Mexico, Miramon, backed up by the Archbishop of Mexico, had declared against Maximilian. The trustworthy accounts from Mexico are all favourable to the Imperial cause; Juarez had been driven from Piedras Negras by the hostile attitude of the population, and had taken refuge in or about Monterey, in the province of Cohahuila, with the Generals Ortega and Negrete and some 1,800 men. He was speedily followed by General de Castagny, and fled from Monterey as the allied troops entered it. He has now betaken himself to Chihuahua. The Republican troops are dispersing on every side. General Dupin captured Matamoras on the 20th ult., Cortinas having fled on the mere news of his approach. An English company has taken the contract for the railway between Vera Cruz and Mexico; it is to be completed in about four years. General Doblado has made his submission to the Empire, and has received letters of safe-conduct to return from the United States to Mexico.

Seven hundred recruits for the foreign legion have arrived at Vera Cruz; 600 more of the Belgian legion embarked at St. Nazaire on the 16th inst. for the same destination. They were welcomed on their way at Nantes and Angers; at the latter place they were honoured with a public dinner, at which the toast was 'the health of our apostle-soldiers!' An officer of this corps appeared in full uniform in Paris in the Palais Royal, and of course attracted the eyes of the countless loungers in that temple of curiosity. The uniform is not very remarkable—a short blue tunic, red trousers tucked into large boots with steel spurs, a red cap with a sort of visor like a helmet, which can be lifted to form a shade, and a common brown overcoat. It may be set down for certain now-a-days, that every queer uniform one sees is worn either by an English volunteer or a Mexican foreign-legionary.

General Count von Thum is now making arrangements in France for the transport of his Austro-Mexican legion, 7,000 strong, to Vera Cruz.

CANADA.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

QUEBEC: October 10, 1864.

I HAVE just returned from a tour in the Western States, and have thereby got a clearer insight into the position of affairs in these regions than I could possibly receive by any amount of newspaper reading. Almost everywhere I found that the people were strongly, almost vehemently, opposed to the Lincoln Administration, heartily sick of the war, and ardently desirous for a change of government and policy. Nor did they strive to conceal their sentiments. In public rooms, among indiscriminate company, the most treasonable sentiments were boldly avowed, and the name of Lincoln saluted in a manner far from flattering. I was really startled by the recklessness and want of ordinary caution displayed; but at the same time considered that treason was too ripe for even the provost-marshal to restrain; for were all the political recusants to be arrested, it would be next to impossible to find prisons wherein to incarcerate them.

From all I could observe and learn, a surly discontent obtained among a large proportion of the people. Hints were even thrown out that a terrible crisis was looming in the distance; and this discontent prevailed most among the labouring population. I heard it stated that the depreciation of greenbacks was such, that except the wages of the working classes were raised in proportion, results would ensue painful to contemplate. The masses had much to bear, but their patience was nearly exhausted. Revolutionary symptoms were held in abeyance pending the election of the next President. Should Lincoln, however, be reelected, the war be prosecuted, and 'shin-plasters' continue at their present value, I much fear that manifestations of popular discontent will arise, that may awe the Executive at Washington even more than the presence of Lee's army did in Maryland.

The farmers, I was informed, were holding back their grain, not being willing to part with their produce for greenback currency. Dubious of its permanent value, they prefer to act in this manner rather than part with any commodity for paper money, which ere long may absolutely become worthless. This accounts for the unusually low supply of cereals in the New York market—a circumstance attributed, I believe, to a bad harvest. I am assured, however, that the harvest, notwithstanding the prevailing drought during the summer, has been at least an average one, and that there is by no means a scarcity of grain.

Many people in the Western States look with considerable interest upon the action now being taken by the Governments of Canada and the Lower Provinces with regard to the Confederation project. Should such action finally eventuate in success, I am rather led to believe that it is far from improbable but that some of the neighbouring States may be inclined to cast in their lot with the newly-organised provinces, which would then form the nucleus of a great nation.

To-day the General Convention inaugurates its sittings in the Parliament House, which has been prepared for their reception. The entire delegation comprises some thirty-six members, the names of whom I append:—

Newfoundland: The Hon. Messrs. Carter and Shea.

Nova Scotia: The Hon. Messrs. Tupper, Henry, Archibald, M'Cully, and Dickey.

New Brunswick: The Hon. Messrs. Tilley, Steeves, Mitchell, Johnson, Fisher, Chandler, and J. H. Gray.

Prince Edward's Island: The Hon. Messrs. Hamilton Gray, Pope, Palmer, Davis, Coles, Haviland, M'Donald, and Whelan.

Canada: Sir E. P. Taché, Premier, and the Hon. Messrs. J. A. M'Donald, Cartier, Campbell, M'Gee, Galt, George Brown, Chapais, M'Dougall, Mowatt, Cockburn, and Langevin.

I do not expect that the deliberations of the Conference will extend beyond the present week. As it holds its sittings with closed doors, very little will be publicly known of its proceedings until the Assembly of Delegates finally separates. A week may appear a short time wherein to discuss the multitude of questions necessarily arising out of the contemplated change of government; but I apprehend a broad basis will be assumed by the delegates from each province, and that if they can agree upon general plans, minor details will be subsequently arranged, perhaps by the local legislatures. The scheme certainly is a vast one—one, moreover, that must prove of infinite advantage to British possessions on this side of the Atlantic. But it will require clever statesmen to carry it out; and political parties will have no slight difficulty in sinking their petty jealousies and cherished predilections, in order to realise the desired and desirable consummation. In this portion of the province but a very insignificant proportion of the French people are favourable to the change of political policy, consequently some opposition must be expected, should the legislature be summoned to express its opinion. In Upper Canada, without at all understanding the matter, the people are favourable to that, or indeed to any change likely to free the country from its usual periodical perturbations. In any case, before the provinces could enter upon a new political existence, a very long time must transpire. Meantime, we are to have a week of jollity, of fêtes, and feastings. To-morrow the Governor-General will hold a drawing-room, and it must excite a smile when you are informed that the etiquette usually observed at the Court of St. James's is to be scrupulously followed, namely, that gentlemen who have not already been presented to his Excellency, will have to send in their cards to the aide-de-camp in waiting the day previous, for his Excellency's approval. A grand ball is likewise to be held on Friday evening in honour of the delegates from the maritime provinces.

I regret to find that there exists too strong an influence in the Canadian Parliament favourable to the Northern States. Mr. George Brown, the President of the Council, is well known to possess Northern 'proclivities,' and his paper, the Toronto Globe, manifestly sympathises with the Union party and the Administration that endeavours to conserve it, although 'the Union' has long since been defunct, without the vaguest hope of resuscitation. As for Mr. M'Dougall, the Colonial Secretary, everybody is aware of his tendencies and predilections, for which reason he is familiarly designated by the nom-de-nique of 'Look-to-Washington M'Dougall!' But the most astounding circumstance of all is that Mr. J. A. M'Donald, the Conservative leader, should, in a recent speech, have expressed himself highly in favour of the American Constitution. Surely this could not have been done to please his colleague in the ministry, Mr. Brown, whose abuse of Mr. M'Donald in the Globe has been so caustic and repeated in former times. At all events much severe comment has resulted from the unguarded language that escaped from the Attorney-General's lips while venturing to talk on American politics. Such adulation of a rotten Government has proved most unpalatable to the Canadians, by which the new political proselyte has sunk greatly in popular favour.

THE LIVERPOOL BAZAAR.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

LIVERPOOL: October 22, 1864.

THE closing scenes of the Southern Bazaar have been full of animation, and have abundantly manifested the deep interest felt in the good cause for which the enterprise was undertaken. The attendance was larger and larger as the time approached for the finale, and last night so great was the pressure within the Hall, that it became absolutely necessary for the officers to refuse further admissions. Your special correspondent, after waiting fifteen or twenty minutes in the rain outside the building at the main entrance, and after vainly endeavouring to get in at a side door, was compelled to return to his hotel, rejoicing at the necessity for his exclusion, though regretting that he had not presented himself half an hour earlier. This regret was increased next morning when he heard that at ten o'clock the general crowd of visitors gave way for an impromptu dance, which was kept up till a late hour, and proved not the least attractive and brilliant part of the whole undertaking. To-day, again, the Hall has been densely thronged, the sales at the stalls have been considerable, and the goods that remained unsold have been disposed of by auction. The interest excited by the Bazaar, so far from flagging, has shown such augmentation from the commencement, that we might fairly suppose the sales could be kept up for weeks to come, if the fair ladies who conducted them were equal to the protracted fatigue.

The total amount raised by sales and subscriptions exceeds 20,000*l.*, a noble contribution indeed, and worthy of the people of Liverpool, who in great part made it up. Many generous contributors there were from other points in the kingdom, and among those who actively participated in the good work, both in furnishing material aid in its organisation, and in carrying out the details, were well-known citizens of the Confederate States temporarily living in Europe, either in exile or in honourable employments, who will be remembered for their zeal and liberality when there shall be no longer the unhappy necessity of ministering to the wants of our 'prisoners and captives.'

Your correspondent is only too well aware that he has presented but a tame and cold description of the beautiful spectacle. Perhaps he has unconsciously in some instances misstated a fact or blundered into error. It is almost certain that he has omitted many things that might have been mentioned effectively. Where a thousand objects of taste, luxury, elegance, and utility assail the eye in one confusing ensemble—where all the arts combine to please, and music, painting, architecture make their demands upon the admiration together—where the delighted and bewildered spectator finds himself surrounded by animated beauty as well, and this animated beauty appeals to him on every side in behalf of numberless enterprises of more or less 'pith and moment'—it is not an easy thing to fix the attention upon individual matters, or to bring away more than a general impression that he has been enchanted, and that the enchantment has cost him a certain or uncertain amount in £ s. d., which he has the satisfaction at least of knowing has been spent worthily in a noble cause.

And so your correspondent throws himself upon the clemency of the public for any sins of omission or commission he may have unwittingly fallen into, feeling well assured that all will credit him with the sincere desire to render the meed of praise wherever it was due. And as the great aim and purpose of the Southern Bazaar was to raise a fund for the alleviation of the sufferings of Confederate prisoners, and not to give éclat to those who engaged in it, and as the fund has been raised in excess of the most sanguine expectations of any participant, the fault of failing to award the proper credit for valuable services will be the more readily pardoned.

In reviewing the work, however, by general consent it will be admitted that, if to any one person more than another may be assigned the honour of having insured the success of the Bazaar, that person is James Spence, Esq., whose indefatigable exertions for weeks in advance wrought out such harmonious results in the arrangements, and whose energy during the week of its operations has been so conspicuous and so unfailing. He was fortunate indeed in having the cooperation of Mrs. Spence in the tasteful decoration of the tables and saloons, while the handsome sum taken at the North Carolina stall, at which this lady attended, shows how successfully she prosecuted the pretty traffic of this mart of benevolence.

Perhaps the incident which of all others afforded the greatest amount of amusement at the Hall was the lottery of the Shetland pony, which animal was twice drawn by H. O. Brewer, Esq. of Alabama. This liberal gentleman was not a little embarrassed by the persistency with which fortune threw the pony into his hands. It seemed of no use to make the pony a present to the Bazaar, for the next raffle would find Mr. Brewer again in possession. While all the other holders of tickets watched the turn of wheel with eager interest hoping to win the prize, Mr. Brewer as eagerly awaited the drawing hoping to lose it. At last the inevitable owner presented the pony, twice won, a second time to the committee, stipulating that there should be no further lottery of it, but that it should be sold at public vendue. I did not learn whether Mr. Brewer, urged by destiny, attended the auction and bought his prize, though this is likely enough to have occurred.

And now, having seen the Bazaar concluded, your correspondent takes his leave of the subject, and the express train for London.

MR. GLADSTONE AND THE MANCHESTER COTTON TRADE.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—When Mr. Gladstone was in Manchester a fortnight since, he addressed a limited number of its merchant princes in the large room of the city Town Hall.

In the course of his speech he made especial reference to the paralysed condition of the cotton trade. Among other observations he said he trusted they would soon see the day when the present cause for anxiety in connection with the condition of their great industrial occupations would have passed away; and further, 'that they would see their great cotton industry restored to an extension such as it never yet enjoyed.' Such happy sentiments might well elicit a hearty response from the lips of his hearers, though there were few, however, who believed in either expectation except through the cessation of the American war, the independence of the South, and a good supply of Orleans cotton. Certainly, the speech did not prevent prices on 'Change' from becoming weaker than they were on the preceding Tuesday.

For full three years the trade has worked on, tantalised with the same visionary ideas as those expressed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, until half the property of the manufacturing districts has been swept away, with a fair prospect of the remainder following. The whole world is, as Mr. Gladstone observed, indebted to the cotton industry of Lancashire, and in turn Lancashire is indebted to the Southern States, whose raw material has been the base of the British cotton trade. It has been the removal of such base that has brought down the cotton trade, which is attempted to be replaced by cotton from other countries. How far the experiment has succeeded the Board of Trade Returns for the first eight months of the present year will testify. That the reader may decide the matter for himself, we give a quotation for three years:—

Statement of Cotton Imports for Eight Months ending Aug. 31, for the Years 1862, 1863, and 1864, expressed in cwts.

United States	43,654	37,053	108,670
Bahamas and Bermuda	27,545	135,708	218,848
Mexico	8,916	66,752	163,769
Brazil	135,800	155,899	234,147
Turkey	28,624	59,347	147,932
Egypt	418,125	595,514	845,212
British India	1,417,095	1,805,518	2,213,270
China	3,582	187,376	537,965
Other countries	125,442	131,115	200,187
	2,208,783	3,174,282	4,670,000

In the first place, the 4,670,000 cwts. of raw cotton received did not form more than one-half of the amount needed by Great Britain to meet the requirements of her domestic and export trades. In the second place, the imports from the Bahamas, Bermuda, and Mexico, are American cotton, and so make the Southern States a creditor for 491,287 cwts. Whilst, in the third place, all the other cottons named, except Brazilian and Egyptian, are so short in staple, or so heavy in dirt, as to render them very second-rate cottons compared with American, and would not remain in use if the latter could be obtained, only for very low yarns. It may be taken for granted that necessity alone compels the use of Chinese, Indian, Turkish, and Smyrna cottons, and that so soon as American cotton can be obtained, the former will be restricted in their consumption, if not entirely discarded. Whatever may be the ideas of Mr. Gladstone, neither master nor operative will continue to use or work short-stapled cottons a single month beyond the termination of the American war. If then such be the fact, how can the Chancellor of the Exchequer look for other cottons supplanting American cotton, unless such cottons possess the qualities of, and can be had at the price asked for, American? Every one of the merchants who heard Mr. Gladstone will hasten into market on the return of peace, and, by preferring to buy American cotton, or the fabrics made therefrom, to Indian, Chinese, Turkish, or Smyrna cottons, neutralise the very sources from which he hopes that England will hereafter be made independent of America. Time will show how inconsistent fancies and facts are in regard to our cotton supplies. England nevertheless has made, and is still making, gigantic efforts and sacrifices to obtain an adequate supply of cotton for her cotton trade. She has succeeded in obtaining fifty per cent. of her requirements after three years' anxious effort, and at a price which exceeds belief. We give the annexed quotation from the Board of Trade Returns:—

Computed Real Value of Cottons imported into Great Britain in the First Seven Months of 1862, 1863, and 1864.

United States	253,580	206,151	1,345,647
Bahamas and Bermuda	101,837	796,513	2,505,379
Mexico	51,749	432,470	2,072,138
Brazil	741,197	1,345,471	2,873,296
Turkey	132,471	464,255	1,442,123
Egypt	2,372,755	5,443,278	10,192,905
British India	4,883,899	11,950,999	17,816,147
China	8,302	994,425	4,216,584
Other countries	698,299	967,776	1,928,197
	9,243,289	22,601,368	44,392,716

Such is the cost of a seven months' import of cotton during the past three years. For eight months in 1864 the amount cannot be less than fifty millions sterling, or 2*s.* per lb. on the average, a sum four times as much as was paid for a far superior article in 1860.

From the Board of Trade Returns, we find that, during the first eight months of the present year, we exported of

Cotton yarns	53,877,431 lbs. valued at	6,548,424
Piece goods	1,190,936,553 yds. „	30,051,112
White or plain	746,187,566 „ „	18,415,486
Printed or dyed	444,748,987 „ „	11,635,626
Other manufactures		1,296,333

According to the figures given, cotton yarns have been sold on the average at 2*s.* 5*d.* per lb., or double the price only of 1860, whilst manufacturers have realised 6*d.* per yard instead of 3*d.*; of course the consumer at home and abroad has the difference to pay for the experiment of using other cottons than American, which but for the blockade might be obtained. The following items will show why spinners prefer to stop rather than go on, even at such enhanced prices:—

Cost of converting present Qualities of Cottons into Yarns.

Cotton, as per average of Trade Returns, per lb.	2	0
Commission and carriage to works	0	0½
Dust, dirt, and short staple, 20 per cent.	0	6
Wages	0	1¼
Interests on capital employed	0	1
Trade expenses, discounts, &c.	0	1
	2	9¾
Deduct, &c. sale of short waste	0	2¾

It may be remarked that the spinner having to sell to the merchant at a less price than 2*s.* 5*d.* per lb., at which rate it is declared in the bill of exports, it is quite clear that the trade is sustaining a loss of no less than 10 per cent. upon present prices. Need we wonder at the rapid closing of the cotton mills, the failures, and ruin in Lancashire? If the Chancellor of the Exchequer could exhibit no better budget than the above, his popularity as a financier would go down.

At the rate of imports for the first eight months of the year, the total imports will amount to no less than 75,000,000*l.* sterling for the year for cotton. On this there will be a loss of 7,500,000*l.* sterling to the trade. In 1860 the cotton manufacturing districts realised no less than 20,000,000*l.* sterling of profits through the use of American cotton. That, however, is now lost, and nearly half as much more besides. K.

Liverpool: October 24.

'ONE THOUSAND ONE HUNDRED MILLIONS STERLING.'—Americans are only beginning to reflect on the cost of the war. It was one of the first considerations that occurred to European statesmen, and greatly influenced their opinion on the policy of the North. The American calculations we have recently published prove that two millions of men have been lost to industry, and that, instead of two or three hundred millions sterling, the Northern Treasury has already expended double the largest of those amounts. In June last the Federal debt was 520,000,000*l.* Since then the war has been carried on at the estimated cost of 800,000*l.* a day. By March next, therefore, when Mr. Lincoln, if elected, will begin his second term of office, the debt of the North will amount to 700,000,000*l.* The interest of this debt will be, at least, 42,000,000*l.* This principal, however, gives a very imperfect idea of the sum total of the national liability. All reference to the Confederacy and its debt is of course omitted. The seven hundred millions do not include 'the immense amount of unsettled claims yet to be brought in,' of which the American estimate speaks. The items we need not specify, but coming at once to the total of the calculation we find they will add more than 300,000,000*l.* to the ascertained debt, making a grand total, which can be more clearly expressed in words than figures, of one thousand one hundred millions sterling. This is half the value of all the real and personal property in the 'loyal States,' even reckoning among them the two States of doubtful allegiance, Missouri and Kentucky. But even now we have not arrived at the climax. The last property valuation of the Northern States was made when they were at the height of solid prosperity. Since that period the productive powers of all have been fatally diminished, and Maryland, Missouri, Western Virginia, and Kentucky have been devastated. The last tale of destruction is from the Valley of the Shenandoah, which is being deliberately converted into a desert. The interest of the debt already accumulated is reckoned at 6 per cent., or almost double that of England; so the Americans have the prospect of bearing a future financial burden exceeding that borne by any European nation. To pay the interest of the several loans their resources are almost in inverse proportion. In the last year of Mr. Buchanan's administration the Federal Government had a surplus revenue large enough to enable it to pay off its debt. It bought up its own outstanding liabilities at a premium, for as a good investment they had long stood above par in the market. Then the United States' Federal debt was really a 'fleabite,' compared with the revenue and resources of the country. The Revolution the Americans will not see has destroyed all this financial prosperity. To meet these enormous liabilities the Federation has only 14,000,000*l.* yearly revenue from the Customs' duties, which are paid in gold. It is exactly one-third of the amount required for the interest of the present debt. The current expenses of the war have been met almost entirely by loans.—Times.

THE RESPONSIBILITY OF ENGLAND.

The following is an extract from the Standard:—

In speaking of the American war, English statesmen are far too prone to adopt the tone and language of Pilate, and, sanctimoniously washing their hands in the face of the world, to say to the belligerents in the name of England, 'I am guiltless of this innocent blood; see you to it.' The authors of the war, the politicians, preachers, and frenzied multitude of the North, who have rushed into civil strife in utter violation of the principles on which their freedom was founded and of the laws by which alone their Union subsisted, are but too ready to rejoin, in the words of the Jewish murderers, 'This blood be upon us, and upon our children.' But have we any right to believe that history will hold our excuses more valid than those of the unhappy Procurator? Are we not guilty of the very crime which has handed down his name to everlasting and ineffable infamy—the crime of cowardice? Have we shrunk from no duty incumbent upon us the fulfilment of which would at least have had a tendency to check the sanguinary fury of the aggressors? has no language been used among us by which the flagging hopes of the North have been encouraged, and its Government strengthened in the enforcement of a tyrannous rule at home and a savage war policy abroad? Is there nothing in our conduct to give at least an apparent justification to the reproach that we have looked on with cold-blooded indifference at a strife which has seemed likely to do us good by weakening our rivals? Unless all these questions can be answered unhesitatingly in the negative, the self-complacent language of our politicians is inconsistent with truth, and our national conscience is by no means clear in regard to the most flagrant political crime recorded in modern history—the attempt of twenty millions of Christian citizens to exterminate eight millions of people professing the same faith and speaking the same tongue. How do the facts stand?

First, as to the conduct of our Government. It must not be forgotten that we are solely responsible for the joint policy of England and France; that every step that has been taken has been taken at our instance; and that the proposals of the Emperor for a pacific interposition on the part of united Europe have been baffled by us alone. Was this well done? Was it consistent with our past practice and present principles? When the Turks were proceeding to put down the Greek rebellion by a process somewhat similar to that which Paine and Butler have pursued in their respective governments, Sherman in Georgia and Grant in the Shenandoah, we, in conjunction with Russia and France, declared that this attempt was an outrage on humanity which Christian nations could not permit. We prevented it accordingly. The Yankees have openly professed their determination to exterminate the Southern people rather than let them go in peace. The myrmidons of Lincoln are to the full as brutal as those of Mahmoud and Ibrahim. The Confederates have not provoked their fate by one such act of cruelty or treachery as habitually marked the successes of the Greek insurgents. Is it a less atrocity to slaughter eight millions than one? Or are English-born Christians less worthy of our sympathy than semi-barbarian Greeks? Surely a Navarino at Charleston or Mobile would be no more untoward an event than that which liberated Greece; and yet we have not ventured even on a peaceful remonstrance. We have protested against the severities by which Russia avenged herself on that gang of assassins called the National Government of Poland; we have no word of rebuke for the murderous crimes committed by the generals and governors of Mr. Lincoln on the peaceable citizens of Kentucky and Missouri, the helpless prisoners of Norfolk and New Orleans. Unless our interposition on behalf of Greece and Poland was a wanton act of injustice and aggression against our allies, our silence in face of the savage atrocities of the Federal authorities is a dereliction of duty which renders us verily guilty of our brother's blood. But pass this over. Assume that no amount of wickedness can require the intervention of Christian Europe: have we given no positive encouragement to the North? Have we been honestly and impartially neutral? Certainly not. Neutrality would have required us to adhere to the treaty by which we recognised the independence and sovereignty of Virginia, the Carolinas and Georgia. Neutrality would have required us to recognise the Confederacy after the battles of Manassas; for never before did we withhold recognition from a power so well established. Neutrality would have required Lord Russell to rebuke with stern independence the insolence of Mr. Adams, and to assert his right to receive the Confederate envoys with all possible courtesy and all the civilities of private intercourse. By refusing recognition; by snubbing the Confederate envoys; by seizing the Confederate vessels while we allowed regiment after regiment to be levied in Ireland for the Federal service, we have, through our ministers, bidden the North good speed in its enterprise of robbery, murder, and enslavement. We are verily guilty concerning our brother.

Turning from the conduct of the Administration to that of individuals, we are constrained to ask whether such language as has been used by more than one public speaker of late has not a mischievous effect on the temper of the North. They tell us that in their belief the Yankees will conquer, 'will make a solitude, and call it peace;' and though they deprecate this result their language has a direct tendency to encourage the invaders with the hope of success in the one point about which they are solicitous—the subjugation of the Confederates. There is no party, no class, that has any influence or credit in England, favourable to the Federal cause; but there are individuals, whose active and noisy exertions give the impression that there exists if not a public at least a class opinion in this country in favour of Mr. Lincoln and General Butler. We know that it is useless to remonstrate with Messrs. Bright and Cobden. They delight in the thought that they are encouraging the savage democracy of Yankeedom, so far as in them lies, by misleading it as to the opinion of England. The Quaker rejoices in the progress of the fiercest and most bloody war on record. The Freetrader triumphs in the triumphs won in the cause of protection and the Union. It is in vain to argue with them; and it would be most undignified to waste words on George Thompson, Francis Newman, and Peter Taylor. But Mr. Forster is a man of much higher calibre—a sober statesman and cultivated gentleman, and one of the brightest ornaments of the Liberal party. It is painful to find a man like this fostering the wild delusions of the Abolitionists, and representing the Federal armies as the deliverers and protectors of negro refugees. Mr. Forster cannot but be aware that, so far from the negroes flying to the Federal camp, they are the most useful spies of the Confederates. He must know that the mass of negroes acquired by the invaders have been either the inhabitants of conquered districts or captives carried off at the bayonet's point by the marauding expeditions in which the Yankees delight; never, or hardly ever, voluntary fugitives. He knows that these wretched victims have, according to trustworthy official reports, perished by thousands from the neglect and cruelty of their captors, and that the description of their condition given by the agents of Mr. Lincoln represents, and proves by statistics, that the mortality among them on the plantations of the Yankee squatters and in the purlieus of the camps is at the rate of 50 per cent. in three or four months. Against these facts what is the worth of stories sent in by a stray Abolitionist here and there, with a purpose to serve by representing emancipation as a boon to the negro? Has not Mr. Forster read the horrible story of the manner in which these negroes were made to 'fight for their freedom' at Petersburg—how, driven by Federal bayonets into the trenches of the enemy, they lay there, shrieking and crying, daring neither to retreat nor to advance, until two thousand of the wretches were destroyed without striking a blow? And knowing these things, how can he reconcile it to his conscience to encourage a system so cruel and so useless? how can he, as a self-styled friend of the negro, patronise the cause of those who emancipate him only that he may rot out of existence in cold and hunger and unutterable squalor, or enlist him in their armies only that he may 'stop the bullets which might otherwise pierce the white soldiery?' It is quite as much in pity to the negro as in sympathy for the South that we denounce the unscrupulous misstatements, the sanguinary spirit, the un-English sentiments, of those who encourage to the utmost of their ability the savage determination of the North under the pretence of sympathy for the Abolitionist tendencies which have avowedly no other purpose than to deprive the South of her labourers and use them as targets for Southern bullets. A share of the guilt of the North rests on the souls of its English sympathisers; and the admirers of Lincoln and apologists of Butler are not innocent of the massacres of Palmyra, the devastation of Virginia, the cold-blooded murders and fiendish outrages of which Southern women and non-combatants are daily the victims.

THE DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL COMMITTEE'S ADDRESS TO THE PEOPLE.

The following is the address of the Democratic National Committee to the people of the United States:—

To the People of the United States: The Democratic National Committee of the United States hold it to be their duty to call the attention of their fellow-countrymen without distinction of party to certain grave acts of usurpation and wrong now practised upon the citizens of Maryland and of Tennessee, but involving the dearest rights of all the people in all the States; and the very existence of those constitutional remedies against executive wrong-doing which have heretofore saved this nation from the convulsions through which popular liberty in other lands has been forced to assert, to maintain, and to extend its guarantees.

In the State of Maryland, on September 30, the Evening Post, a journal printed in the city of Baltimore, which had that day for the first time published the electoral ticket of the Democratic party of that State, was suppressed by the following order of Major-General Wallace, commanding the United States troops in that city:—

'Eighth Army Corps, Baltimore, September 30, 1864.

'Editors of Evening Post.

'As the surest means of preventing your office being made the subject of violence, you will discontinue the publication of your paper, The Evening Post.'

The sole pretext for this order was the assertion that several soldiers subject to the command of Major-General Wallace intended to create a riot in the streets of Baltimore, and to destroy the property of the suppressed journal, on account of a statement on its bulletin board, announcing as an item of news, 'a fearful riot in Cincinnati, during which a Lincoln club procession from Kentucky fired upon the citizens, men, women, and children, several being killed and wounded.'

Such a pretext for such an order is so manifestly disgraceful to the military officer who, in issuing it, confessed his inability to restrain soldiers of the national service from an act of military insubordination and of civil outrage, that it is impossible to believe he could have been convinced, as he subsequently has been, in pursuance of the command of the President of the United States, had not the suppression of The Evening Post, which was the only Democratic journal published in Baltimore, been designed by the Executive for the express purpose of depriving the political opponents of the existing Administration in that city of their sole means of advocating their opinions, and even of disseminating the information necessary to guide the voters of their party to intelligent action at the polls.

Maryland is a loyal State. To her fidelity President Lincoln in his message to Congress on December 25, 1861, bears this emphatic witness: 'Her bridges and railroads are repaired and open to the Government; she already gives seven regiments to the cause of the Union and none to the enemy; and her people at a regular election have sustained the Union by a larger majority and a larger aggregate vote than they ever before gave to any candidate on any question.'

No enemy now treads her soil. The victorious advance of Sheridan has cleared even her furthest borders of all rebels in arms. Her people are as fully entitled to absolute freedom at the polls and in the discussion of all political questions as the people of Massachusetts or New York.

To sanction an act by which they are shamelessly deprived of this freedom is a deliberate assumption by the Executive of his intention to perpetuate his authority by any exercise of arbitrary power in contempt of the popular will, and in violation of all the laws by which liberty in America has been hitherto protected.

All doubt as to the meaning of this conduct of the Executive in Maryland is put at an end by the simultaneous occurrence in the State of Tennessee of an act equally lawless, and equally eloquent of a settled purpose to retain the control of the resources and destinies of the people by means foreign to our institutions and fatal to our liberties.

On the 30th day of September, Andrew Johnson, a brigadier general of volunteers, holding by appointment of the President the office, unknown to our laws, of military governor of Tennessee, and by the nomination of the Republican party a candidate for the Vice-Presidency of the Union, issued a military order commanding an election for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency to be held in that State, and prescribing arbitrary qualifications for voters at the election. This order is based on the proceedings of a political meeting which the military governor treats as a free convention of the people, absolutely subjected by the will of Mr. Lincoln to his authority, and in it the following oath is prescribed to be taken at the polls:—

'I solemnly swear —— that I will cordially oppose all armistices or negotiations for peace with rebels in arms until the Constitution of the United States, and all laws and proclamations made in pursuance thereof, shall be established over all the people of every state and territory embraced within the national Union, and that I will heartily aid and assist the loyal people in whatever measures may be adopted for the attainment of those ends.'

This oath is directly intended to deprive all loyal citizens of Tennessee who may be constitutionally entitled to vote at all, of their right to support at the polls any policy for the suppression of the existing rebellion, save that which is advocated by Mr. Lincoln, by Mr. Johnson, and by the party sustaining them. The policy repudiates any issue of the war now waging, save the subjugation of the States in rebellion, and the abolition by the Federal power of the institution of slavery, and utterly forbids all negotiation, not only with the so-called Republic of the Confederate States, but with any single State, while a soldier remains in arms against the Union.

The oath prescribed by the Republican candidate for the Vice-Presidency to the loyal citizens of Tennessee requires of them an absolute adhesion to the policy of his own party as the condition of their exercise of the most sacred right of citizenship. In other words, this oath commands every loyal citizen of Tennessee to vote for the Republican candidate or to abstain from the polls. Under the operation of this oath, any citizen who holds such views of the policy proper to be pursued toward the States in rebellion as those put forth for example by the Hon. Charles Francis Adams, actually Minister of the United States in London, would be disfranchised by the bayonets of the Executive in Tennessee.

'For one,' said Mr. Adams in the House of Representatives, January 31, 1861, 'I am not yet ready to take the responsibility of absolutely closing the door of reconciliation. I cannot persuade myself to forget the warnings that have descended to us from many of the wisest and best statesmen of all time against this rigid and haughty mode of treating great discontents. I cannot overlook the fact that, in the days of our fathers, the imperious spirit of Chatham did not feel itself as sacrificing any of its proud dignity by proposing to listen to their grievances, and even to concede every reasonable demand long after they had placed themselves in armed resistance to all the power of Great Britain. Had George III. listened to his words of wisdom, he might have saved the brightest jewel of his crown.

'He took the opposite course. He denied the existence of grievances. He rejected the olive-branch. History records its verdict in favour of Chatham and against the King.'

Hundreds of thousands of citizens of the Union, without distinction of party, animated by a similar spirit, and drawing a like instruction from the lessons of history, believe with General M'Clellan, in his letter accepting the Presidential nomination, that,

'So soon as it is clear or even probable that our present adversaries are ready for peace upon the basis of the Union, we should exhaust all the resources of statesmanship practised by civilised nations and taught by the traditions of the American people, consistent with the honour and interests of the country, to secure such peace, reestablish the Union, and guarantee for the future the constitutional rights of every State. The Union is the one condition of peace; we ask no more.'

All such citizens are outlawed in Tennessee by the arbitrary will of the Republican candidate for the Vice-Presidency, nor will any man be suffered by him to do the highest duty of a freeman unless he is ready to accept a policy which substantially recognises the Republic of the Confederate States, by refusing to the several States, now unhappily leagued together under that name, the right of returning to, and of making peace with, their sister States of the Union.

Such is the necessary effect of this unprecedented course of the 'military governor' of Tennessee, a course of which, in the words applied by two distinguished members of the Republican party, Senator Wade of Ohio, and Representative Davis of Maryland, to the conduct of President Lincoln in unlawfully creating another 'military governor' for the State of Louisiana, it may be said is 'without authority of law and therefore void,' a 'blow at the rights of humanity and at the principles of republican government.' This course the President has sanctioned, as he has sanctioned the course of Major-General Wallace in Maryland, therein again forgetting, to use the words of the same distinguished Republicans, his obligation 'to confine himself to his executive duties; to obey and execute, not make the laws; to suppress by arms armed rebellion, and leave political reorganization to Congress.

'If the supporters of the Government,' Senator Wade and Representative Davis go on to say, 'fail to insist on this, they become responsible for the usurpations which they fail to rebuke, and are justly liable to the indignation of the people whose rights and security, committed to their keeping, they sacrifice.'

To this plain speaking of men eminent in the Republican party we might well content ourselves with pointing the citizens of the United States, in the presence of these new and atrocious attempts upon the freedom of discussion and the sovereignty of the people. But we cannot forget that the very men who have so earnestly denounced executive usurpation in the past have now become its passive instruments and its silent apologists.

This conquest of the last voices of constitutional liberty in the bosom of the Republican party by the seductions of power and of place, makes it imperative upon us to warn the people of America that the perils prefigured by such men as Senator Wade and Representative Davis are upon us to-day, and that they can only be conjured from the future of our country by the united and resolute action, not of the partisan supporters of a partisan Government, but of a patriotic people combined for the defence of the Constitution and the laws.

The conduct of President Lincoln in Maryland and in Tennessee distinctly reveals a revolutionary purpose. The electoral votes of those States, eighteen in number, cast at the dictation of arbitrary power, may neutralise the same number of electoral votes freely and lawfully cast in other States of the Union. Upon those votes, therefore, the whole future of America may turn. To control these votes in the way attempted by Mr. Johnson in Tennessee, and by General Wallace in Maryland, is to plan a crime against liberty in the Republic. We are fully aware of the gravity of the charge, but the rights, the interests, the issues here at stake are not less grave.

Again and again for the past four years, Mr. Lincoln and his ministers, under one or another plea of military or political 'necessity,' have transcended the limits of executive authority, have trampled upon the sanctity of communial and individual right. It may well be doubted whether any Government in the old world, claiming to hold its authority by Divine right, would have been permitted by any people of modern Europe to pursue its infractions of law and its contempt of liberty so far as the American people, in their devotion to the Union, have suffered Mr. Lincoln to go.

But the patience of the American people has been the fruit of their traditional reliance upon the remedies provided by the Constitution—the right freely to speak their thoughts, freely to print their thoughts, and, above all, the inalienable right freely to choose and to change the agents of the public will.

Once before in our history, under the pressure of an imminent national danger, executive recklessness ventured upon infractions of popular right, tame and insignificant enough to-day beside these usurpations in Maryland and in Tennessee.

Then, however, though in the infancy of our constitutional experience, the wise devotion of the people to the principles of our national liberty, triumphed over the assumption of power, and the 'peaceful revolution' of 1801, under Thomas Jefferson, secured to us sixty years of freedom and of progress.

The ambition of Mr. Lincoln and his supporters now threatens the very remedies through which the 'peaceful revolution' of 1801 was accomplished.

This revolutionary ambition has already been met by Senator Wade and Representative Davis in a temper as revolutionary, with a formal summons of the people to extreme and ulterior measures.

'If those voters turn the balance in his favour,' they exclaim, 'is it to be supposed that his competitor, defeated by such means, will acquiesce? . . . Let the people consider the remedy for these usurpations, and, having found it, fearlessly execute it.'

The National Democratic Committee do not so far despair of the future of the Republic. They believe that the American people, armed with the majestic authority of the Constitution and the laws, will meet these beginnings of usurpation in the spirit and with the determination of their fathers, nor suffer Executive ambition so far to corrupt the constitutional remedies of Executive wrong-doing as to condemn this great and free people in the immediate future to the condition, and with the condition to the remedies, of the subject populations of the older world.

August Belmont, Chairman.

F. O. Prince, Secretary.

PRESIDENTS AND VICE-PRESIDENTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The members from two States being equally divided, the State voted blank.

A Recantation.—General Garibaldi seems to have awoke to the true nature of the American war. His sympathies have long been claimed by the partisans of the Federal cause. The following extract from a letter, written by Mr. Robert M'Tear, and published in the Glasgow Herald, contains the present ideas of Garibaldi on the subject:—'He (Garibaldi) expressed great regret at the continuance of the struggle in America, and said he did not believe that the North honestly desired the extinction of slavery, or that the war was carried on for that end. It is a war for power, and to satisfy wounded pride on their part, and has become a war of self-defence on the part of the South, which has shown the truest patriotic feeling, the greatest bravery, and the finest generalship. He abhors slavery in every form, and believes that it has received its death-blow in America. He denied most emphatically that he ever offered his services to the Federals, and said that he did not see how he could consistently have interfered in the quarrel under the circumstances. General Türr told me precisely the same thing.'

Paine and Lincoln.—For some weeks our columns have contained accounts of the infamous atrocities of General Paine—of his thefts and of his cold-blooded murders. The Cairo correspondent of the St. Louis Republican says:—'General Paine informed one of our citizens, after he had been relieved, that he had received a long letter from President Lincoln heartily endorsing and approving all he had done, and warmly commending him as the right man in the right place.'

SOUTHERN PRISONS AND YANKEE GRATITUDE.

The Right Rev. Bishop Johns, of Virginia, has written the following letter to Mr. Stanton, the Federal Secretary of War, in correction of the statements of a Federal surgeon who was paroled at the request of Bishop Johns. This letter was sent to Stanton with the request that he would publish it. As might be expected, he declined to publish it:—

Richmond, Virginia, Jan. 28, 1864.

To the Hon. Secretary of War, U. S.:

Allow me to submit for your consideration a simple statement, with no other design than to subserve the cause of humanity as connected with the treatment of prisoners.

Some weeks since it was my privilege to obtain the release of Dr. Goldsborough, a surgeon in the United States army. I had repeatedly visited him during his confinement, and was permitted to proffer to him and others similarly situated any assistance which I deemed proper. He invariably replied to my enquiries that he was furnished with everything which a prisoner of war could expect—wanted nothing but an additional under-garment to supply the place of one which he had lost at Gettysburg. This I offered to send him at once; but as he expressed a preference for purchasing it with his own funds, which were in the possession of General Winder, I had the order procured and placed at his disposal. He did not use it, and, in a subsequent interview, attempted an explanation, but so confused in its character that I changed the conversation to relieve his embarrassment.

At a later date he sent for me to show me a letter which he had received, informing him of the illness of his father and brother, and of their great desire to see him, and asked me to try and procure his parole for this purpose. He urged this on the ground of his being a non-combatant, assuring me that he had not joined the army from any zeal against the South, but that, being without practice, he was desirous to be in a position which would afford him employment and support in the line of his profession. I went immediately to Judge Ould and asked for the parole, solely on the plea of humanity. He replied that, under existing difficulties, which had arrested the exchange of prisoners, he did not feel authorised to yield to the sympathy which the case involved, unless by so doing something could be effected towards a general exchange of surgeons and chaplains; but if Dr. G. could and would visit Washington for this purpose, and use his own and such other influence as he could obtain to promote this and the plan proposed by Judge Ould, then the parole might be granted. I asked for these conditions in writing, and handed them to Dr. G. for his consideration. He assured me that he cordially approved of the views of Judge Ould, and would do all in his power to prevail upon his own Government to concur. He then signed an agreement to this effect, and took a copy for himself. By the next flag of truce he was permitted to return to the United States, and carried with him the funds which, during his imprisonment, had been in the keeping of the Provost-Marshal. In parting, I took the liberty of stating to him that my ability to be of service to others would depend very much on his course after his liberation, and expressed the hope that nothing would occur to make me regret my agency in procuring his parole. His assurances left no room for apprehending the slightest disappointment. And yet this man, with a worthy name, which he should have changed before prostituting it by ingratitude and falsehood, had scarcely reached his home when he began to utter the grossest misrepresentations as to the treatment to which his fellow-prisoners and himself had been subjected—hastened to Washington, not to comply in good faith with his engagements as an agent for effecting a humane arrangement; but to widen the existing breach—inflame revenge by his report of cruelties which he knew had never been practised; and then boast that his statements had stimulated his Government to severe retaliation upon the Confederate soldiers in their prisons.

As I was connected with his parole, which afforded him the opportunity for attempting to increase the sufferings of others, I deem it a duty to make this statement to correct the false impression which his uncontradicted representation may have produced, and to prevent the misery which might ensue. My own testimony is as follows:—During my visits to Libby Prison, to minister to its inmates as need might require. I have often appealed to them, individually and in groups, to know if they had any cause to complain of the treatment which they experienced, assuring them of my readiness to secure the redress of any real grievance. The uniform reply has been that they had no inhumanity to complain of, and that, except the want of outdoor exercise, they wanted nothing but to go home. The spacious rooms of the building, which was originally an extensive tobacco warehouse, I always found sufficiently warmed and ventilated, and the appearance of the inmates that of persons in good health.

In penning this statement, I do but comply with the demands of conscience and humanity, and shall be most happy if it serves to prevent all unnecessary suffering on the part of those whom the fortune of war has subjected to imprisonment.

With due consideration, yours,

J. Johns,

Bishop of the P. E. Church in Virginia.

Disease in the Federal Army.—Surprise is sometimes expressed at the awful mortality in the Federal armies. It is forgotten that besides the waste of life in battle there is camp sickness, which must be exceedingly heavy among troops remaining during the unhealthy seasons in a trying climate. Probably the roll of death is more augmented by fever than by the sword. The New York Daily News says:—'The pestilence that killeth in the noonday is already among our army at Newbern. The Assistant Medical Director at Fortress Monroe has sent to that place several additional physicians. The "prevailing sickness" which is stated to be the cause of these additions to the hospital there is, we presume, some of the terrible forms of the "tide water" fever. The ravages of that disease among Grant's troops have been kept profoundly secret from the public; but they are, notwithstanding, well known here to have been very great.'

The Chinese and the Negro.—In the course of a speech recently delivered in New York, ex-Governor Bigler, of California, said:—'If the free voting principle be extended to the negro, what was to be done with the Chinese, of whom there were 40,000 in California? They were a more intelligent race than the negro, and yet the California Supreme Court had decided that the Chinese could not constitutionally become citizens of that State.'

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of THE INDEX, 291 Strand, W.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

Advertisements should be sent and Money Orders made payable to J. B. HOPKINS, INDEX Office.

The War.

As the day of election draws nearer, the driblets of news from the war that reach us through Northern sources become more and more obscure and perplexing. At no previous time has so wide a discrepancy between Northern and Southern accounts been observed; and as we have no reason to believe that the officers of the Confederacy have suddenly adopted Mr. STANTON'S tactics, we are bound to conclude that it is the emergency of 'the situation' north of the Potomac which is accountable for the extravagances of telegrams, and that the Northern palate requires at this juncture a more highly seasoned dish than usual. On three important events—the chief features of the news brought by the last mail—the reports from Washington and from Richmond not only differ, but are entirely contradictory, and they will be interpreted, of course, by Northern partisans in the most favourable sense to the armies of invasion. But there are a few facts admitted on both sides which point to certain definite results of the operations reported, and from these we venture to think a tolerably sound judgment may be arrived at. Taking the battle-field of the Shenandoah Valley first, we find that SHERIDAN has actually retreated forty miles from Harrisonburg to Strasburg. We pointed out last week the difficulty he would experience in maintaining his position at the former town, and the probability of his retirement. There was ample reason for such a retrograde movement, in the fact that he was fronted by a Confederate force which had repulsed an attack, and that his communications were more or less open to the raids of MOSBY'S horses. But Mr. LINCOLN'S organs endeavour to buoy up the hopes of the North with the suggestion that it is only 'a change of base,' and that Manassas and Alexandria are to be henceforth what Harper's Ferry has been to the army of the Shenandoah. This will deceive no one who has any recollection of past Virginian campaigns. SHERIDAN'S force east of the Blue Ridge Mountains would be exposed to an attack from Richmond at any moment, and would be entirely useless. There is no field for this gallant officer's special talents between Manassas and the South Anna River. The hot blast of war has already rolled over this district; there are no barns to burn and but few families to render homeless. Moreover, unless SHERIDAN'S force is doubled, and that by veteran troops, he is not likely to try his luck on the classic ground of Manassas. The movement upon Strasburg is a retreat pur et simple—the cruel desolation of the Shenandoah Valley and the fortifications at Strasburg prove this; and this retreat means that the diversion intended has failed, and that the danger which for a moment seemed to threaten LEE'S communications with the West, and with his depot, Lynchburg, has entirely passed away. Whether SHERIDAN will hold Strasburg or not depends upon LEE'S necessities at Richmond. But if it be true that LONGSTREET has superseded EARLY, we shall in all probability soon hear that the Confederates have resumed the offensive. As to SHERIDAN'S claim of a victory, of the pursuit of ROSSER twenty-six miles, and the capture of eleven guns, it is so much on a par with his report of 'EARLY'S demoralised and routed army' flying pêle-mêle into Richmond that we must at least wait for corroboration from Southern sources. Let us hope, for the credit of humanity, that this Federal MUNCHAUSEN has as grossly overstated the havoc and ruin he and his brutal soldiery have caused in the valley of the Shenandoah.

The accounts of the last day's fighting in the neighbourhood of Richmond are equally discordant. But here the discrepancy is less perplexing, for it is General BUTLER who fixes the losses of the victorious Confederates as well as those of the defeated Federals; and opposed to his version is that of General LEE. We don't believe that even the New York Herald would endorse BUTLER'S figures. What is certain is, that, after checking the Federal advance along the Newmarket Road on the Thursday, LEE became the assailant on the following day, drove KANZ'S division in confusion from their entrenchments, capturing ten guns and many prisoners. The attack on General BIRNEY'S lines appears to have been an addendum of General BUTLER. Under any circumstances that engagement put out of the question for some time to come any further advance upon Richmond, and brought the operations north of the James River to a standstill. In despair, GRANT has again had recourse to Mr. LINCOLN'S advice, and has called up FARRAGUT to his assistance. As that energetic and resolute officer has succeeded where others have failed, it is perhaps fancied he may find a new road into Richmond. But he will find the work of removing the obstructions of the James River a tough and tedious job. Wherever his ironclads go there must be assaulting columns to aid him, or there will inevitably be a repetition of last year's failure. The record of contradictions would not be complete without General BURBRIDGE'S repulse at Saltville. This officer claims to have driven the Confederates into the very works which it was his object to capture; and then, failing suddenly in ammunition, to have retired comparatively without loss. Of course the obvious truth is, that he assaulted Saltville, was repulsed, and driven off with heavy loss, affording one more proof of the extraordinary resources General LEE has at command in and around the capital of the Confederacy.

But the most striking contradiction occurs in the reports from the two armies in Georgia. In Washington, SHERMAN is represented as master of the situation, HOOD is reported to be in full retreat, and FORREST to have barely escaped annihilation. In Richmond things are regarded very differently. It is there held that HOOD has commenced offensive operations on a grand scale; that by a bold and skilful manœuvre he has marched the bulk of his army upon SHERMAN'S single line of communication; and that for the time SHERMAN is completely isolated and cut off from Tennessee. The admissions of the Federal commander go far to confirm this view of the position. Whilst claiming a victory at Altoona, he expresses his fears about Rome and Kingston; he acknowledges the occupation of Dalton, but states that he has no reason to fear for the safety of his main army. The facts seem to be these. HOOD, after strengthening the defences of Macon, and rendering that city secure against a sudden attack, marched with his main army upon West Point, west of Atlanta, and then turning eastward crossed the Chattahoochie, and fell with different portions of his force upon several points of the Chattanooga and Atlanta railroad. He had thus planted himself strongly on SHERMAN'S only line of communication, and it would be necessary for the latter to march out of Atlanta and fight a pitched battle, or starve. Confederate accounts represent HOOD as holding a strongly entrenched position at Marietta, as having captured Rome with its garrison of 3,000 Federals, and as threatening Kingston. In any case it is clear that the bulk of HOOD'S army is somewhere between Atlanta and Chattanooga, and that the Federal garrisons of the intermediate stations will be easily reduced. It is not improbable, then, that another great battle may be fought in Georgia. But it must be borne in mind that defeat in such a case would be destruction to SHERMAN'S whole army; and it is very doubtful if he has sufficient means of transport and supplies to enable him at once to take the field and hold Atlanta. He is deficient in cavalry; his train of mules is known to have suffered terribly; he has lost many regiments of veteran troops, and for weeks his transport of provisions and ammunition has been seriously impeded by the Confederate operations in Tennessee. Nor can he be easily reinforced. Everywhere the North is in need of troops. The Federals are hard pressed in the Shenandoah Valley; they are inactive before Petersburg; in Tennessee they have hard work to hold the railroads; in Missouri they are outnumbered and threatened with expulsion. And, above all, there is the Presidential election close at hand, which will effectually dispose of many thousands of Federal soldiers. From the Mississippi neither supplies nor reinforcements can reach him, as is proved by the fate of the expedition from General WASHBURNE'S department. And it seems to be left to General SHERMAN to extricate himself from the difficulties of a position, the perils of which he never sufficiently considered. If it shall turn out, as we have reason to believe it will, that HOOD has been heavily reinforced, and if FORREST, and RODDY, and LEE, and WHEELER, are all acting in concert with the view of isolating SHERMAN and cutting off his retreat, then the campaign in Georgia and Tennessee will assume an importance not second to that of the operations around Richmond. It would be worse than useless to speculate on the probabilities of such a struggle. But it is sufficient for the present to know that everything points to a favourable issue of the movement so brilliantly commenced by General HOOD.

At Home in England.

THE Liverpool Bazaar has proved a decided success. The objects for which it was called into existence have excited, not generosity, but enthusiasm. As a mere act of charity it is an addition to the long and splendid list of the efforts of English benevolence; but it can be regarded under aspects exceeding in attraction even that of noble liberality. As regards the mere monetary results, the Bazaar has no precedent. The Patriotic Fund, the subscriptions for the Lancashire Distress Fund, surpassed by tens of thousands the twenty-three thousand pounds realised last week at Liverpool; yet those sums were raised by a nation for its national purposes—they had their strength in the principle that charity begins at home—they contained within them the remote regard for self joined to and elevated by the idea of a true devotion. But the work of benevolence done at Liverpool was accomplished for the benefit of men as near akin to us as it is possible for foreigners to be, yet at the same time foreigners. In the simple fact that the Confederate soldiers are not Englishmen consisted the supreme excellence of the disinterested effort of kindness.

The word foreigner, however, must sound harshly to the ear of a Southern man. If the saying be true, 'ubi libertas, ibi patria,' surely it may be conceded that a similar title can be earned by the scene of friendly actions. In truth it may without much trepidation be affirmed, that to the Confederate gentleman England is a second home. He may travel on the continent of Europe, and in the polite capital of France, among the courteous citizens of Florence or Milan—even in the cities of Germany—he can find hospitality, urbanity, and generous sympathy. But all his hosts are foreigners, his most respectful companions are strangers. Here in England there is for him something warmer than the expression or the show of courtesy. It is not merely that the language, the religion, the manners, the laws too, and the political and social features bear a marvellous resemblance to those of the South, though all these have their just influences. It most assuredly is not the admiration or the pleasantries of men in high places. It is the deep and unshaken assurance that the hearts of the English people are with him.

Indeed, if the tone of ministers and politicians could succeed in a perfect estrangement of two peoples between whom a good understanding is of the last importance, the conduct of leading men in this country would be attended with immense results. What can be more distasteful to a nation that has a keen appreciation of sincerity, and has also the courage to be sincere, than the wretched comments of English politicians on the American war? Speeches full of reservations, qualifications, of hopes of this good result and fears of that evil result, and pious ejaculations, and neutrality not of policy but of sentiment, with a holy horror of bloodshed, a suppressed idea of the antitype of the Pharisee and the Publican, and an insinuated thankfulness of superiority to a pair of miserable combatants, sicken the soul of straightforward men. It is asked again and again, why cannot these leading men speak out? If they are for the Federal Government and think its objects sound and its actions just, why do they not say so? Why this perpetual trimming, this assumption of neatly balancing the virtues and the vices, the gallantry and the weight of metal of either side? In a moment of heat the exclamation rises to the lips, 'If God be God, serve him; but if Baal, then serve him.'

Yet there is a force which instantly checks the just indignation. The English people are braver and more honest than their leaders. The phantom of irrational responsibility does not dance before their eyes. They are willing to acknowledge that the heart does form part of their natural organisation; and they are not ashamed, in spite of the state of exports and imports and the exuberance of trade, to obey the impulses of a noble passion. If they sympathise with the Confederate cause, they avow their predilections; and it is precisely because no Southerner can walk the streets of London, or travel by railway, or converse with those persons who from time to time cross his path, without indisputable evidence of the feeling of the English people, that to him this country becomes a second home. Nay, if he chooses to mix with the crowd that scans the bulletins of the daily journals, he may fancy that he is once more in Richmond, and that he hears the expressions of his own compatriots.

Now, in the Liverpool Bazaar, a way was opened for the full current of popular feeling to flow. The state of the tide was already learned, but there its force and direction were abundantly ascertained. Of course fashion will do much, and a gorgeous spectacle will do more. But facts exist which indicate with unmistakable clearness that the Bazaar was neither a parade nor a charm for the cure of ennui. Two statements will suffice for example. The stalls were guarded not merely by Southern ladies, but by English ladies exceeding in number the natural protectors; while the energy of the latter in no way fell short of that of the former. The second proof is yet more noteworthy. It is a fact that the tradesmen of Liverpool came forward, and, with a liberality beyond praise, supplied at their own cost the most sumptuous entertainment, constituting themselves hosts with a prodigality not easily to be forgotten. These and the like examples are the bubbles on the surface which surely indicate the action of hidden impulses.

For these reasons, then, in spite of official coldness, in spite of the caution of aspirants for power or of self-imagined politicians, in spite of the ten thousand calumnies which once froze up the reputation of the Southern nation, but which have thawed rapidly under the effect of that warmth of admiration which gallant deeds and noble hearts excite in the breast of a great people, the Confederates hold England dear. They refuse to forget from what ancestors they have sprung, and whence they have drawn the inexhaustible fountain of an unconquerable spirit; and they look forward to a time when the bonds already formed by the ties of blood, of laws, and of dependent interests shall be cemented by the candid avowal of mutual respect.

Political Passions.

There is a certain class of statesmen in England for whom the cant phrase of approbation is that 'their opinions are always listened to with respect.' This may certainly be considered as faint praise, and therefore as carrying with it the condemnation which the poet declares is involved in that expression; but by the conventional usages of society it is relieved from this meaning, and is allowed simply to denote that the object of it is neither a scoundrel nor a drivelling idiot; in short, it is a mere negation of bad qualities. In another point of view the expression may be considered to be an amplified form of the Homeric epithets with which our public language abounds. In old times a warrior was always blameless, a maiden always deep-breasted; in the nineteenth century every officer is gallant, every lord is noble, every lawyer learned, and every common-place politician entitled to be listened to with respect. The great advantage of the formula is that the speeches of the gentleman to whom it is applied may always be described as able and temperate, without in any way binding the critic to an enthusiastic admiration of the sentiments uttered, or even an acquiescence in their fundamental truth.

Of all the rising politicians of the day the very last who ought to be placed in the category of pure mediocrity is Lord Stanley. The heir apparent of a great house, the son of an English statesman of very high order, with a mind carefully trained in the best schools of thought, with an experience of men and affairs far greater than usually falls to the lot of men, he bids fair to take up with dignity the prominent position to which a large class of Englishmen are most anxious to call him. Whatever may be the defects which his adversaries find in him, we should scarcely expect them to be those of a man whose speeches 'deserve to be listened to with respect.' Holding these opinions on the subject of Lord Stanley, we are pained to read the 'able and temperate' speech made by his Lordship to his constituents at King's Lynn. It is one which we cannot consider worthy of his position, of his family, or of himself. Had the speaker been a native of Yankeeland, he would have been aptly described as 'sitting on a rail,' and his smartness would have been admired by those who care little for downrightness and straightforwardness. Had he lived in that as yet undiscovered Utopia where government can be conducted constitutionally without the aid of distinct parties in the State, he might have deserved credit as the cautious and somewhat cold-blooded apostle of that doctrine. But being an Englishman, and a reputed lieutenant, so to speak, of the Conservative party, he cannot evade the responsibilities of his position; he must either stand by his creed manfully, or manfully abjure his errors; he must not be suffered to tone down disagreeable differences into agreeable varieties after this fashion:—'Between moderate Conservatives and moderate Liberals the differences are slight—all between the two extreme parties represent shades of opinion which imperceptibly merge into one another, the most reasonable one, in my opinion, being generally found near the middle.' If Lord Stanley really believes this, we are sorry for him; but we should as soon expect to hear a Protestant theologian descant on the imperceptible gradations between bad and good, as a Conservative statesman enunciating such opinions. That they are 'able and temperate' in the cant sense of the term, we allow with a sigh of disappointment; but that in the present juncture of affairs they are truly statesmanlike, we must absolutely decline to believe.

The same temperateness and deadness of colour is apparent in the manner in which his Lordship touches upon the principal points of external and interior policy which are at the present time engaging our attention, and influences equally the correctness of his conclusions. Thus, in the first matter which he brings before his audience, the policy of complete non-intervention, inaugurated, as he says, by the great debate of July last, he is perfectly contented to adopt the theories which were then supposed to have received the sanction of the nation, merely warning his hearers that the day will come when the feelings and political passions of men will lead them to think differently, and destroy the good work of the last session of Parliament. To any but an 'able and temperate' speaker it might have occurred that feelings and political passions were possibly quite as active in establishing the new doctrine as they will be in destroying it, and that it might be worth while to analyse the peculiar sentiments of which our lately-founded policy is the offspring. But either the natural temperament of Lord Stanley or the purpose of his dissertation forbade it, and he passed on to an examination of the particular events in which our non-intervention was manifested. They are the affairs of Italy, Germany, Turkey, and America. In the discussion of the first of these we regretted to see that the 'temperateness' of the orator was evinced by the cold and sneering fashion in which he spoke of the enthusiasm of the Italians for Rome, 'an unhealthy and decaying town, possessing no peculiar military and commercial advantages, and with nothing to recommend it except an historical name.' Of all sorts of interference there is none so galling, and at the same time so useless, as that of a sneering comment; and the criticism is in this case doubly unfortunate, as it must be equally disagreeable to each of the contending parties in Italy. Then, with regard to Germany, we might have expected to hear a statement of some of the reasons which induced the House of Commons to run counter to the 'feeling and political passions' of England, the existence of which Lord Stanley will scarcely, we suppose, deny. Or, again, since he declined entirely to take notice of the effect of the Danish war on ourselves, he might have touched on the manner in which the whole of Europe has been affected by the arbitrary proceedings, the reckless repudiation of treaties, and the general hypocrisy in which the German Powers have so largely indulged. Quite the contrary; he never mentions the Danish war, but treats us instead to a prophecy with regard to the future of the smaller States of Germany, again studiously ignoring the existence of a certain German feeling, emotional, enthusiastic, romantic, or whatever he may please to call it, still a real live feeling, which is more likely to decide the future of these States than the abstract consideration of the advantages or disadvantages of a French alliance. With respect to Turkey the language of the speaker was, designedly perhaps, obscure; he rebuked the prejudices of our older statesmen, who refuse to let Turkey go by the board, and prophesied the speedy appearance of a certain dominant race in those quarters, with whom we are to drive an enormous trade: at the same time he allowed that it would be highly impolitic to permit any strong European Power to hold Constantinople, and equally foolish not to secure the neutrality of Egypt. Of course, we may ask what is the dominant race which will possess the plains of Thrace and the rich provinces of Asia, while it leaves Constantinople on the one hand, and Egypt on the other, in a state of neutrality. We may demand a clue to this political problem, and look with respectful surprise upon the man who can speak of it as if he held the solution in his hand; but this is not the point to which we are now drawing the attention of our readers. We would rather have them ask why Lord Stanley has taken no account of the remarkable incidents which ushered in the Crimean war—the aggression of Russia and the determination of the Western Powers to resist her attempts even at the price of commercial advantages. He has again ignored in this case the peculiar features by which the first interruption in the forty years of European peace was marked—the 'feelings and political passions' which were then working, and which are still equally active, though in a somewhat varied shape.

In his remarks upon the American war, the fourth matter of our external policy of which Lord Stanley treats, he has been no less unfortunate. Curiously enough, he has in this instance allowed for a certain amount of political passion as an agent in the affair, and points out the results which he thinks will ensue in consequence of it. He says: 'Considering the determination which the North has shown, I think it likely, as I did three years ago, that, with its enormous superiority of force, it will occupy and overrun in the end the whole territory of the South.' This determination of the North, he then explains, is the result of 'a feeling of revenge and a desire for supremacy.' Now we must really object to this remarkable way of stating the relation between the belligerents in America; it must not be supposed that so erroneous a view of affairs can be allowed to pass unchallenged by us. We are not asking for the intervention which once might have saved rivers of human blood; the time is past when we might have used humble intercession to the European Powers on behalf of the Confederate States of America; the hour is fast approaching when they themselves will demand it as a right against which none can argue. All that we would now point out to our readers is that Lord Stanley has, on his own showing, omitted to mention the strongest political passion which has affected either side in the American war. He speaks of the determination of 20,000,000 Northerners to conquer—a determination which has as yet failed of its object. Why has he said nothing of the determination of the 6,000,000 or 7,000,000 Southerners to resist, which has up to the present time been so successfully carried out? Surely, where the numbers are so absurdly disproportioned, the feeling which influences the victorious minority should be taken into account equally with, if not before, the abortive desire for revenge by which the Northern community is inflamed. Lord Stanley has resolved the determination of the North into its two elements of revenge and tyranny; may we not also say, on the other side, that patriotism to the Confederation, patriotism to the State, memory of family wrongs and of personal insults, indignation at licentious brutality and wanton massacre, contempt of past knavery and present hypocrisy, all combine with the innate love of independence in the Southern nature, and are welded together into a fixed purpose of resistance, before which the lusts of a Lincoln will prove powerless? Thus far for the Southern feelings which Lord Stanley has not cared to mention. But what of that Northern determination of which he thinks so much? Founded on wrong, and built up in iniquity, it is itself continually in danger of destruction from the internal dissensions with which it is vexed; and if that were not enough to insure its fall, it has an antagonist from without, though within its own Constitution, in the shape of a peace party, which may even at this moment be sapping its foundations. Such is the character of the only moral influence which Lord Stanley acknowledges within the whole range of the political world.

We have confined ourselves to the foreign topics which Lord Stanley discussed, as illustrating most fully the error into which he appears to us to have fallen. The same error may be detected in his comments on our colonial affairs, on our financial department, and on the long-vexed difficulty of reform. We confess the temperateness with which the argument is conducted; but we must consider that temperateness is bought at a very dear price, when for the sake of it all the inner motives are passed over, the natural sympathies, the prejudices and aspirations which are continually at work in the politics of the world, and which must work so long as nations are made up of men and not of machines. We regret the evil road into which Lord Stanley has wandered the more that we believe the mistake to have occurred unconsciously to himself, in his anxiety to offend as few as possible; but we are not the less bound to protest against it as the cardinal doctrine in a system which promises hereafter to be most fertile in mischief.

Voices of the Recess.

Two noteworthy speeches have been delivered during the past week, one by a clever Ministerial subordinate, the other by a clever Liberal malcontent; both throwing some light on the ideas which have of late years gained a general if not very sincere acceptance among a certain class of politicians, and suggestive of enquiries which can hardly be summarily disposed of within the limits of those autumnal speeches which have become a part of the acknowledged functions of a member of Parliament. Mr. Bernal Osborne fills an unrecognised office which, if not very dignified, assures to its possessor a certain amount of notice and even of popularity. The House of Commons, which has assumed so many of the ancient privileges of sovereignty, insists, like the sovereigns of old, on keeping a jester, whose licensed impertinences relieve the dulness of debate and enliven the weariness of legislative work; and for several years that post has been filled, to the general satisfaction, by the member for Liskeard. It is due to Mr. Osborne to admit that amid the mass of stale jests and dull buffoonery which the tolerant taste of Parliament accepts as wit and honours with a laugh, are to be found occasional flashes of sarcastic humour which are really telling, and home-thrusts which hit the harder that dignity forbids their victims to resent them. The Solicitor-General is a man of great consequence. He represents in the Administration that American interest which exercises so powerful an influence on their policy. While holding the office of Counsel to the Admiralty, he stretched the license of his profession to its utmost limits in undertaking to advise the Federal Embassy in the prosecution of its claims upon the Government in the case of the Alabama; and his voice has seldom been heard in the House of Commons save when it has been necessary to justify the measures by which the Ministry have proved the warmth and friendliness of their neutrality towards the Northern States. It is not without significance that the points on which this gentleman founds an enthusiastic eulogy of the Government he serves, are precisely those which Mr. Bernal Osborne singles out as exceptions to his searching and sarcastic criticism of their general policy—namely, the 'strict neutrality' they have observed between the American belligerents, and the pacific tendency of their action, if not of their language, in regard to the quarrels which have disturbed the peace of Europe. The points in the conduct of the Ministry upon which each dwells with most commendation refer to those topics on which each is at variance with the public sentiment of England. The legal adviser of Mr. Adams eulogises their American policy; the Parliamentary champion of Prussia praises their treatment of Denmark.

Mr. Osborne draws a contrast, the moral of which has a double aspect, between Lord Russell's interposition on behalf of Poland and his careful avoidance of intervention in America. Why, he asks, if you would not interfere in the sanguinary American war, should you have meddled with the fruitless insurrection of Poland? And we, in turn, may ask why the Minister who sympathised so warmly with the sufferings of Polish rebels had no word of rebuke for the worst atrocities inflicted on the gallant people of the Confederate States, our near kinsmen and coreligionists. Are we to suppose that Mr. Osborne is right in attributing the distinction to Lord Russell's confidence in the temper of Russia, and his dread of the irritable susceptibilities of the people of the Northern States?

Sir R. Collier, avoiding the Polish precedent, is lavish of his expressions of self-complacent satisfaction with the faithful observance by Government of our neutral obligations towards the United States. It is to be observed that he, like most of those who take a similar view, speaks of the American war as if there were only one party to it—as if we had nothing to consider but how to avoid any interference with the rights and interests of the North. This is the tone of nearly all Ministerial advocates, and their acts accord but too faithfully with their language. Their only care has been to do and endure everything which the North could with any shadow of reason demand of them. Thus Sir R. Collier cites, as a proof of their strict fulfilment of neutral obligations, the seizure of the supposed Confederate ships at the demand of the Federal Embassy. It is only from his very peculiar point of view that such an act could be deemed anything else than an extreme act of complaisance towards one of the belligerents, barely consistent with neutrality. For the Attorney-General distinctly laid it down that no rule of international law obliged us to such a measure. And if we admit that the Foreign Enlistment Act entitled us to seize the ships, this by no means disposes of the question. That Act is not a compulsory one, and Ministers have always used the widest latitude in regard to its enforcement. It had never been enforced before; it had been very recently and openly disregarded in the case of the Garibaldians; and its sudden revival for the purpose of checking the operations of one belligerent while the other was notoriously and systematically violating or evading its provisions, can hardly be treated as a proof of impartial observance of neutral obligations. Indeed, the case would never have been recalled to the recollection of his hearers by an orator who had any serious regard to the fact that the action of a neutral ought to be impartial. The Solicitor-General only cared to show that we had done nothing unfriendly to the North; he was bent on praising the Government, and, in his eyes, acts of hostility towards the South would not be ground of dispraise. Had he really been intent to show that the attitude of Government had been one befitting a neutral Power—had he bethought him that neutrality has two sides to it, and that it was quite as necessary to show that we had not befriended the Federals as that we had not injured them—his task would have been by no means so simple. He would have had to explain the distinction which permits the Federal Government to make Ireland a recruiting-ground while the Confederates are excluded from the Liverpool dockyards. He would have had to account for the withdrawal of consuls from Confederate ports at the demand of the Federal Government. He would have had to excuse the seizure of the Tuscaloosa, a Confederate commissioned man-of-war, and the license allowed to Federal cruisers to burn and sink vessels within musket-shot of British shores. It deserves notice that all those who commend the neutrality of the Government pass these matters by without comment, and dwell only on the undeniable fact that the Ministry have done everything in their power to conciliate the North—a fact in itself sufficient to cast suspicion on their neutrality in the judgment of all who remember that the claims of both belligerents on neutral Powers are strictly equal, and that every favour rendered to one is an injury towards the other.

Satisfied, or more than satisfied, with the curious kind of neutrality observed by Government in the American quarrel, both the Minister and the malcontent express a hearty approval of its determination not to fight in defence of the integrity and independence of Denmark. Mr. Osborne belongs to that school of Liberalism which makes an open profession of national selfishness and calculating cowardice; which holds that wealth is better than honour, and commerce more precious than conscience; which regards a ten per cent. income-tax as the worst of evils, and will hear nothing of any duty, any principle, any obligation arising out of the riches, the security, the strength, that God has given us to protect the weak and stand up for the right. Let despotism trample out liberty, let great Powers absorb small ones, and let England sit by with folded arms, waiting until the tide of aggression threatens herself before she dreams of risking her trade or closing her markets by drawing the sword upon her customers. Such is the doctrine of those in whose ranks Mr. Osborne has enlisted; and it is one to which the Solicitor-General also betrays an inclination. But he cannot make up his mind to that self-created isolation, that accepted insignificance which the scheme involves. Don't let us go to war, but let us not therefore abdicate our place in Europe. 'Why should we hold our tongue because we do not choose to fight? Why should we not freely express our opinions, though we don't intend to back them by force?' So argues Sir R. Collier. The answer ought to have been sufficiently apparent to any man who has ever asked himself what is the meaning of an expression of opinion by a Government. Why do foreign nations listen to the advice of the English Government, and at its instance postpone or settle a quarrel? Is it because our reasoning is so powerful, our Minister so wise? If it were so, the interposition of Belgium would be fully as effectual as our own. Can any one in his senses suppose that Count Rechberg, or Herr von Bismarck, or M. Minghetti, or their sovereigns care what Lord Russell or Lord Palmerston personally think of their proceedings, or are moved by the arguments of those noble lords? What foreign Governments respect is the English navy; the opinion to which they listen is the opinion of those who can send that navy to blockade their ports and blow their coast defences about their ears. When once it shall come to be understood that we don't intend to use our navy for the purpose of enforcing our opinions, we sink at once, in point of influence and authority, to the level of Belgium. Our neighbours know that they can do what they like without our leave, and they will no longer take the trouble to ask it. If we do 'speak our minds,' we shall not be listened to with even the show of respect; and it does not beseem a nation to utter an opinion which has ceased to carry weight. We cannot enjoy the cheapness of isolation, and the power and authority that belong to an active participator in the world's affairs, at one and the same time; and if we have decided upon the former, let us not make ourselves ridiculous by vainly pretending to the latter.

But the truth is that England retains her influence because her neighbours are aware that neither the policy of isolation, nor the modification proposed by the Solicitor-General and practised by the Foreign Office, really represents her national intention. Mr. Osborne and Sir R. Collier, Mr. Cobden and Lord Russell, as little represent the mind of the nation in their European as in their American policy. While the Government truckles to the North, and the Radicals flatter it, the heart of the nation is with the gallant struggles of the South, and will respond unanimously to the first appeal that shall be made to it by a Minister resolved either on an honest neutrality or an energetic interposition. And while Mr. Cobden preaches the gospel of selfish gold-worship, and Lord Russell makes open profession of cowardice before Europe, the English nation fears neither the cost nor the danger of war; and the first Minister who shall appeal to her ancient spirit on behalf of an oppressed and injured State will find that spirit as quick and as fiery as ever. Lancashire has endured three years' starvation rather than begin an 'unrighteous' war; England would face thrice as much rather than submit to an unworthy and ignominious peace.

'Measures, not Men!'

In days of conflict, when the armour is in constant use, no rust can lie on its surface undetected; when the strife has ceased, vigilance is needful, lest, disuse breeding neglect, rust should mar its brightness or eat away its strength. When neither storms threaten from without nor internal convulsions shake the State—when the struggle for freedom is ended, and the mind is loosed from the folds of superstition, and the body is unshackled by the chain of tyranny—when peace is within the borders and prosperity abounds—when the term is reached where it is lawful 'to rest and be thankful,' and to move forwards is only to move downwards—when all men say 'peace and safety'—the time of a nation's greatest peril has arrived. Then it behoves men to beware that the heritage received from their fathers sustains no damage at their hands—that the blessings they enjoy are jealously preserved and righteously used. There is danger lest overweening confidence, the sure precursor of ruin, should be induced by prosperity—lest the principles which sustained the conflict should be lost sight of in the rest secured. What is party warfare but a conflict of principles? If principle be wanting, it degenerates into a selfish struggle of rival factions. What is constitutional government but that graduation of classes, that balancing of opposing influences, which, while it preserves order in the State, secures liberty to the citizen? It has been slowly evolved in England from a mass of hostile principles and conflicting interests, and it has been the good fortune of this country that neither King, nor Lords, nor Commons have at any time been strong enough to override and exist without the others; while the different classes which make up together the subjects of the realm, though always distinct, have never been utterly separate, nor has any one principle or any one interest ever been able to assert and maintain complete supremacy over its competitors. The results are patent to all: there is no nation so free and yet so orderly as England, no country so abounding in wealth and resources of every kind. But this, as we have seen, is precisely the state of things that calls for the greatest vigilance, and should make us consider how these results were obtained, and how they may be best preserved. Such a problem, however, we have no intention of discussing on the present occasion. But one or two collateral questions may be shortly noticed as worthy of consideration. At the same time it must be borne in mind that, though we speak of the constitution of England as the product of principles and interests differing among themselves, these are in fact the motives which impel men to action, and the results obtained through their influence are gained by earnest men. This remark is an obvious one, the reason for making which will presently appear. The traveller in unknown regions finds his attention arrested at every step—every new turn in the way presents fresh objects for scrutiny and consideration—while the man passing over a well-known and oft-trodden path goes on his way heedless of the objects around him. So also a new doctrine invites criticism, and by its opponents and partisans is so investigated and thoroughly sifted that no fallacy involved in it escapes detection; while an old doctrine is accepted for the most part without reflection and retained without consideration. A new party cry or form of words attracts attention and challenges opposition or support; an old one is adopted with scarcely a thought as to the meaning it conveys, or rather conceals; the ignorant, the thoughtless, or the prejudiced catch up and reproduce the empty words which, while they convey no true meaning to the mind, often influence and generally mislead men's actions. 'Measures not men' has become a sort of cant expression repeated on all sides with a sort of feeble enthusiasm, but with little heed to the principle it involves; but it is worth while to pause for a moment to consider what is the meaning of an expression so vaguely employed—what is the truth or falsehood veiled by that form of words. 'Measures not men'—that is to say, so long as certain measures are introduced, we care not by what men or set of men they are brought forward. Whether Lord Derby or Lord Russell, Lord Palmerston or Mr. Disraeli are the men in power, we care not to enquire; all we require is that the men in office shall form a sort of machine for the producing of certain measures necessary, or supposed to be necessary, for the well-being of the social system. It is no doubt true that if certain measures are ascertained to be necessary for the country, and if those measures can be introduced by any party or any set of men, then it matters little, except to the enjoyers of power and its emoluments, and to their immediate followers, who the fortunate few may be. But, we would ask, who can decide what measures are necessary? Who can decide that the measures which appear beneficial now would not be absolutely injurious three or four years hence? Who can feel secure that the measures promised on the hustings will be introduced to and carried through Parliament? Does not the present Ministry afford a notable instance that the very contrary of this may occasionally happen? Mr. Carlyle has well observed that the 'history of the world is the biography of great men.' Are we to ascribe the various changes which since the world began have swept across it, to the adoption of measures or to the actions of men? Does the measure mould the man? or is the man the author—the soul, so to speak—of the measure? Great changes have ever been introduced, vast results achieved, mighty empires shaken or supported, not by the measures that may have been adopted, but by men with a definite purpose before them, acting on a clearly present principle, having the sagacity to devise and the courage to carry out their schemes. It is the fashion to say that great occasions produce great men, and that in troublous times men equal to the emergency are sure to arise. Does the time produce the man, or does the man take advantage of the opportunity? What made Macedon for a time the ruler, or at least the terror, of the world. The skill of Philip and the valour of his son. Was the power of Rome shaken, and her very existence threatened, by the prudent measures of Carthage, or by the skill and courage of Hannibal? What gave the imperial for the republican form of government to Rome—the measures adopted in the Senate, or the vigour and capacity of Augustus? What broke up the Roman empire but the decay of manhood in her citizens? Was it the measures proposed by his advisers, or the address of Belisarius and Narses, that reproduced the ancient fame of the empire, and shed a lustre of glory over Justinian's reign? It is vain to multiply instances which must occur to every mind. If we search the pages of ancient history, what stands out conspicuously in every country and under every circumstance? What illumines the darkness of the middle ages? What has built up and perfected the civilisation of modern times? The measures proposed, or the men who have acted? If men are required to break down, or change, or build anew, how much more are they necessary for that harder task of supporting in a time of quiet that which has already been built up, of preventing injury from arising to the fabric through the lethargy of some, or the reckless desire of change displayed by others! Further, let us consider what manner of men they are who compose, so to speak, the history of the world—whether the exigencies of the hour or the requirements of the after-time weighed most with them. Would England now be what she is if, in the days of the First Charles, the Hampdens, Pyms, and Elliots had counted the cost of resistance to kingly encroachments? Was it the highest prudence or a fortunate rashness that inspired Elizabeth to resist the apparently resistless power of Spain? Had the cost of the struggle or the might of the enemy weighed with Pitt, and Canning, and Castlereagh, Europe might still be trembling at the power of France. Reform was carried, and Catholic emancipation obtained, by men with a definite purpose before them, and a steady will to attain the objects they had in view, regardless of the immediate difficulties and dangers in their path. Men, not measures, then, have fashioned the world's history, and those men have been influenced, not by narrow views of present gain or safety, but by a comprehensive understanding of what would in the long run prove advantageous. It is not too much to say, that, until recently at all events, England has been preeminent among the nations for her disregard of expediency and steady adherence to principle, and in this she has prospered. From the days of Corcyra and Corinth down to the present time, no country has ever become great, and no great country has ever continued so, by abandoning the duties imposed by its relations with other States, or by refusing, from a selfish fear of consequences, to act the part assigned to it by circumstances. The preservation of the peace of the world is the great object which a great commercial country ought to have at heart. It is not enough that its ports should be filled with the merchandise of every clime, and the interests of trade advanced and protected by its Government; other nations expect more than this of it; the people themselves feel that they exist for something more than this. It is melancholy when the honour of a country is sacrificed by its rulers. A high-spirited people will not long endure that it should be so. Not merely to carry on successful war, but also to maintain honourable peace, it is essentially necessary that those holding office should be ready not to propose measures only, but to act the part of men. In their relations with foreign Powers, in their dealings with their sovereign no less than with their fellow-subjects, the Ministers of a great country should be men. Let one instance suffice. Few Englishmen beheld without indignation the grievous wrong wrought on the Danes by the German Powers; none beheld without shame the course pursued by England. Who did not blush to see hopes excited only to be disappointed—a gallant nation brought to the verge of ruin by the uncertain vacillations and pusillanimous conduct of English statesmen? The sympathy for Denmark was general throughout the country; if we may judge from their words, the Ministers themselves shared in the general sympathy. We were told that the Danes should not stand alone in a certain contingency. On another occasion we heard that the English fleet was in the Downs ready for service. When asked for an explanation of a statement so unexpected, the high-spirited Premier of England had recourse to the empty boast that the English fleet was ready to go anywhere and do anything. Who, that knows aught of current history, is ignorant of the cause of England's sympathy become so useless, of the discrepancy between the words and acts of her statesmen? Who does not grieve that it should be so? Who can forget the contrast presented by Pitt, who, when no longer able to serve his king and keep his pledged word, resigned the trust he could no longer hold with honour? As we have before observed, it is as hard to keep a country great as to make it so. Men are required to do men's work in times of peace and plenty as much as in times of danger and alarm, but it is harder to discover them. Only find the men—the measures may well be left to take care of themselves. The Ministers of a free country have to direct into the proper channels the popular energies; they have also to tender advice to the sovereign. When an object is proposed in any quarter incompatible with pledges they have given, either to the people at home or to foreign nations, or when it is contrary to what they believe to be for the public advantage, only one course is open to them if they would preserve their honour and their reputation. A great country needs great men; these secured, wise measures will be obtained from them. An Administration which is either moved by the tumult or applause of the people, or is made to swerve from the path of duty by other considerations, does no good service to the sovereign, brings discredit on itself, and reflects upon the country its own disgrace.

Sheridan's Retreat.—By an order from General Grant the Federal force under Sheridan, which has pursued the Confederate army down the Valley of the Shenandoah, has turned northward again. But in retiring it has devastated the whole of the valley, from Brook's Gap, the most southerly point it reached, to Strasburg, its present quarters. A track of fertile country, 60 miles in length, with an average breadth of 40, between the Blue Ridge and the North Mountains, is burnt into a wilderness. We hope the General has exaggerated the extent of the destruction of which he has been the instrument, but he reports that 2,000 barns and 70 mills, stored with corn and forage, meal, and implements of agriculture, have been given to the flames. One of his men was shot in carrying his order into effect, and in retaliation 'every dwelling within a radius of five miles from the spot where he fell' was burnt. Comment on such an atrocity is needless. Some physiologists have asserted that the Americans have gradually acquired something of the Red Indian cast of countenance. Can the spirit of the savage have also entered into them? But if the war is to go on thus it will be the modern disgrace of mankind. The destruction of what invaders spare, if even for their own sake, looks more like desperation of success than a reasoning confidence. The Federals must have given up the hope of possessing in future the soil they ravage. Nemo sic vastat sua.—Times.

Electioneering Victories.—A correspondent of the Montreal Gazette, writing on October 5, says:—'I am a careful reader of the telegrams, and find that in the last three months—ever since Mr. Lincoln was renominated—the Federals have won fifty-nine battles, while during the same period they did not admit a single reverse.'

no English statesman could point out on the map dependencies we possess on the American and Australian continents. It is remarkable that colonial affairs occupy a smaller space in our newspapers than is given to the business of a single police court, and that France occupies in one day as many columns of the Times as are afforded in a week to the whole of our colonial empire put together. One principal reason of this apparent indifference is no doubt the absence of all anxiety or alarm on behalf of communities so prosperous, so progressive, and so very well able to take care of themselves; another, less satisfactory to the sensitiveness of the colonists, is the frequent pettiness of those political contests which occupy so large a share of their attention, and the difficulty which English readers find, from their necessary ignorance of the details of colonial affairs, in understanding even such important questions as those connected with the occupation and distribution of land, the organisation of secular and religious education, and the like. But there is no real indifference between the mother-country and her distant children. An invasion of Canada would be resented as fiercely as an invasion of Kent; and the prosperity of the Australian settlements is as gratifying to us as that of Scotland. If Canada has been, until lately, comparatively neglected by the English press, it is not necessary to attribute this circumstance to any coolness or want of sympathy with our most powerful and civilised colony. She has been overshadowed to a great extent by the more rapid growth and infinitely greater power of the United States. Her politics have been complicated and uninteresting; her prosperity has been sufficient to preclude all uneasiness on her account without exciting peculiar notice. But of late events have made her the subject of a degree of interest second only to that excited by the affairs of New Zealand, and much more likely to last. The outrage on the Trent made the defence of our American possessions a matter of extreme anxiety; and never since that time have our relations with the Northern States been such as to reassure us on that score. The difficulty of communicating with the Western province, and the absence of railways and obstruction of river navigation, which makes the transmission of reinforcements during six months of the year all but absolutely impossible, have caused much discussion in this country, and made us far better acquainted with the geography and the circumstances of British America than we were four years ago. And just now peculiar interest attaches to that country, as the proposed scene of a new experiment in colonial government.

The prospect of a federal union among the provinces is regarded with hopeful good will by all parties in the mother-country; nor are Englishmen slow to perceive, or lukewarm in approving, the effect of such a union in the relations between British America and her ambitious neighbours. Canada begins to interest us, not only as a British settlement, but as a nucleus of a future British Power in America—a power which, by its own strength and its connection with the mother-country, will be likely to play no unimportant part in the politics of the Western hemisphere. These circumstances have attracted towards Canada and her sister provinces an unusual share of public attention, and Mr. Day could not have chosen a better time for the publication of a work on 'English America.'
A somewhat different arrangement, the omission of some matters in no way peculiar to the country—as the description of a lunatic asylum, and the chapter on newspaper puffs of quack medicine—as well as a clearer and fuller account of interesting matters with which the public at home are not so well acquainted as Mr. Day seems to suppose (the oil wells, for example), would have made the book more agreeable to the general reader, and promoted its popularity. It might have been as well, moreover, to have collected together the statistics distributed through the volume, and formed them into a tabular appendix.
However, the work contains much useful information, and will afford material for many 'public instructors' who are somewhat at a loss where to seek an account of Canadian progress more recent than the excellent work of Mr.
Johnston.

The unfortunate rejection of the Militia Bill gave rise to a serious, though not protracted, misunderstanding between the Canadians and their countrymen at home. This scheme of colonial defence was understood to be recommended by the Imperial authorities, and to be absolutely essential for the protection of the provinces; and its rejection was thought to signify a disposition on the part of the colonial Legislature to throw the whole burden of their defence upon England. This, as it appears from Mr. Day's narrative, was a mistake. The Bill was introduced by a Ministry which had brought itself into great unpopularity, and the finances of Canada into utter confusion; it would have involved an expense which the Exchequer was in no condition to meet; and Parliament was not prepared to accept so large and costly a measure at the hands of a tot-

Sore as they were at the somewhat sharp censures of the English press, the Canadians were in nowise rendered less loyal to the mother-country by this unlucky controversy. The impertinent sympathy offered by the New York press was indignantly repelled, and the colonists trusted to time and explanation to set them right with their compatriots. We are assured that no part of the British empire contains more loyal subjects of Her Majesty than Canada. Their feelings and their interests alike attach them to a sovereign whose rule is never felt as a restraint, but always as a protection. Upper Canada did not until lately feel so keen an antipathy to the Yankees as their recent insolence has provoked; but the Orange spirit, whatever its faults, which prevails in that province is in itself a guarantee of attachment to the British Crown, and the colonists were constantly reminded, by their political contests with the French Catholics of Lower Canada, of their British birth and their connection with the great Protestant nation from which they sprang. There are in the Western province few settlers of other than British blood; the German element is wanting and the Irish subordinate; and thus the colony has none of those anti-English influences which are paramount in the States, and are not altogether absent from our Australian possessions. Such being the case, it would require a long course of interference, vexation, and insult, such as is happily now impossible, on the part of the Colonial Office, to alienate the affections of Upper Canada. Lower Canada is comparatively lukewarm, but content and prosperous under our rule, and therefore loyal in the passive sense. Another feeling supplies the place of that natural devotion which we can hardly expect from a foreign race. If the French Canadians do not love the British, they detest the 'Bostonais,' and in the event of an invasion would fight as heartily from hatred of the starspangled banner as their Western brethren from love for the British flag. Both sections are perperfectly sensible of the advantage they derive from the protection of Great Britain; and the expression of an unfortunate mayor, who, in what he meant for a loyal speech, pronounced his attachment to British rule on the ground that it was 'so much cheaper,' represented a conviction universal even among those who are the least moved by any sentiment of traditional loyalty.

Recent events have done much to stimulate the ill will between the Yankees and the Canadians, and the aversion of the latter to that annexation which is continually promised or threatened by their neighbours. The menaced conscription drove American citizens from all the frontier States into Canada, until the border counties positively swarmed with fugitives; and the spectacle of so many refugees, congratulating themselves on their escape from the land of liberty, was calculated strongly to impress the Canadians with a sense of their own good fortune in living under the shadow of an empire which asked nothing of them but that they should assist in their own defence. The Federal authorities took violent measures to repress the emigration. They stationed guards along the frontier, on the banks of the lakes, and of the St. Lawrence, to arrest the fugitives. More than once these guards fired on Canadian boats, sometimes when these contained women; and the Canadians were so indignant at the outrage, that they were with difficulty restrained from taking that summary vengeance which the offenders had amply provoked. Such acts as these, and the inroads on British territory made by parties in pursuit of deserters, leave behind them an animosity which rankles long and deeply, and gives an additional fillip to the loyal zeal and the Southern sympathies of the Canadians.

It is not now too soon to predict that the history of Canada is not to end in annexation to the United States. The separation of the East and West—of the energetic, pushing, Protestant population of Upper Canada, from the calm, Conservative, Catholic French of the Lower province—will remove the last source of discontent and danger. The Upper Canadians at present outnumber their neighbours considerably, and are jealous of the equal share of political power assigned to the latter by a scheme devised when the preponderance was on the side of Lower Canada. And the French Catholics, with a social system derived from the ancien régime, are resolute in resisting the political encroachments of their rivals, feeling that their institutions would not stand long against the assault of a British and Protestant majority. But when left each to itself, without fear on the one side or jealousy on the other, Upper Canada will have no desire to meddle with her neighbours, and they no reason to stand on guard against her. A close federal union will certainly be possible between those who for twenty years have contrived to get on under a consolidated government; and the new Federation will be far too powerful to have any inclination towards Yankeedom. The development of those internal communications which the separation of Canada from the maritime colonies has hitherto retarded, will give that stimulus to emigration and to commerce which is alone wanting to enable Canada to rival the prosperity of the Western States. Railways, judiciously directed, will make Toronto as accessible as Cincinnati, and will offer to the immigrant as good a market for his labour as he can find in Illinois or Ohio. The condition of the States after this war will not be such as to tempt intending emigrants to prefer the Stars and Stripes to the Union Jack; and Canada will, if she make due use of her opportunities, be enabled to secure that supply of labour which has hitherto been absorbed by the States, and which has given them their sole advantage over her. It is impossible to read Mr. Day's book without seeing that Canada has great advantages over more popular fields of emigration. She has a less genial climate than that of Australia, but a soil much more favourable, and resources in her inexhaustible forests, and advantages in her vast sheets of water, which are altogether wanting to a continent which seems to be behind the rest of the world by a whole geological era. When once the intercolonial railway shall enable travellers to reach the unoccupied lands of Canada through British territory; when proper places and means for the reception of emigrants (the absence of which Mr. Day discloses) shall have been provided; and when sufficient communication shall have been established between the farms of the West and the markets of the maritime colonies—all of which improvements seem to be now in a fair way towards their accomplishment—Canada will begin to reap the advantage of her comparative proximity to England, and divert no inconsiderable portion of that stream of labour which now finds its way to the Antipodes; enriched and fertilised by which, she will become indeed, what she has been often called, 'the brightest jewel of the British Crown.'

THE FALLS OF NIAGARA.

(NOTES OF AN EXCURSIONIST.)

September 1864.

We started by steamer early in the morning, landing on the American side by the mouth of the Niagara River, and proceeding by rail to the largest of the several hotels on that side, 'The Cataract.' The journey was only a short one, noticeable for nothing beyond the curious feature presented by the confluence of the Niagara River and the broad waters of the Lake, where, as with the Rhone and the Arve at Geneva, the Ottawa and the St. Lawrence at Montreal, the Gulf Stream and the Atlantic Ocean, there seems to be such a want of chemical affinity between the two currents that their waters will not intermingle: for miles you could trace the line of contact so distinctly marked that you might fancy some hidden breakwater kept the two apart. Our steamer took us about eight miles up the Niagara River, a very pretty sail through lofty wooded cliffs, and thence 'the cars' whisked us along the top of the American shore, skirting the edge of the precipice at such a giddy height as made me shudder to look down and see the angry rapids foaming and fretting beneath us. Half an hour and we were in sight of the cloud of mist that day and night rises from the Falls high above the forest and the town; and another half-hour, and, after a very distant peep at the Falls themselves, we were landing from the cars within a few yards of the great Cataract Hotel.

The house stands close upon the edge of the upper rapids of the river, just where they race and hustle through the rocks as they prepare themselves for their final leap into the abyss beyond. There is no view from the windows of the actual Falls, but the scenery around is beautiful. The rooms open out upon the rapids, the drawing-room being a splendid apartment with a balcony running round it, from which we took our first view of the magnificent scene; our second look at the same grand picture being obtained from a wooden pier thrown out upon some boulder-stones that have lodged in the midst of the current. Opposite to the Hotel lies Goat Island, concealing from the eye the Canadian Falls, but adding to the beauty of the rapids by its own exquisite loveliness of foliage. It is this island that divides the waters of the river into the two currents that are precipitated over the Canadian and American Falls. The Canadian, or Horse-shoe Fall, is the grander of the two. The American, of less volume, is at right angles with the former some little distance lower down the river, for the Canadian Fall, the more powerful, has eaten away the upper bed of the stream faster than her sister Fall, and so retreated, as it were, several hundred yards higher up the gorge.

Passing by a suspension bridge which connects Goat Island with the mainland, we walked to the lowest corner of the isle and stood at once upon the brink of the precipice down which thunders the American Fall. No scene that I have ever witnessed overwhelmed me with such uncontrollable wonder as that which I looked upon as I stood on the margin of the plunge of the mighty cataract. The height, the power and volume of the Falls exceeded my utmost expectations. I had been told that I should be disappointed; but if there be any who have been, I cannot conceive what their imagination could have anticipated. I own I expected more noise, but the state of the atmosphere affects that, and the roar of the Falls (like that of Bottom and Earl Russell) will at one time be as paltry and insignificant as at another it will be grand and terrifying. I should like to have the power to give you some idea of the sublimity of the scene, but it is utterly useless to attempt a description of what is wholly indescribable. The tortuous surgings of the rapids, the sudden calmness at the brow of the cataract, the majestic sea-green curve in which the liquid mass glides over the edge of the precipice, the silvery ringlets into which it is broken up soon after leaving the brink of the rock, the feathery mist in which it showers down into the cloud of spray that ever veils the last fifty feet of the Fall, and the infernal writhe and whiteness in which it reappears in the depths of the abyss, all these wondrous features of the Queen of Cataracts must be seen, watched, sat beside for hours and days, before the mind can grasp the magnificence of the scene. But we were as yet only in sight of the American Fall. A walk along the further side of Goat Island brought us in view of the Canadian Fall, and then I found that I had been expending my fullest admiration and astonishment upon a mere thread of Niagara, the thousandth part of its volume and grandeur, for there was before me again the same glorious scene that I have so briefly sketched; only it was a thousand times intensified.

We ascended and took a view from every one of the numerous points from which tourists are expected to survey the Falls, and paid all those preposterous sums which tourists are invariably doomed to give—for Niagara has its excursionists by thousands, and its 'look-outs,' 'summer-houses,' 'retreats,' 'staircases,' 'perilous seats,' and such-like attractions for an excursion party; but it is less cockneyfied, for all that, than many a place that I have visited—less so than Chamouni and the Righi, and such favourite resorts that do not draw half so many visitors as the Falls. Having done our duty as pure excursionists, and been bled accordingly, we took a carriage and drove off to the Canadian side of the river, crossing by the famous suspension bridge which connects the British and American territories. It is an extraordinary triumph of engineering skill to have thrown across the yawning gulf such a mass of weighty metal as here spans the torrent. How it ever got there is to my mind a dark inexplicable mystery, of which I am not mathematician or engineer enough to see the solution; but there it is to testify, in conjunction with the tubular bridge of Montreal and the canals of the St. Lawrence, to the ingenuity and enterprise of the people of Canada. The bridge is two miles below the Falls, so that the view thence is too distant to be effective; but the drive up to them along the Canadian cliff, past 'The Clifton House,' the great Canadian hotel, is, I think, the most beautiful road I have ever seen. It is from this side that you get in one grand comprehensive landscape the whole length of the American and Canadian Falls, with the steep precipices of Goat Island between them, and the cliffs of the American bank further down the gorge, and above them the roofs, and spires, and gables of the town peering out from amid the forest that forms the background of the picture. Table Rock is a lofty shelving promontory of limestone jutting out from the Canadian shore close upon the brink of the plunge of the great Horse-shoe Fall; and there we sat, as all tourists do, and gazed in rapture at the marvels of nature unfolded around, above, beneath us. I cannot tell you what we saw; you could not depicture it to yourself if I could. I will only say that that one view from Table Rock would repay any one a journey from the farthest corner of the world. All the landscapes I have ever seen—all the snow-pictures of the Alps—all the coast-scenery of the Mediterranean—all the lochs and moors of the Scotch Highlands—sink into insignificance when compared with the incomparable grandeur of Niagara. It is not the Falls themselves alone that cause the magnificence of the scene; but the beauty of the landscape, of which they are the centre, adds a hundredfold to their intrinsic splendour. But it is useless to tell you how I sat and wondered at the majesty of the view from Table Rock; you must go and stand there yourself, and then you will be amazed, as I was, at the all-absorbing interest of the scene, and ponder as I did upon the marvellous force and volume of the waters that every second plunge down the heights before you, and wonder whence comes the inexhaustible supply, and whither it goes, and how many a long roll of countless summers has looked on the same unvaried scene; and so you will wish, perhaps, to put down on paper some little memento of what you saw and felt, and find I dare say, as I do, that the attempt is futile.

But a distant view of the Falls gives but a faint idea of their solemn grandeur. To comprehend them in their awe-inspiring sublimity, you must descend to the base of the cliff, and walk in amongst the spray, and under the curve of their flight down the precipice, and see the terrific power of their waters and the impotence of man beside them: in fact, you must do as I did, make the expedition to 'the Cave of the Winds,' and then you will have impressed upon your mind, perhaps too forcibly, the detail of the more awful properties of Niagara, which a close acquaintance can alone reveal to you.

The 'Cave' lies underneath the American Fall; the trip is decidedly a perilous one, but it is 'the thing,' and so, to be fashionable, I did it. The party of adventurers consisted of eight, and a guide, a French Canadian. At a house by the foot of the Fall we were provided with a dress, or at least an apology for a costume, the very queerest, oddest-looking, scantiest set of garments in which I have ever appeared in public. The suit consisted of a remarkably thin threadbare flannel shirt, a much thinner and much more threadbare pair of flannel drawers, a pair of flannel socks or slippers, and a cord round the waist; the whole surmounted by an oilskin skull-cap. I never felt more like the maniac who persisted in confining his street toilette to 'hatband and straps,' or realised more painfully the confusing effect of the penetrating glances of half a dozen young ladies, than on the occasion when our little party in Indian file threaded the gauntlet of the inquisitive ones who had drawn up to see us enter the cave. But a bold face and buoyant spirits were necessary for the work that lay before us. After a few words of counsel from the guide about not being frightened, but keeping straight ahead, and energetic assurances that we should not be drowned—though we should be sure to fancy that would be the result, for every one, he said, thought so at first—we descended some steps that led right down into the spray of the Fall, and at the bottom came upon a path or narrow ledge that wound along the cliff inside the archway of the Fall. From the moment that we left the stairs, we got into a fine pelting rain that gradually increased in weight and volume till it bore down upon our skull-caps like hail on a skylight. But the cave lay on the further side of the sheet of water, through which we had to get as best we could. How that was I cannot tell you. The guide led the way into the steam and turmoil, bending himself nearly double to keep the beating spray from his nostrils, and clinging on to the slimy rock, for the foothold was slippery and difficult. I believe I did the same, but I cannot say. The guide was immediately lost to our view; and all that I could hear amid the thunder of the cataract beside us was an injunction to push on when it came to the worst, for the illogical reason that it was shorter to get beyond the sheet of water than to turn back. I cannot tell you what a terrifying scene it was—how the waters roared around us—how the stifling spray beat upon our faces so as to drive all the breath out of our bodies—how the wind, caused by the falling mass of water, blew about in a thousand blinding gusts (as if old Æolus had untied every single sack, and let out the whole of his seminary for a general holiday), dashing the rain into our faces and chests, or driving it against our backs and legs, or both ways at once with equal fury—or what I did, or what I saw. I don't know where, or why, or how I went. I only know that I went down into this watery hell and came up again uninjured, but very much out of breath and more frightened, half blinded, more than half deafened, and three-quarters drowned. The rest was comparatively simple—merely a scramble through the mist over slimy polished rocks, a swim across a little pool, and a climb to a chair fixed on a rugged crag, when I found myself out in front of the Fall, with a splendid view of it looking upwards before me, and, the greatest novelty of all, a circular rainbow all around me, at times too doubled. Five minutes' rest upon the crag, and we retraced our steps—for there was no other way back again to terra firma—and then in again amongst the rain and the din of waters, more panting for breath, more struggling with the wanton gusts, more bewildering of the eye and ear, more clinging for bare life to the slimy rock, and clambering up the slippery staircase; and so we reached the more hospitable regions of the open air, and again ran the gauntlet of the curious eyes that awaited our return to daylight—less nervous, perhaps, about their gaze after what we had faced below, but very much more dégagés and disreputable. I don't know that I should care to make the expedition again, though I met one rather stout Canadian who told me he went down regularly twice a week under the idea that it would reduce his fat; but I am not by nature amphibious, and I consider the feat well worthy of the certificate with which the guide presents the visitors before they leave, testifying to the fact that they have 'passed through the Cave of the Winds.'

The Cataract Hotel was filled with guests—all the hotels always are—and there was an amount of style about them which was very different from anything I had seen in Canada. Dinner was served with profuse liberality—dinner toilettes as profuse in their extravagance, colour everywhere, gaiety ditto; a whirl of excitement, dress, flirtation, and fun; and all for $4 a day, which, at the rate at which I sold my gold, was equal to 6*s*. 9*d*. sterling, including music in the evening by a first-rate band, and such a Charlotte Russe as I never tasted elsewhere, and ice-creams, and lots of back hair and no crinoline, and such blue eyes, and endless other luxuries, that made me very loth to leave the Falls, as we at length did, en route for the Great West.

THE GERMAN MARKET FOR FEDERAL BONDS AND FEDERAL RECRUITS.

FROM AN OCCASIONAL CORRESPONDENT.

VIENNA: October 20, 1864.

ONE journey performed by railroad is so very like any other accomplished by the same mode of locomotion that, with the exception of what may be seen and heard during the occasional pauses, a description of the incidents of one would equally describe them all. I am quite sure that you would find but little to interest you in the detail of commonplace events attending a journey from London to Vienna.

I stopped for a day in the free city of Frankfort. This is, as you are doubtless aware, an important point for the traffic in Federal bonds, and in the human flesh necessary to fill up the broad gaps made in Federal armies by Confederate bullets. This latter trade is carried on so briskly, and with so little attempt at concealment, that the day before my arrival a Frankfort journal announced without comment, but merely as an item of current news, that recruits for Grant's army were daily enlisted at the American consulate. There exists no doubt whatever that there are several leading commercial and banking houses in different parts of Germany who receive as regular a commission per head for the human victims they send to Grant's slaughter-pens as they do for the Federal bonds they sell to the speculators in that most fanciful of all the fancy stocks. There is a commercial house in Hamburg which is said to have done the most prosperous business in the way of selling white-skinned Germans to cut Southern throats for the benefit, as they say, of the poor blacks. In justice, however, to all the parties engaged in this nefarious traffic, I must say that they themselves consider this plea as a simple pretext. The Yankees buy the Germans to do their fighting just as their ancestors bought the Africans to do their plantation work. The intermediary agents labour only for their commissions, just as the captains of the slave ships in former days contracted for the delivery of cargoes of Africans; and the hired German knows well that his business will be to cut the throats of his fellow-men, in consideration of high wages in hand and ample bounties in expectancy. The truth is, that the slave trade never assumed a form so odious as that in which it now presents itself in the matter of selling and buying ignorant foreigners, to kill and be killed under the benign rule of President Lincoln. These miserable victims of a trade, alike disgraceful to all the parties engaged in it, as well as the European Governments which wink at, if they do not sanction it, are deceived by the slave-dealers into the belief that they will incur but little risk, while their prospect of gain is enhanced by the probabilities of a speedy suppression of the rebellion, and the distribution of Southern estates among the soldiers of the Federal army. They richly merit the hard fate which awaits the greater number of them in Southern pestilential swamps or from Southern bullets, but their guilt does not soften the criminality of those who employ them in the avocation of hired cut-throats.

It is currently reported that the depot which has been established in Belgium is under the sanction or connivance of King Leopold's Government. If this be true, and there seems to be no reason to doubt it, we have but another evidence of the terror which the United States has inspired amongst the Governments of Europe great and small. They all detest that arrogant Power, and with all their hearts wish success to the Confederates, yet their fears are more potent than their partialities, and they do the bidding of the Yankee Government with a promptitude which, under the circumstances, would be almost ludicrous if it were not so injurious in its influence upon the Southern cause.

This traffic in the raw material for new Federal levies goes hand in hand with the trade in Federal promises to pay. If the former flourishes, it enhances the value of the latter. It is perhaps for this reason that the agents who are engaged in selling the one employ themselves also in the purchase and shipment of the other. You must not, however, suppose that these dealers have any special sympathy for the cause of the North. They speculate simply for the pay and the promised profits; and I am told that the bankers most largely engaged in this trade, and those who have realised the greatest amount of profits, buy to-day and sell to-morrow, or at least as soon as they can succeed in bringing the public to believe, through the press, that the very latest news from America goes to show that the Federal cause is everywhere triumphant.

The Confederate cause throughout Germany labours under a twofold disadvantage. First, the whole country is deluged with Federal agents. You encounter them everywhere—in Frankfort, in Berlin, in Hamburg, in Vienna, and in almost every city where a bond may be sold, or a white cutthroat bought. Unfortunately the Confederates have no means of counteracting the influence of these agents. There are no Confederate officials in Germany, who might accomplish much towards driving out these Federal agents by simply spreading facts before the German public. If but a comparatively trifling though earnest effort had been made, from the commencement of the American war, to enlighten the public as to the true merits of the controversy, and to expose the deceptions which were practised upon them, millions of dollars and thousands of recruits which have been employed by the Yankees in the prosecution of the war, would have remained in Germany. But in the very nature of things this could not be, and hence the Yankee Government has wisely made Germany its chief mart for the sale of bonds and the purchase of white men.

It may be safely assumed that Germany has furnished more actual money for the prosecution of the war against the South than the total amount supplied by the United States. This fact of itself ought to open their eyes in regard to the precarious nature of the securities they hold. If the people of the North do not confide in their own promises to pay, it would seem passing strange that other nations should be willing to trust them.

The truth is, however, that the great body of the German speculators in Federal stocks do not invest in these more than doubtful securities with the intention of holding them until the close of the war. They buy upon the chances of selling at a higher rate, upon a mere calculation that, the Northern armies being the more numerous, Federal successes are more probable than Federal defeats in proximate conflicts. Like the betters at rouge et noir, they know that, in the end, the greater number will be losers, but they hope for a short run of good luck, and then to be able to withdraw from the game, leaving others to be the sufferers.

However this may be, 'operations' in Federal bonds and contracts for the supply of human cargoes as food for the American war are now the favourite speculations of a very large class of Germans.

It is not difficult to discover, notwithstanding all this, that the opinions of the intelligent classes in regard to the merits of the American war have undergone a great change within the past two years. The profound ignorance of the German public of the nature of the late American Union and the causes which produced the war has given place to a partial enlightenment, which the events of the great conflict have, as it were, forced upon their understanding. They were slow to comprehend that South Carolina was, by virtue of the Constitution, a sovereignty distinct from Massachusetts. or that Prussia owed as much allegiance to the German Confederation as Georgia to the Government of the United States. Even yet intelligent Germans often speak of the 'Southern provinces.' But still a great change has taken place, and the partisans of the North are confined to the money dealers and the ignorant Abolitionists who still believe that the war was inaugurated by the North with the sole view to the extermination of slavery in its Southern possessions.

It is surprising that the public press of Europe have given so little attention to this German and Belgian traffic in the blood and sinews of white men. We might have hoped for better things from Belgium; but, alas, there are few Governments in Europe, even among the proudest and the greatest, which dare to give offence to the Federals by doing justice to their adversary. How could such temerity be expected from the minor States?

I know of no remedy for the evils to which I have referred, except in a more enlightened appreciation of the facts, which time and circumstances may develope. If in this case the least guilty are those who suffer most, it may at least be said that all are guilty in a greater or less degree.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

THE COMMERCIAL CRISIS.

We are in the midst of a commercial crisis. We hope that it will not be very violent or of long duration, but it exists. When the merchant takes up his daily paper, he turns immediately to the money article to read the list of yesterday's failures. The high rate of discount has kept our coffers supplied with gold, and loans for very short dates are done at 4 to 6 per cent., whilst very choice paper commands 8½ to 9 per cent. The inference is obvious. Discount is dear, not merely that money is scarce, but because commercial confidence has been rudely shaken. What adds to the panic is, that it comes under unusual circumstances. We have had such a good harvest that wheat is too low to remunerate the farmer, and our last trade returns show an astounding increase. These things ought to indicate fair weather; but the commercial barometer has gone back from 'Fair' to 'Change,' and from 'Change' to 'Stormy.' We propose to suggest the explanation of this apparent enigma.

The return of the Lancashire distress and the strike of the colliers in Staffordshire, though serious events, do not influence in any appreciable degree the condition of commerce. If the colliers' strike continues, it will deeply affect the industry of Birmingham, and so injure the capitalists, but until now it has not done so. Let us now glance at the causes of the commercial crisis.

1. Our abundant harvest is not without alloy. England is preeminently a meat-eating country, and the long drought of the summer and autumn has resulted in a short supply of meat. We shall have to import heavily from the continent. Our wheat harvest was not above the average, and our meat supply being so much below the average, it follows that, on the whole, our stocks of home-produced food are short; and therefore it is an error to say that the commercial crisis comes in the face of abundance.

2. Our trade returns are deceptive. The increased amount is mainly due to the increased price of our products. Dearness does not involve a larger profit, but, on the contrary, the manufacturer is more prosperous in times of cheapness. Take cotton fabrics as an example. Every yard of calico now fetches more money, but not more profit. The effect of the production of Californian and Australian gold is manifest in our trade returns. If by a miracle the gold and silver in the world were doubled, our trade returns would be doubled, or nearly so, but our profits would remain as before. It is probable, then, that our increased amount of trade represents but a small, if any, increase in profits.

3. There has been a mania for speculation created and fostered by the facilities for discount offered by joint-stock banks and financial companies. For the past two years any man of business desirous of speculating has found no difficulty in converting accommodation-bills into money. At no former period was so large an amount of fictitious paper afloat, and for the reason that never before was fictitious paper so easily floated. A glance at the list of failures shows that they are not confined to particular trades.

4. The uncertainty respecting the price of the raw material of our staple industry is an element of danger and disaster. The rumours of peace, and the consequent fall in the price of cotton, were the immediate cause of the present panic.

Thus, then, the crisis is not an anomaly, but a natural result of known causes. We are not so prosperous as we seem to be, and we have been speculating beyond our means. We may expect a return of commercial confidence when the crisis has swept away the tribe of rotten speculators; but we must not expect to be in a safe condition until peace in America has taken our staple industry out of an abnormal position.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

Another week has passed without any alteration having been made in the minimum rate of discount; but although the money market has, altogether, assumed a more satisfactory aspect, the terms out of doors continue stringent. In all quarters there is an abundance of capital, and the demand for accommodation is far from pressing, either in Lombard Street or at the Bank. There is no doubt that money would be easier but for the mercantile suspensions which are continually taking place, and which naturally engender extreme caution, with a reluctance to accept anything but first-class bills. In the open market the terms must be called 8¾ to 9 per cent.; but if the Bank account shall prove satisfactory, there will be a further fall. At the Stock Exchange the quotation is about 5 to 6 per cent. for short loans. It is imagined that, with the influx of capital from abroad, the Bank Directors may, at no distant date, reduce to 8 per cent.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The bullion market has been very quiet this week, but the movements, though not extensive, are not unfavourable, the amount of gold sent into the Bank having been 123,000*l*., whilst the only amount withdrawn has been 50,000*l*. for transmission to the Brazils, leaving a balance of 73,000*l*. to be added to the Bank stock. The arrivals of specie amount to only 15,000*l*. The last packet for the East took out only 68,000*l*., of which 47,783*l*. was for Hong Kong, and 20,226*l*. for Madras, the proportion of gold being 6,075*l*., and of silver 61,934*l*. The silver market has remained in a perfectly quiescent state. The last sales of bar silver were effected at 60⅝*d*. per oz., which is the lowest price attained since September 1861. Mexican dollars, in the absence of any demand, are also nominally lower, the latest transactions having been 59¾*d*. per oz., but it is believed that that price could not now be obtained.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The English stock market has during the week presented an improved aspect, chiefly occasioned by the more satisfactory state of the money market. Business, however, has not been particularly active, the continued failures amongst commercial houses, in various descriptions of trades, preventing speculators from operating to the extent they otherwise would. Still there is an impression in some quarters that the worst has passed, and a return of more general confidence may soon be effected; at the same time in other quarters a more unfavourable opinion prevails. Prices, however, have further advanced, and the market closes steadily. In foreign securities there has been more doing, particularly amongst the fancy stocks, nearly the whole of which are better, particularly Mexican, Spanish, and Turkish, and there seems every probability of a further improvement. Consols closed this evening at 89⅛ to 89¼ for money, and 89¼ to 89⅜ for account, which, as contrasted with the prices of this day week, is a rise of ¾ per cent. Exchequer Bills remain steady, the March issue at 10*s*. to 6*s*. dis., and those of June at 17*s*. to 12*s*. dis. Greek 21⅞ to 22⅛, being a rise of ⅛ per cent. Mexican are up ⅝, the quotation being 26¼ to 26½. Spanish Passives show an improvement of 1¼ per cent., and the Certificates ⅞ per cent., the respective quotations being 31 to 31¼, and 13⅞ to 14⅛. Turkish Six per Cents. of 1854 are 88½ to 89½, and those of 1862 at 70½ to 71, being an advance in the former of ½ per cent., and in the latter of 1 per cent.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The dealings in American Government and Railway Securities are again getting very restricted, the favourable accounts from the Southern armies operating as a strong incentive against purchases. Prices, however, have, under the circumstances, remained remarkably steady. The dealings comprised:—United States of 1881, at 43, 43½, 43¼, 43, and 43¼ ex d.; Virginia State Six per Cents., at 28; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York section, first mortgage, 70; Do. do. Pennsylvania section, 70½ and 70; Erie shares, $100, all paid, 40, 41, and 40; and Illinois Central, $100 shares, all paid, 50¼, 50, 50½, 50¾, 51, and 50.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market has been quiet during the week, but former prices are not maintained. The closing price to-day is 62 to 63.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

The English railway share market has shown more animation this week than for some time past, but the variation in prices has not been so great as might have been expected under the circumstances. The general tendency, however, is better, and prices for the most part have improved, the exceptions being inconsiderable. As compared with last week there has been a rise of 1½ per cent. in London and North Western, of 3 per cent. in Great Western, of 1¼ per cent. in Midland, of 2 per cent.

in Metropolitan, of 1 per cent. in Edinburgh and Glasgow, Great Northern, West Midland (Oxford), Sheffield, Birmingham and Derby, Shropshire Union and Vale of Neath, and of ½ per cent. in Caledonian and South Eastern. On the other hand there has been a fall of 5 per cent. in Taff Vale, of 1 per cent. in London and Blackwall, and of ½ per cent. in North Eastern (Leeds). In foreign and colonial descriptions there has not been so much doing, but prices are generally steady.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

The first meeting of the London, Hamburg, and Continental Exchange Bank (Limited) has just been held, Mr. George Chambers in the chair. The report, which was unanimously adopted, showed that a profit had been earned of nearly 20 per cent. on the paid-up capital. The nett profit was 7,537*l.*, which was disposed of as follows:—3,518*l.* towards payment of a dividend of 10 per cent. per annum free of income-tax; 2,000*l.* to be placed to the reserve fund; 1,000*l.* to be written off the preliminary expenses; and the balance, 1,019*l.*, to be carried forward. It was determined that in future the meetings of the bank should be held in July and January of each year.—At a meeting to-day of the shareholders of the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company a dividend was declared of 3*l.* per share out of the ordinary profits, and a bonus of 2*l.* per share from the insurance fund.

MERCANTILE SUSPENSIONS.

The following suspensions have been announced since our last number:—Mr. John Peddington, foreign patent agent, liabilities about 30,000*l.*; Messrs. Duckworth and Co., liabilities about 45,000*l.*; Messrs. Hall and Geere, Russia brokers, liabilities about 30,000*l.*; Messrs. Simpson and Co., insurance brokers, liabilities about 29,000*l.*; Messrs. Manning and Collyer, jute brokers, liabilities about 100,000*l.*; Messrs. Galbraith, Bigland, and Co., merchants and commission agents, liabilities about 150,000*l.*; Messrs. de Wolff, Schück, and Co., merchants, liabilities about 35,000*l.*; Messrs. Hodgson and Mather, Liverpool merchants, liabilities about 200,000*l.*; Messrs. Thompson and Oldfield, Liverpool merchants, liabilities about 37,000*l.* The bills of Mr. T. W. Bradley, wine merchant, have been returned. His liabilities are supposed to be considerable. Letters from Brazil confirm the magnitude of the failures reported in our last number. The liabilities of Messrs. Souto and Co., who were the largest bankers in Rio, are stated at 5,200,000*l.*; those of Messrs. Gomes and Filho, 3,000,000*l.*; those of Montenegro and Lima, 1,600,000*l.*; and those of Oliveira and Bello, 1,200,000*l.*—making a total of 11,000,000*l.* Messrs. Lamb and Co., wine merchants, and also engaged in blockade-running, with liabilities said to be about 500,000*l.* The stoppage of Messrs. Souto and Co. appears to have been the cause of the other failures. Mr. Vilebes, engaged in the Spanish trade, with 50,000*l.* liabilities, with assets expected to prove satisfactory; and Messrs. T. R. Schweitzer and Co., bill brokers, for 100,000*l.*, and the assets, it is hoped, will realise a good dividend. Nine small failures have occurred in Manchester, with liabilities about 150,000*l.*, and three in Liverpool, with liabilities about 72,000*l.*

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The prospectus has been issued of the London and Scotland Bank, for which a capital is sought of 500,000*l.*, to be raised in 10,000 shares of 50*l.* each, with a first issue of 5,000 shares, more than two-thirds of which, it is said, have already been subscribed for. The object of the undertaking is the centralising the business of a number of branches of the London Bank of Scotland, which have not been included in the arrangements entered into between that bank and the Mercantile and Exchange Bank. The branches in question are situated at Edinburgh, Dundee, Falkirk, Jedburgh, Hawick, Berwick-on-Tweed, Alnwick, Morpeth, Newcastle-on-Tyne, and Hexham. The head office is to be in London, with a principal office at Edinburgh.—The prospectus has also been issued of the Ouvah Coffee Company (limited). The capital proposed to be raised is 100,000*l.*, in 10,000 shares of 10*l.* each, power being reserved to the directors to increase the capital should they deem it necessary. The arrangements for the purchase of the estate appear to be satisfactory, and Messrs. Hallett, Ommanney, and Co., bankers, of Great George Street under an agreement with the vendor, guarantee upon the capital paid up a minimum dividend of 10 per cent. per annum, by half-yearly payments during the three years next after the allotment.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

In the produce markets business progresses slowly; but although purchases continue to be made with considerable reserve, they are in many instances slightly extending. The high value of money, however, imposes an efficient check to any important enlargement of operations either by the trade or speculators. Prices since our last report have, as a general rule, remained steady with rather a firmer tendency than otherwise, arrivals having continued moderate, and the supplies on the markets by no means heavy. The grain markets do not present any new feature; the buying is in no case extensive, but rates for wheat, flour, and maize are steadily maintained. The provision trade is without activity, but quotations for the most part are firm. American butters, of good and fine quality, command a steady sale at 90*s.* to 112*s.*, and some extra fine parcels have realised 116*s.* per cwt. Bacon is dull of sale. American short rib-in middles, 44*s.* to 45*s.* per cwt. In navy provisions there is next to nothing doing, and rates are merely nominal. The petroleum market is inactive, and prices a trifle weaker. American refined is quoted 2*s.* per gallon, but there are few offers over 1*s.* 11½*d.* Crude remains at 17*l.* per tun. Seed oils are still rather depressed, linseed being purchasable at 33*s.*, and pale rape 44*s.* 6*d.* For brown rape, however, the tendency is slightly firmer, 42*s.* 6*d.* being asked for foreign and 42*s.* for English. Tallow has not varied materially, but holders are less desirous of selling, and the tone is firmer in consequence. The metal trade is still without any symptoms of improvement. Scotch pig iron has been at 50*s.*, then rallied to 50*s.* 9*d.*, and is now 50*s.* 6*d.* per ton cash for mixed numbers. Spelter has declined to 21*l.* 10*s.* per ton. Straits tin has been sold at the reduced price of 94*l.* 10*s.* cash. Common English pig lead offers at 20*l.* to 20*l.* 5*s.* In dyes the only movement to note is a decline of 1*d.* per lb. for Honduras, and 1*d.* to 2*d.* for Teneriffe cochineal. The former may now be quoted 2*s.* 7*d.* to 2*s.* 11*d.* for ordinary to middling silver, and the latter 2*s.* 10*d.* to 3*s.* 1*d.* for low middling to good. Drysalteries are generally steady. Cutch is dearer at 22*s.* to 22*s.* 6*d.* for Pegu. In chemicals, soda crystals have been placed at 4*l.* 10*s.* ex ship, being cheaper. A moderate business has been concluded in sugar at about previous rates. Coffee maintains its value firmly, but the demand is not active. The tea trade is dull, but in the few transactions effected previous rates are current. For fine saltpetre 29*s.* is still the selling price cash terms, and a moderate business is passing.

Liverpool, Wednesday, October 26.—Our cotton market during the greater part of the week was very much depressed, and the improvement gained the week previous was almost entirely lost. This was chiefly caused by the unfavourable nature of the commercial advices, which checked operations. Yesterday, however, there was a considerable improvement in the tone of the market, the dealings were more animated, and there was a general advance in prices, in some descriptions to the extent of 1*d.* per lb. American and Surats were in good demand. To-day, although there has not been so much, the market was good, and prices further advanced about ¼*d.* to ½*d.* per lb. The sales this week have been 50,000 bales, of which 26,500 were on speculation and for export. The total sales this year down to the present time have been 2,073,110 bales, and to the same period in 1863 they were 2,209,686 bales. There have been imported this year 1,865,904 bales against 1,295,158 bales last year. The trade have taken this year 1,264,067 bales: to the same period in 1863, 1,124,811 bales. The exports this year have amounted to 463,757 bales; against 382,746 last year. There have been taken on speculation this year 349,772 bales; and in 1863, 641,862 bales. The estimated stocks at the present time are 425,558 bales; whilst last year they were 177,932 bales. The closing quotations were:—American descriptions, 20¾*d.* to 23½*d.*; Pernambuco, 20½*d.* to 23¾*d.*; Maranham, 25¾*d.* to 26½*d.*; Maceio, 19¾*d.* to 20½*d.*; Bahia, 19¾*d.* to 20¾*d.*; Egyptian, 12¼*d.* to 24*d.*; Smyrna, 12½*d.* to 13¼*d.*; Surat, 8½*d.* to 16¾*d.*; Madras, 14¾*d.* to 16¼*d.*; Bengal, 6¼*d.* to 9¾*d.*; Scinde, 6½*d.* to 9¾*d.*; and China, 11½*d.* to 12½*d.*

The markets at Manchester have assumed a rather more cheerful tone within the last day or two, but still great depression exists. A little more business has probably been done on Indian account, but at prices anything but remunerative to the producer. In the market for shipping yarns there is not much improvement: a few sales have been effected at what are described as ruinously low prices. Evidently considerable distrust still prevails: hence there is little disposition evinced to operate. Home-trade yarns have slightly improved in consequence of the better feeling at Liverpool, but prices have not changed. Spinners, however, have lately shown more disposition to press sales, but it has not led to an increase of business. There has not been much doing in the cloth market, but prices remain tolerably steady, the downward tendency recently exhibited being checked by the accounts from Liverpool. This has brought more buyers into the market, who seem disposed to operate more freely, but at present they have not much increased business. The latest quotations are for 7/8 Grey Printers, 6*s.* 6*d.* to 13*s.* 3*d.*, according to quality; 7/8 Grey Madapollams, 5*s.* 9*d.* to 8*s.* 9*d.*; 7/8 Grey Printers, 8*s.* 9*d.* to 15*s.* 9*d.*; 7/8 Grey Shirtings, 10*s.* 3*d.* to 22*s.*; Water Twist, No. 20, 1*s.* 7*d.* to 2*s.* 3*d.*; No. 30, 2*s.* to 2*s.* 6*d.*; and No. 40, 2*s.* 6*d.* to 3*s.*; Mule Twist, No. 20, 1*s.* 5*d.* to 2*s.* 0½*d.*; No. 30, 1*s.* 7½*d.* to 2*s.* 3*d.*; No. 40, 1*s.* 10*d.* to 2*s.* 6*d.*; No. 50, 2*s.* 1*d.* to 2*s.* 9*d.*; No. 60, 2*s.* 1*d.* to 2*s.* 11*d.*; No. 70, 2*s.* 7*d.* to 3*s.* 1*d.*; No. 80, 2*s.* 9*d.* to 3*s.* 3*d.*; No. 90, 2*s.* 11*d.* to 3*s.* 5*d.*; and No. 100, 3*s.* 2*d.* to 3*s.* 11*d.*

A MISSION TO DAHOMEY.

This Day is ready, at all the Libraries, in 2 vols., with Illustrations,

A MISSION TO DAHOMEY: Being a Three Months' Residence at the Court of Dahomey, in which are described the Manners and Customs of the Country, including the Human Sacrifice, &c.

By Captain R. F. BURTON,

Late H. M. Commissioner to Dahomey, and the Author of 'A Pilgrimage to El Medinah and Meccah.'

From the Times, October 5.

'Captain Burton, that exemplar of modern travel in its widest sense and its most interesting phases, has recently returned from the mission with which he was accredited by Her Majesty's Government to the King of Dahome, and now gives the story of that mission and the results of his experience in the form of two handsome and acceptable volumes for the edification and enjoyment of his expectant fellow-countrymen. His direct charge, as stated by Lord John Russell, was to confirm the friendly sentiments expressed by Commodore Wilmot to the King on the occasion of the visit which he made to that chief in December and January, 1862. Thus, Captain Burton took with him the necessary instructions and presents, and passed three months in the country and capital of Dahome in communication with the remarkable potentate who governs that peculiarly interesting community. He witnessed the grand customs and the yearly customs of that grotesquely ceremonious people, including the evolutions of their army of "Amazons," and the traces of their cruel human sacrifices, of which he himself, with proper taste, declined to be an actual spectator; and he brought away impressions of the Dahoman proclivities which are really very curious and instructive, though they were not very satisfactory to himself nor to be commended to the imitation of the gentle philanthropists who patronise the Dahomans or their congeners under the fallacious impression that they can ever be elevated up to the same level of being as themselves. Captain Burton's book is a rude but honest blow to delusions of this kind, and speaks for his courage and candour in the exposition of the conclusions, to which he has come in virtue of an ample experience, in which he has had few, and perhaps we may add scarcely any, equal competitors.'

THERE are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17 Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24 Rue Lord Byron.

Mr. John Bright.

AN old divine said that the paths of the wicked resound with laughter, and there is some foundation for the remark. Unfortunately, the antics of the devil are provocative of mirth. Things nasty and things immoral will ofttimes call forth a smile instead of a frown. At least, we know it is so within this realm of England. We have a striking illustration of this in the national out-door drama that from time immemorial has delighted the ragged urchins of our towns. At the sound of the drum, the whistle, and the shrill cry of 'root-too-too-to-toi,' a crowd of children and many adults assemble in eager haste to witness the exciting performance of Punch and Judy. As far as we recollect, Mr. PUNCH is a gentleman of a humorous and irritable temperament, who throws his baby out of window because it cries, murders JUDY because she deplores the murder of her child, and finally, instead of being hanged for his crimes, manages, by an adroit manœuvre, to hang his appointed executioner. What is there funny in murder, in the gallows, and in cheating justice? Yet, whenever and wherever the drama of Punch and Judy is enacted, the humour of the murderer is thoroughly enjoyed, and great is the ecstasy when the wrong man is hanged. Or, to take another instance. In the favourite play of the 'Winter's Tale,' a clever clown in a most barefaced manner robs a benevolent country bumpkin, to the intense gratification of boxes, pit, and gallery. Now, our object in these remarks is to excuse ourselves to our readers, if, in dealing with Mr. JOHN BRIGHT, we should manifest any levity. We are utterly disgusted with his coldblooded and shameless hypocrisy; yet there is so much humour in the situation of the member for Birmingham that it is almost as hard to treat his pranks seriously as it would be those of a pantaloon. Mr. BRIGHT, in a most obliging manner, is perpetually unmasking himself, and there is this much to be said in his favour, that if any one foolishly supposes him to be an honest reformer, a true friend of popular liberty, and a hater of bloodshed, such a blunder is not the fault of Mr. BRIGHT. He has done his best to exhibit himself in his true colours. We do not know whether Mr. BRIGHT is in himself a merry man, but certainly he is the cause of merriment in others. His profession and his practice are in comic antagonism. Does any one suppose that Mr. BRIGHT, forgetting all else than his great mission to destroy the bloated aristocracy of England, has paid no heed to his personal interests? Such a one is wrong. Mr. BRIGHT has combined carpet-weaving with politics, and though an inconsistent politician, he has always been a consistent political economist so far as his private interests are concerned. He has bought the people's labour at the lowest market price. Does any one suppose that Mr. BRIGHT, who hates everything aristocratic, who denounces the game laws, who talks so loudly about the way in which the Saxon serfs are oppressed by the Norman lords, devotes the recess to condoling with his unhappy clients? Not at all. Mr. BRIGHT goes to Scotland, and, like a bloated aristocrat, passes his time in sporting over well-preserved moors. There never was a completer sham than is Mr. BRIGHT, and it would require the humour of Mr. THACKERAY and the nervous style of Mr. CARLYLE, in combination, to pen a graphic sketch of one who is always proclaiming to the world what a thorough-paced hypocrite he is.

About Mr. BRIGHT'S early career we know little or nothing, but we believe that he succeeded to a profitable business established by his father. About the time of the Corn Law agitation Mr. BRIGHT was thrown upon the surface, and being a man of considerable eloquence soon acquired a reputation that brought him a seat in the House of Commons. Now Mr. BRIGHT has throughout his political life, in a most violent and uncompromising manner, advocated Free Trade, the perfect liberty of the subject, and he has also most solemnly and emphatically protested against war. In 1859 he marched from place to place, and tried, though happily in vain, to set class against class, and to pour contempt upon the institutions of his country. His staple argument was the United States. It was to that land he pointed as affording the most marked contrast to the miserable and debased condition of England. He used to tell his audiences that in America there was not an enormous national debt to crush the energies of the labouring man—that the wages earned were not seized upon by the tax-collector—that there industrial communities were not cursed with great military and naval establishments—in short, he held up the United States as an example for this poor England to follow in respect to freedom of trade, political freedom, and freedom from the burdens of war. And in 1859, though every one found fault with Mr. BRIGHT'S recklessness of assertion, it was by every one supposed—certainly we were under that impression—that the man was honest. The American war shows that Mr. BRIGHT was a mere hypocrite.

It must, we think, have struck everybody as curious that Mr. BRIGHT should not at least have protested against those departures of the Northern Government from the principles he professed. We don't mean that Mr. BRIGHT should have sided with the South. Such a man could not by any possibility have a sentiment in common with a nation of patriots giving their blood and their treasure rather than resign their best-loved heritage of freedom. Moreover, it was inevitable that Mr. BRIGHT should sympathise with such a Government as that of which Mr. LINCOLN is the titular head. But whilst hating the South with perhaps even more ferocity than he hates the institutions of England, and whilst loving the North with a love that smacks of arrant toadyism, it was to be supposed that this Freetrader would have denounced the MORRILL tariff, that this lover of popular liberty would have denounced Mr. LINCOLN'S acts of tyranny, and that this man who hates bloodshed so much would have deplored vehemently the horrors of the war and its prolongation. Mr. BRIGHT has done nothing of the sort; he has swallowed the leek of Northern Protection without wincing; he designates Mr. LINCOLN'S despotism as patriotism; and he has no more protested against bloodshed than have Parsons BROWNLOW and BEECHER. We quite understand Mr. BRIGHT'S reticence. It requires moral courage to recognise the virtues of an enemy and to see the faults of a friend; and though Mr. BRIGHT is not afraid to bully the aristocracy, well knowing that he can do so with impunity, he is totally without moral courage. And he is not without excuse. He knows that his sun is set. Not only has an eminent statesman declared that Mr. BRIGHT shall never be a member of an English Government, but the people are not deceived by Mr. BRIGHT'S loud professions, and his popularity has long been a thing of the past.

At length Mr. BRIGHT has ceased to be reticent. His letter to Mr. GREELEY, dated October 1, 1864, is altogether a remarkable document. Its sole object is to support Mr. LINCOLN. Mr. BRIGHT says, with STANTON-like audacity, that the friends of the Confederacy are in favour of General M'CLELLAN—an assertion that he must know to be utterly unfounded. Friends of the South are not the kind of people to associate with Mr. BRIGHT, and therefore he could not learn the Southern view of the Presidential election from private sources. But what say the organs of public opinion? The Confederate newspapers have preferred LINCOLN to M'CLELLAN. We, and the rest of the English press, with the exception of the half-dozen journals that are the organs of Mr. LINCOLN, have been perfectly indifferent as to the result of the election. We think M'CLELLAN an abler man than LINCOLN, and as peace is so desirable, and it is said that M'CLELLAN will carry on the war, we would rather have a foolish jester than a clever soldier for an enemy. We here express the sentiments of the South and of the friends of the South. It is, we repeat, utterly, palpably false to say, as Mr. BRIGHT does, that the friends of the South have preferred M'CLELLAN to LINCOLN.

Mr. BRIGHT does not censure Mr. LINCOLN'S illegal acts, but, on the contrary, praises Mr LINCOLN for unfaltering patriotism. Mr. BRIGHT has been a Freetrader, and he supports a MORRILL tariff; he has been a preacher of popular rights, and he supports Mr. LINCOLN'S despotism; he has been an advocate of peace at any price, and by an electioneering manifesto he tries to continue a cruel and desolating war. Even Mr. BRIGHT'S organ, even his own devoted Star, is alarmed. In an article in which logic is expelled by the force of affrighted anger it is pretended that in his letter to Mr. GREELEY Mr. BRIGHT does not recommend the prosecution of the war. This is how the case stands:—

1st. Mr. BRIGHT believes Mr. LINCOLN to be a man of honour and patriotism, and that his reelection will be an assurance that 'the integrity of your great country will be preserved.'

2nd. Mr. LINCOLN is pledged to carry on the war if reelected.

Therefore, says the Star, as Mr. LINCOLN is not a liar, and as he is pledged to carry on the war if re-elected, it follows that in advocating the reelection of Mr. LINCOLN, Mr. BRIGHT did not advocate the continuance of the war!

Mr. BRIGHT cannot get out of it. Not all the lying in the world can obliterate the brand of bloodthirstiness. Mr. LINCOLN is preeminently the war candidate, and, at a critical moment, Mr. BRIGHT urges the reelection of Mr. LINCOLN. Is not this to advocate the prosecution of the war? No doubt Mr. BRIGHT'S power is small, but he has done what he could in behalf of continued bloodshed. And we know why Mr. BRIGHT came out so strongly on a war platform. On October 1, it was supposed that M'CLELLAN would come out on a peace platform. This excited the wrath of Mr. BRIGHT, and therefore he did what he could to secure the reelection of a President who he thinks will carry on the war. When Mr. BRIGHT was elected for Birmingham, it was remarked that the gunsmiths ought to vote for him, because, though he talked peace, he really promoted strife. At the next election, if the gunsmiths are grateful, they will vote for him because at a critical moment he boldly wrote in favour of war. The Birmingham manufacturers will of course be wise enough not to take Federal greenbacks even on the recommendation of Mr. JOHN BRIGHT.

There is a vulgar story that when the sheriffs appoint a hangman, they spit upon their new officer and kick him out of their presence. This is not so; but it is true that the office of Jack Ketch is a very loathsome one, and that men in power are often obliged to use tools whom they despise. Mr. LINCOLN is not very sensitive, but we are sure that even he must feel the utmost contempt for many in the crowd who supplicate his favour, for those who to serve his purposes are willing to sacrifice every vestige of self-respect. We are certain, then, that whilst Mr. LINCOLN must enjoy the spectacle of Mr. BRIGHT's abasement—whilst he laughs at the Freetrader turned Protectionist, at the demagogue defending despotism, at the apostle of peace making an effort to prevent the conclusion of a desolating war—he cannot but regard Mr. BRIGHT as the meanest tool in his employ. When the history of this great conflict is written, so many striking events will have to be recorded, that it is hardly to be expected that a line will be devoted to rescuing the name of JOHN BRIGHT from oblivion; yet the nineteenth century has not produced a more flagrant instance of hypocrisy, and of solemnly avowed principles audaciously abjured for the sake of partisanship.

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

THE latest advices from the United States represent the situation of military affairs in front of Richmond as materially unchanged. On October 13 Grant pushed forward a force to attack the Confederate lines, between the Darbytown and Charles City roads, on the north side of James River, below the city. Several attempts were made, beginning at 7 o'clock in the morning, the most vigorous at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, to drive the Confederates from their position; but all without success. General Lee reports that after this last effort they withdrew, 'leaving many dead.' Federal papers admit a loss of 400. General Lee says, 'Our loss slight.' Subsequent to this repulse, according to a rumour which was prevalent in Washington and credited in New York, Grant removed Generals Meade and Warren from their respective commands because of their unwillingness to assault the impregnable earthworks of the Confederates, and Secretaries Seward, Stanton, and Fessenden made a journey from the seat of government to Grant's head-quarters to urge upon him the vital importance of his achieving some decisive military success without further delay, and gave him plenary authority to concentrate troops from any and every quarter for the successful accomplishment of this object. This mission of the secretaries was undertaken, not in the general interests of the country, but in the special behalf of Mr. Lincoln. It was a political, and not a military, necessity that another grand demonstration should be attempted before the Presidential election, and the slaughter that has probably since occurred, and of which the next steamer may bring us an account, is to be set down to the electioneering wants of the President. He is in sad need of a victory before Richmond to affect his chances at the polls. The Confederate army, though probably inferior in numbers to the army of Grant, was in excellent condition, and there was no reason whatever to apprehend that the advance of the enemy would result otherwise than all the previous efforts of the Federal commander, in disastrous failure.

A VERY heavy battle was fought on the morning of October 19, near Strasbourg, between the armies of General Longstreet (Confederate) and General Sheridan (Federal), in which it was claimed by the Federal journals that Longstreet was repulsed with a loss of 1,600 prisoners, and 50 pieces of artillery. The fighting was begun at an early hour, before daylight, by General Longstreet, who surprised the enemy on the north bank of Cedar Creek, and drove them in great confusion from their intrenchments, capturing 24 guns and many prisoners, and pursuing the flying and disordered columns to Middletown, a distance of four miles. General Sheridan opportunely arrived from Winchester just at this crisis, rallied and reformed his command, and after an obstinate contest, forced back the Confederates beyond the lost ground, and reoccupied Strasbourg, with the losses we have stated above. Such is substantially the account, as it comes to us through Federal sources of intelligence, on which a great victory is reported for Sheridan. The correspondent of the New York Herald estimates the loss of the Yankee army at 5,000 men. It is not set forth in the telegrams that the prisoners taken by Longstreet in the early morning were recaptured, and it may be fairly assumed that they were equal to, if they did not exceed the number (1,600) declared to have been taken by Sheridan. The fifty guns comprised the twenty-four lost during the day. On the Federal side General Bidewell was killed, and Generals Wright, Grover, and Ricketts wounded. On the Confederate side we hear only of the death of General Ramseur. During the night after the engagement General Longstreet retreated towards Woodstock. This is conclusive of an inability on the part of the Confederate general to maintain the advantage he had gained, but when we consider the vaunting proclivities of the Yankee press, and the urgent need of a Federal victory on the eve of the Presidential election, it is safe to withhold full credence from the account until we can hear from the Confederates. It may turn out to have been a very dear and barren victory after all.

GENERAL PRICE, at the head of a large and constantly increasing force, had successively occupied Sedalia, Danville, Lexington and Glasgow in Missouri, and was recruiting at the latter place when last heard from. The people of the State were flocking to his standard, and his movements were watched with great concern by the authorities at Washington. Rosecrans was reported as marching from the east to give him battle, and a Federal force had been concentrated at Kansas city to attack him from the West. The telegram received at New York on October 22 states that Curtis had engaged the advance of Price's army, with what results was not given. There can be no doubt that very important events are on the wing in Missouri, and the great West may yet become the theatre of war upon a grander scale than in 1861-62.

THE Federal accounts about Sherman are obscure and conflicting, but it is evident that the Federal army in Georgia is altogether on the defensive, and that it will have some difficulty in maintaining its position at Atlanta. Sherman has been accumulating stores of provisions at Atlanta, and it is said he has rations for 100 days. Other accounts say that his rations will not hold out 50 days.

ON October 15, an interview took place at the White House in Washington, between President Lincoln and a number of citizens of Tennessee, styling themselves 'Loyal Tennesseans,' a report of which, under the signatures of these gentlemen, is published in the journals of the United States. The purpose of the 'Loyal Tennesseans' in seeking the interview was to protest against the proclamation of Andrew Johnson, Military Governor of Tennessee, imposing a test oath to be taken by all persons who should be permitted to vote in the election of President and Vice-President of the United States. Their protest was embodied in a well-considered and strongly drawn paper, which they read in the hearing of the President, who, upon its conclusion, asked with characteristic pleasantry, 'May I inquire how long it took you and the New York politicians to concoct that paper?' The 'Loyal Tennesseans' made reply that the paper had been 'concocted' at Nashville without consultation with any but citizens of Tennessee. Whereupon arose that grim, jocose, angular, long-limbed occupant of the Executive Mansion, and said to the 'Loyal Tennesseans' 'emphatically,' 'I expect to let the friends of George B. McClellan manage their side of this contest in their own way, and I will manage my side of it in my way.' In other words, Lincoln declined to interfere with the arbitrary proceedings of his lieutenant in Tennessee, and intimated clearly enough that he intended to use all the power of which he was possessed to secure his reelection. The opposition journals of New York are making good use of this most impolitic answer, and it is clear that the President made a grave blunder. He should have entertained the 'Loyal Tennesseans' with a little joke, and reserved his reply to their protest until he could communicate with his constitutional advisers. They were fairly entitled to the customary civilities and jocularities of the White House, and Mr. Seward in half-an-hour could have written a smooth, easy, inoffensive, meaningless response which would have extricated his master from all embarrassment and yet given no annoyance to Andy Johnson. We shall see how Lincoln will manage his side of the contest in his way.

JUDGE JOSEPH HOLT makes an official report to President Lincoln as to the existence of a dangerous armed conspiracy in the North-west, having for its object the overthrow of the Federal authority and the establishment of a separate Western Confederacy. He asserts that there are 500,000 men belonging to the confraternity of the O.A.K., who are armed with revolvers, and in league with the 'rebels' of the South. Judge Holt's statistics of Western disloyalty are, indeed, somewhat portentous. If there were 500,000 men in the West with weapons in their hands, and disaffected towards the Federal Government, that Government would probably not stand before them more than twenty-four hours after their organisation had been effected; and supposing this vast number of men 'capable of bearing arms' to be within reach of Lincoln's conscript officers, it seems a little remarkable that he has not recruited his army with them. If Judge Holt's report is not a mere raw-head-and-bloody-bones story, it can have but one meaning. It is intended to prepare the public mind for some acts of arbitrary power on the part of Lincoln, and to excuse the exercise of despotic rule in the West for the purpose of overawing the West in the coming election. Only that and nothing more. The O.A.K. may look out for political arrests by the thousand. The moral to be drawn from this extraordinary report is simple enough. There does exist in the North-west a very natural hostility towards Lincoln, and a growing repugnance to continued political association with the Rump of a Republic having its seat of Government at Washington. That the great West will sooner or later cut loose from the Union is morally certain, and nothing that Lincoln may do can postpone, though his vulgar despotism and unscrupulous acts may hasten, the day when the blow for Western freedom and Western nationality shall be struck once and for all.

VICE-PRESIDENT STEPHENS has written a letter upon the subject of State rights and a convention of States. If any one was weak enough to believe the assurances of Federal authorities that Mr. Stephens was willing to negotiate a separate peace for Georgia, and in the Yankee phrase to let the Confederacy slide, this letter will correct any such ridiculous error. Mr. Stephens says the Chicago platform is the first symptom of peace that he has seen, and that he agrees with much that was said at the Chicago convention. He has no objection to a convention of States, but he does not advise that the South should abide by the decision of such a convention, but that the decision of the delegates should be submitted to the sovereign States for ratification or rejection. He also observes that for such a convention of States it would be necessary to obtain the assent of the properly-constituted authorities at Richmond and Washington. In short, Mr. Stephens says that provided the North will recognise the independence of the Southern Confederacy there is no objection to a convention of the sovereign States of both Confederacies for the purpose of discussing the conditions of a permanent peace.

ACCORDING to the telegraphic summary of news, per Jura, the Federal steamer, the Roanoke, upon her voyage from Havana to New York, was captured by a party of Confederates under Lieutenant Brain on the high seas. It appears that the vessel was taken into St. George's, Bermuda, where the passengers were landed. The vessel was then taken out to sea and burnt. The crew returned to the British port in open boats, and thereupon Lieutenant Brain was arrested by the British authorities. Why he was arrested we know not. It may be alleged that Lieutenant Brain had no right to take the Roanoke into a British port; but having done so, and subsequently been permitted to depart, we are at a loss to understand why he was arrested. We must, however, wait for details before we can judge whether the British authorities were justified in such a proceeding, or whether it was one of those acts of warm neutrality which savour of Federal partisanship.

THERE is another case mentioned in the mail, in which the British authorities have lawfully or unlawfully been aiding the Federals; and in this case we must also wait for details before we can form a reliable judgment. A party of 25 Confederates attacked the bank at St. Alban's, Vermont, took some valuables, killed two citizens, and departed for Canada. It is said that the Canadian authorities assisted in arresting most of the Confederates. Now it is clearly no greater offence to plunder a Federal bank than it is to burn 2,000 Confederate barns: but if the expedition was fitted out from Canada, the interference of the British authorities is justifiable. The mere fact of their proceeding to Canada would no more justify their arrest by the British authorities than it would be justifiable to arrest General Sheridan for his devastation in the Shenandoah Valley if he visits Canada. Probably the Canadian authorities will plead that the expedition started from Canada, and we may be sure that the authorities will not permit any infraction of international law on the part of the Confederates to go unpunished.

MR. LINCOLN has arrested a number of merchants in Washington and Baltimore, and closed their stores. It is said that their offence was contraband trading, but such an offence does not call for a military coup d'état. We expect that all the persons arrested are Democrats, and that will sufficiently account for the proceeding.

ON October 22, gold was quoted at New York at 112⅝ premium.

ENGLAND.

ON Thursday morning last, Franz Müller was placed at the bar of the Central Criminal Court, charged with the murder of Mr. Thomas Briggs in a railway carriage on the North London Railway, on Saturday the 9th of July last. The prisoner, on being arraigned, pleaded 'Not Guilty.' The Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer and Mr. Baron Martin presided. The Solicitor-General, Mr. Serjeant Ballantine, Mr. Hannen, Mr. Giffard, and Mr. Beasley were for the Crown; Mr. Serjeant Parry, Mr. Metcalfe, and Mr. Besley appeared for the prisoner. The prisoner, through his counsel, elected to be tried by an English jury. Jurymen were called from the five different panels of the five counties which enjoy the right of sending prisoners for trial to the Old Bailey. The Crown and the prisoner challenged freely, tailors and bootmakers being rejected by the Crown, publicans and butchers by the prisoner. The Solicitor-General opened the case, giving a clear narrative of the events of the murder, and detailing the evidence to be produced on the part of the Crown. The speech was, of course, perfectly calm and temperate throughout. The first Crown witness was Mr. David Buchan, of Nelson Square, Peckham, who deposed that Mr. Briggs was sixty-nine years of age, that on July 9 Mr. Briggs dined with the witness, that when leaving he had with him a black bag and stick, that he got into an omnibus in the Old Kent Road in order to go to King William Street. That night Mr. Briggs had his watch on, and more than once referred to it to ascertain the time. Mrs. Buchan gave similar evidence. Thomas Fishbourne, ticket-collector at Fenchurch Street station, deposed that Mr. Briggs presented his day-ticket to the witness for the 9.45 P.M. train on July 9. Harry Verney and Sidney

Jones, both clerks in the banking-house of Messrs. Robarts & Co., deposed that on July 9 they got into a first-class railway-carriage at Hackney Wick; that, on finding blood on the seat, they called for a light; that in the carriage were found a hat, a black bag, and a stick. Benjamin Aimes, the guard who brought the light, said that there was blood on the seat of the carriage and on the quarter light. He also said that the train left Fenchurch Street at 9.50, Bow at 10.1, and Hackney Wick at 10.5 P.M. The train was from three to three minutes and a half going from Bow to Hackney Wick. W. Timms, a guard on the North London Railway, deposed that he was with the up-train to Fenchurch Street which left the Victoria Park station at 10.5 P.M. As the train passed over the canal-bridge between Victoria Park and Bow, he saw something lying on the six-foot way. The train was stopped, and the guard, on going back, found the body of a gentleman lying with the head towards Hackney. The engine-driver gave similar evidence, as did also a police-constable who was on duty near the spot, and heard a shout for assistance. Evidence was also given of the carriage above mentioned arriving at Chalk Farm, and of the hat, bag, and walking-stick being taken by the station-master and handed over to Lewis Lambert, a police constable, who gave them to Inspector Kerresey, who now produced those articles. The same witness also produced a gold chain hook which he had taken from the buttonhole of Mr. Briggs's waistcoat, a small jump-ring received from Sergeant Prescott, and a gold chain with a seal and two keys received from Mr. Death. The medical evidence of three surgeons went to show that the left ear of Mr. Briggs was severed about an inch, that anterior to the ear was a deep wound extending to the bone, over the temporal muscle was a contused wound, superficial and grazed. There were several incised wounds on the scalp, and a wound on the crown of the head. The skull was extensively fractured. In the centre a piece of bone, triangular in form, was separated from the skull and fell out on the removal of the scalp; all the wounds were inflicted by a blunt instrument. Mr. Briggs died on the Sunday, at three o'clock in the afternoon. Mr. John Death, jeweller, in Cheapside, recognised the prisoner as having come to his shop on July 11, at 10 A.M. The prisoner produced a chain for which Mr. Death offered 3*l.* 10*s.* The prisoner took in exchange a chain worth 3*l.* 5*s.* and a ring valued at 5*s.* The chain was put in a box. The box produced was the same one. Mr. Death communicated with the police on the same day. Mrs. Blyth, of Park Terrace, Old Ford Road, said that the prisoner lodged with her for about seven weeks previous to July 14. She saw the prisoner at 11 o'clock in the morning on July 9. She went to bed that night about 11 P.M., and did not know at what hour the prisoner returned; but he breakfasted with her at 9 A.M. on the Sunday morning, and stopped at home all day. In the evening she, her husband, and the prisoner walked out. Müller did not leave them, but returned home and went to bed. The prisoner breakfasted with her on the Monday morning, and went out at 8 A.M. He returned in the evening of that day, and exhibited to them the gold chain obtained at Mr. Death's. He finally left on the Thursday. The witness identified the hat-box with the name of Walker on it as the box brought by the prisoner to her house. The coat produced was the one worn by him on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday. He wore the same trousers on Saturday and Sunday, but the witness was not sure whether he wore the same on Monday. He wore a slipper—the one produced—as he had hurt his left foot on the Thursday, July 7. She knew of his intention to go to America a fortnight before he left. He mentioned the ship Victoria as the one in which he was to sail. After his departure she received a letter, of which the following is a copy:—

On the sea, July 16, in the morning.

Dear Friends,—I am glad to confess that I cannot have a better chance as I have, for the sun shines nice and the wind blows fair. As it is at the present moment, everything will go well. I cannot write any more. Only I have had no postage stamps; you will be so kind to take that letter in.

The post-mark was Worthing, July 16, 1864.

Mrs. Elizabeth Repsch, of 12½ Jewry Street, Aldgate, said that the prisoner frequented her house. He had a watch and chain, but it was in pawn on July 9. On that day he was at her house. When he left he took away two boots and one slipper. When he came to her on July 11, he wore a pair of light trousers, having left on Saturday in a dark pair. He showed her a chain (Mr. Death's) on the Monday, which he said he had bought in the docks that morning for 3*l.* 15*s.* He also had a plain gold ring with a white stone and a head engraved, for which he said he had paid 7*s.* 6*d.* when he bought the chain. He had a new hat on that morning, and in answer to the question of witness's husband he said that he gave 14*s.* 6*d.* for it. Her husband said that it looked more like a guinea hat. The hat he had previously worn was a plain black beaver hat, with merino-lined brim and striped lining, broad brown stripes, and broad blue stripe edged with black and white. The hat produced (the one found in the railway carriage) was the same hat to the best of her belief. He had told her that Matthews, the cabman, had given him the hat. She identified the two pairs of trousers found in Müller's possession on his arrest, one as his working pair, the other as the light pair worn by him on July 11. Neither pair was the one worn by Müller on July 9. That pair she had not seen since. After evidence of the manner in which Müller had redeemed his own watch and chain on the 12th and 13th of July and pawned both again on the latter day, the cabman, Jonathan Matthews, was put in the box. This witness said that he had known Müller for more than two years. About the beginning of last December Müller had admired the hat of the witness, and Matthews, at his request, obtained a similar hat for the prisoner at Walker's, Crawford Street, Marylebone. The hat had a striped lining, it came in a box, and Müller took away the box with the hat. In return for the hat Müller made a waistcoat for the witness. He had seen Müller wearing the hat frequently, and the last time about a fortnight before the 9th July. The hat produced was the same hat. He knew it by the crease, for he had ordered the hat to be turned up a little extra at the shop. He remembered seeing a small box in his house with the name of Death on it. The prisoner had given the box on the 12th July to the witness's daughter. The witness, in cross-examination, said that he had never before mentioned the fact about the brim being turned up at the shop. Before the coroner he had identified the hat by its being turned up on one side more than on the other, as he supposed, from its being continually lifted from the head by that part. Witness could not say how many hats he had used in eight months previous to July 9. He admitted that his account of his hats given before the coroner was erroneous, and that though he had said he had bought a hat at Down's, in Long Acre, three weeks before the job, yet that was a mistake, for there was no such shop existing at the time. He could not swear to his own hats. He first heard of the murder on Friday night, July 15. He took in Lloyd's weekly newspaper, and sometimes bought a daily paper, he occasionally went to a public house for refreshment, he went to the cabstands and passed the police offices, he was out with his cab all day and every day, and yet he never heard of the murder till July 15. He first gave information on Monday, July 18; he had bid Muller good-bye on the 14th. He now found that on the night of July 9 he was out with his cab, though before the coroner he could not account for his proceedings on that night. He now said that his master 'sold off,' though before the coroner he had said that his master was 'sold up.' He had been a licensed cabman about eight or nine years. Twenty-two years ago he had been in a training stable. He had been in a small fly business, and a driver for the General Omnibus Company. He owed money, and was unable to pay. He denied that he had promised to pay his creditors as soon as he got the reward. As to that matter, he left it to his country whether it would think he had done his duty. He had been in prison. He had been tried before a jury at Norwich in 1850 for stealing things belonging to his master, and had twenty-one days' imprisonment. The witness then detailed the reading by him of the placard offering the reward, and his communications with the police. He had discovered that on July 9 he was at Paddington Station with his cab from 7 P.M to 11 P.M. Mrs. Matthews, the wife of the last witness, gave similar evidence as to the box and the hat. She heard of the murder on Monday, July 11, but did not speak to her husband on the subject. Edward Watson, a workman at Mr. Walker's, said that the hat produced (the one found in the railway carriage) was manufactured by Mr. Walker; it had a peculiar lining; he did not think that Mr. Walker ever had more than three or four of that particular lining in the establishment. Mr. Walker, the hatter in Marylebone, said that he had sold the hat produced; the lining was peculiar, and he did not think that he had had more than two hats of that lining. James Clifford, the agent of Messrs. Grinnell at the London Docks, said that Müller paid his passage, 4*l.*, on July 15; the prisoner gave his name as Franz Müller and his age as twenty-four years. George Clarke, sergeant of the detective police, detailed the arrest of Müller on board the Victoria in New York Harbour. In answer to the charge of having murdered Mr. Briggs on the North London Railway on July 9, the prisoner said, 'I never was on that line.' He took a key from the prisoner and unlocked the prisoner's box. In it he found a watch sewed up in a piece of leather, and a hat. Müller said he had had the watch two years, and the hat about twelve months. Inspector Tanner spoke to the identification of Müller by Mr. Death on board the Victoria, and also stated that Müller complained that a gold ring with a white stone in it had been stolen from him on board. The prisoner did not say that he had bought the watch and chain at the Docks. That was suggested in court at New York. Mr. Thomas James Briggs, son of the deceased, identified the watch found in Müller's box and the chain produced by Mr. Death as the property of his father. He also identified the bag and stick. He did not at first recognise the hat as his father's. It was much shorter. Samuel Tidmarsh recognised the watch as belonging to the late Mr. Briggs. He had repaired it in February 1863, and had recorded the number. Mr. Digance, hatter, at 18 Royal Exchange, had made hats for Mr. Briggs for twenty-five years. He made him a bell-crowned hat in September 1863. The hat produced was lower in the crown. Mr. Briggs's hat was too loose, and some tissue paper had been put in; a few fragments were adhering to the hat produced. The hat had been cut down an inch and a half; the piece had been cut off and sewed together again. It had been neatly sewed, as by a person who understood sewing, but a hatter would have used gum and put the hat on a block and pressed it with a hot iron. The part of the hat cut away would have contained the name of the owner. F. W. Thorne, a workman for Mr. Digance, gave similar evidence. Mr. Serjeant Parry then addressed the jury for the defence. His speech was a calm dispassionate discussion of the points at issue, and was entirely free from vehemence. He commented at length on the inaccuracies and contradictions of the evidence of Matthews, and on the inability of that witness to produce his own hat corresponding to the one sworn to as Müller's. The identification of Mr. Briggs's hat was incomplete, and it would be proved that hats in the second-hand trade were cut down as the hat produced had been. He held that Müller's deception about the watch and chain was the natural result of the suspicious circumstances under which he bought them. He also argued strongly on the physical impossibility of Müller committing a murder on a man of the strength and weight of Mr. Briggs under the circumstances shown. He then detailed to the jury the nature of the evidence for the defence. The first witness, Thomas Lee, said that he knew Mr. Briggs. He saw him at Bow station on the 9th of July, about 10 o'clock. He was seated in a first-class carriage. There were two other persons in the compartment, one of whom sat opposite to Mr. Briggs and the other by his side. The former was a stoutish, thickset man with light whiskers; the latter appeared to be a tall thin man, and dark. He did not think that the prisoner was one of the men. There was a light in the carriage. He said 'Good night, Mr. Briggs,' and Mr. Briggs answered 'Good night, Tom.' He himself got into a second-class carriage nearer the engine. The witness did not communicate with the police. He did not wish to be brought up. He did not think there was any need of his evidence. He should not have informed the police at all, because he thought it unimportant, and knew how much bother it was. He had never known or heard of Müller before. Mr. Briggs generally slept in the train. George Wire, a hatter, said that he should have stuck the hat with shellac as well as stitching it, but some workmen might omit to gum the hat from hurry. William Lee, a hatter, said that he should not cut down a hat in the same manner; but it was cheaper in the second-hand trade to stitch hats than to use varnish. Alfred Woodward, clerk in the Electric and International Telegraph Company, proved the date of a certain message to be the 9th of July last. The message was to Miss Eldred, Stanley Cottage, James Street, Vassall Road, Camberwell. Mrs. Jones of Stanley Cottage said that a young woman, Mary Ann Eldred, lodged with her. Witness knew the prisoner because he visited Miss Eldred. Müller came to her house about 9.30 P.M. on July 9. She knew the day by the date of the telegram, which arrived on the same afternoon, and she knew the hour because Eldred asked her the time when the latter left the house. It was then 9 P.M., and Müller came about half an hour afterwards. Her house was not quite three-quarters of a mile from where the Camberwell omnibuses start. Müller had a slipper on one foot when he called. Mary Ann Eldred gave evidence as to the receipt of the telegram, and as to her going out about nine o'clock, but she had no means of fixing the time except her usual habit of going out at that hour. On the Sunday morning Mrs. Jones told her that Müller had called. Charles Forman, an omnibus conductor between Peckham Rye and Gracechurch Street, said his last journey in the day was from Camberwell Gate at 9.55 P.M. to Gracechurch Street at 10.20 P.M. He remembered a gentleman riding in his omnibus on his last journey from Camberwell, who appeared to be lame and wore a slipper. He noticed the man, because the latter leaned on his arm in descending from the omnibus, and witness remembered saying, 'Ah, he's got a touch of my old complaint; he's got the gout.' Witness did not know whether this was in July or August. The Solicitor-General then replied, and the Lord Chief Baron summed up the case. The Jury retired for fifteen minutes, and came into court with a verdict of 'Guilty.' Mr. Baron Martin passed sentence, and in the course of his speech said that 'he felt in his own mind as satisfied of the prisoner's guilt, as he could of any other matter which he had not seen with his own eyes.' After judgment, Müller said, 'I am perfectly satisfied with my judges and the jury, but I have been convicted on false evidence and not on a true statement. If the sentence is carried out, I shall die innocent.'

HIS Grace the Duke of Newcastle was buried at Markham Clinton, Notts, on Thursday last. The tenantry assembled in Clumber Park at nine A.M. The funeral procession was headed by 500 tenants on horseback, all wearing mourning, led by the Forester. The Earl of Lincoln and Lords Arthur and Albert Pelham-Clinton were the chief mourners. Lord Foley, Lord de Tabley, Lord Harris, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the executor of the Duke, followed the body.

THE Right Hon. the Marquis of Bristol died at Ickworth Park, Bury St. Edmunds, on Sunday last. His Lordship was born July 15, 1800. As Earl Jermyn he represented Bury St. Edmunds in the House of Commons from 1830 till his accession to the peerage in 1859. In early life he was in the ranks of the Tory party, but he afterwards joined the Peelites, and held under Sir Robert the office of Treasurer of the Queen's Household. Subsequently he supported the Earl of Aberdeen and Lord Palmerston. His Lordship bore the titles of Marquis and Earl of Bristol, Earl Jermyn of Herninghurst, and Baron Hervey of Ickworth. His father was the first Marquis, and his mother was the Hon. Charlotte Upton, second daughter of the first Lord Templetown. He married Lady Catherine Manners, fourth daughter of the late Duke of Rutland.

THE Bishop of Oxford, at a meeting held at Hastings on behalf of the Additional Curates' Aid Society, made the following important comment on the present condition of the English clergy:—

Instead of being, as is often said, an exceedingly rich Church, our Church, if the income be divided among teachers, is an exceedingly poor Church. If divided head by head among the existing clergy, it would come to a maximum of 200*l.* a year to each. And do you think that you can go on paying only 200*l.* to each and get, under the present state of things, a true set of men to be the champions of religious thought in this country? Look how every other profession is paying its members. In withholding the support needed you depress the class from which you gather your clergymen to the class who look upon 200*l.* a year as a prize instead of the class who look upon it as starvation. This is what has been practically done in France. There is not one in a thousand educated for the ministry of the Church of France who does not come from the low peasant class of the community. The gentry never educate their sons for it, and the high and noble, except here and there one whose soul is devoted to it, never dream of educating their children for the cause, and what is the result? The French clergy become in manners and habits an association below the middle class. You can easily see the effect of that. It altogether deprives a body of clergy of that which has been one of the blessed marks of the English clergyman, that they are thorough citizens of their nation as well as teachers of the people. It makes them the slaves of those who for the time being administer the laws, and it keeps them literally from enlightening and enlarging pursuits; the consequence is, the ministry becomes gradually depressed, so that it has not its due influence upon the mind and intellect of the nation it ought to teach. Sydney Smith said: 'The principle in removing the heap o dirt has been the lottery principle. The Church of England is paid upon the lottery principle, and we can always get work done cheaper upon that principle. If I had a heap of dirt outside my door and wanted to move it, and found that it would take about 50*l.* to do so, I could do it in a cheaper way by burying ten sovereigns in different parts of it, and saying to the men, "You may carry it away, and every man who finds money may keep it." I should have a hundred labourers, with their barrows, wheeling away as well as they could, because every one would think of getting hold of the 10*l.* And what young curate's mother in all England, who, on hearing her son preach his first sermon, is not confident that he will be Archbishop of Canterbury?' The heap of dirt is being carried away by the young curates, and the 10*l.* is not buried beneath the surface. But if you take it away, and you have taken it away, unless you add something to the endowments and the wealth of the Church, you will be letting the Church sink into that lower position, and not that only, but as your population multiplies in the degree in which it is now multiplying on every side, the members holding the endowments will not find the necessary number of clergy to do the work.

MR. JOHN LEECH died on Saturday, October 29, at 7 o'clock in the evening. Mr. Leech was born in London in 1817. He was educated at the Charter House, and afterwards studied medicine. In 1841, however, he finally relinquished all labour in that profession, and gave himself up to the toil which has made his name familiar and himself beloved by the nation. Though the annual almanack looked to him as the great merrymaker of Christmas time, yet it was in Punch that he may be said to have 'lived, and moved, and had his being.' It is difficult to pen a just eulogy of efforts whose excellence has been demonstrated by an unwearied course of popular admiration. To say that Mr. Leech was a consummate artist—that he produced men and things, living forms, and natural pictures, with an equal and amazing fidelity—is only to endorse the opinion of those whose word is law. Yet there are features in his drawings on which comment may be made without pretension of critical acumen. Lord Macaulay justly considered that it was not beneath the dignity of the most stately of historians to record how our ancestors dressed, in what houses they lived, what they ate and drank, and in what to them consisted the pleasures and the duties of life. Hogarth has achieved immortality because his canvas has performed a similar office, and Mr. John Leech is beyond doubt the most faithful witness of the England and the Englishmen of this century. It is not a new remark, but it is one to be recollected, that, whereas a comic newspaper on the other side of the Channel imagines that situations arising from breaches of morality can alone produce a grotesque or humorous picture, the works of Mr. Leech have been eminently pure. Just as Mr. Charles Dickens and the late Mr. Thackeray have redeemed the pages of the novelist from the stain of impurity, and have excited interest without exciting passion, so Mr. Leech has banished from the canvas of the satirist all grossness. Therefore, his pencil has earned for him not admiration only but affection, and on this account, apart from the loss of pleasure which his weekly supply of delicate humour and of artistic workmanship afforded, the death of Mr. Leech is a misfortune in a social, or we may even say in a national, point of view. His early death is to be attributed in part to that curse of London, the street organs. His organisation was peculiarly sensitive, and the character of his toil increased the fault of nature. A retreat from Brunswick Square to Kensington, a flight to the continent, were the remedies employed, but even these did not suffice. Indeed, the earnestness with which he protested the cause of suffering sufficiently proved that his complaints were not fanciful. When Mr. Bass proposed the bill relating to street music, he had among other proofs a letter addressed to him by Mr. Mark Lemon, detailing the sufferings of his friend Mr. Leech. Perhaps those who, in the interest of gaping housemaids and dancing ragamuffins, opposed the bill, will at least confess that music can be something more than a nuisance, and that their pet Savoyards have at last succeeded in inflicting on us an irreparable loss.

THE colliers' strike has come to a termination. A meeting has been held at which confession was made that it was useless under present circumstances to continue the strike. Consequently, with the exception of 4,000 men, who for special reasons still are 'out,' and who are to be supported in their resolution by necessary aid, the whole body of miners will return to work. The speakers at the meeting held out a hope of inducing the whole mining population of Great Britain, 250,000 strong, to go on strike at the same moment. In this connection mention may be made of a speech delivered by Mr. J. J. Powell, Q.C., M.P., at Wolverhampton, in which that gentleman explained the French method of adjusting the disputes between labour and capital. The following passage is worthy of quotation:—

> In this country we are not much accustomed to think the French superior to ourselves; we are very loth to admit that such is the case, but there is no question that in this particular matter the French are far in advance of us. Strange to say, from the earliest ages—(it is not the result of modern political economy)—but from the earliest ages in France there have existed institutions called 'Conseils des Prud'hommes,' the duties of which councils are to enquire into and adjudicate upon disputes between masters and workmen on the subject of wages, and the plan pursued is as simple as possible. In every district, and with reference to every class of trade and manufacture in that district, a council is appointed, the masters electing three members and the men three. A president is chosen to preside over their discussions. If the decision of the council be not acquiesced in, an appeal lies to the Chambers of Commerce, but, as I ascertained when in Paris a few weeks ago, although on an average 4,000 or 5,000 cases are annually brought before the council in that city alone, appeals are almost if not quite unknown. Thus that large number of cases is settled between the masters and men without any disturbance or difficulty whatever. And what is stranger still is that, although these councils have power to adjudicate, and although by law the adjudication may be made as binding upon the parties as would be the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction between litigant parties in this country, yet so admirably is the system managed that out of these 4,000 or 5,000 cases, of which three-fourths relate to wages alone, the great majority are not adjudicated upon at all, but settled by the conciliatory action of the council. I trust some of the working men will hear what I say, not because I say it, but because I think they must see at once that the way I have described is a much more rational way of settling their disputes with their masters than by resorting to the barbarous and expensive practice of a strike. I presume the workman wants only what is fair, and I presume the master only wants what is fair, and if so, why not resort to some such system as exists in France to settle their differences, instead of going on in the absurd way in which they have been going on lately to their own detriment and the injury of everybody else?

GENERAL TODLEBEN, the renowned defender of Sebastopol, who is now in England, paid a visit on Tuesday last to Chatham, and inspected the naval and military establishments at that port and garrison, as well as the system of fortifications there carried out. The General also on the same day visited the Royal Engineer establishment at Brompton.

IRELAND.

THE new Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland is to arrive at Dublin Castle on November 8. The Lord Mayor will go in state to meet his Excellency. The following is a summary of the address to be presented on the occasion:—

> After the usual expressions of welcome and congratulation, it goes on to say that the expressions of regard were not offered to him as a distinguished member of a political party, but as the representative of the Sovereign. In that exalted character alone was he recognised and received. In the appointment of his Excellency as successor to Lord Carlisle, they (the corporation) saw with satisfaction a sign that the Lord-Lieutenancy of that country was to be continued, as the citizens of Dublin saw with regret the repeated menaces that assailed its perpetuation, and the misrepresentations of the grounds on which the Irish people resisted its abolition. They disclaimed and repudiated the mean and narrow considerations attributed in England to their defence of the Irish Viceroyalty. They resisted its abolition as another fatal step in that pernicious policy of centralisation that had already worked so much evil to the country, and had stripped it of so many of the noble and useful rights and prerogatives of a nation. The arguments in favour of the abolition of the office, if they prevailed, would strip it still further of its institutions one by one, until at length the baleful policy of centralisation would have swept away everything that a people could call their own. Dublin never sought the retention of the Lord-Lieutenancy for the sake of the expenditure of the salary attaching to the office among its citizens. It advised the retention of the office on the higher grounds of national right, and with the single purpose of assisting in the general advancement of the nation. The address then proceeds to call his Excellency's attention to the anomalous state of the kingdom he was called on to govern. His Excellency would see a country blessed with all that should constitute the national elements of prosperity, inhabited by a virtuous, brave, and industrious people, and yet he would see its resources undeveloped and witness many proofs of decay. He would learn that a vast number of its wealthiest proprietors were absentees, and that the rents they received, as well as the revenues of the country, were constantly remitted to England without any adequate return. The address next refers to the immense proportion of the Imperial revenues expended in England, while but very little was expended in Ireland, and also to the vast emigration from its shores. The advantages of the port of Galway as a transatlantic packet station are next alluded to, and the address remarks that, although a company had been formed for the purpose of establishing a line of packets between that port and America, it had in a short time fallen beneath the narrow spirit of jealousy which it had to encounter in England. The advantages of Queenstown harbour as a naval station are also touched upon, and it is added that the address might be swelled by references to many other congenial topics, but the corporation would not enter into subjects on which there might be differences of opinion. They had touched only on matters on which the people of Ireland were unanimous in their views. The address concluded by referring to the confidence which was now rapidly growing up between all classes in Ireland.

THE CONTINENT.

FRANCE.

THE Czar of Russia has been winning the hearts of the very mixed population of Nice by the liberal manner in which he has displayed his august presence to their eager eyes. He has also established himself in the good graces of the guard of honour of French chasseurs provided for him by taking the surest road to the human heart, in the shape of a good dinner. The complimentary toasts were exchanged between host and guests, in honour of the Emperor of the French and the Czar of Russia. This was followed by a review of the troops, on which occasion the spectators remarked with pleasure the very respectful salute with which His Majesty greeted the colours of the regiment. On the 26th ult. the Emperor of the French left Paris for Nice. He passed through Lyons and Marseilles, stopping for a few minutes only at Avignon and Arles to hear from the mouths of the local authorities the extent of the disasters consequent on the floods of the Rhone. He arrived at Nice on the 27th ult. amidst the most enthusiastic cheering. On the following morning he was on the point of starting to pay a visit to the Czar, when his Russian Majesty himself appeared at the Prefecture where the Emperor was staying, being desirous of anticipating the visit in order to show his sense of the courtesy and hospitality which he has received in France. The Emperor immediately returned the visit to the Czar and Czarina. After these ceremonies the inevitable review of the troops in garrison was held, which was followed by a visit to the Russian and French frigates stationed at Villafranca. In the evening the Emperor dined with the Czar; the whole Imperial party then went to the theatre, which was in gala for the night. The political importance of this meeting is said to have been overrated; the Czar had hinted his desire that the name of Poland should not be mentioned, and the conversation, though cordial in the extreme, was never of so private a nature as to have made serious discussion possible. The Emperor is said to have pressed the Czar to pay a visit to Paris; but his offer was courteously declined on the ground of 'urgent public affairs.' On the next morning the Emperor left Nice for Toulon. The road between the two towns had been so seriously damaged by the late storms that there were great fears that it would be found impassable; the exertions of the workmen throughout the whole night of the 28th luckily restored the road to working order; otherwise we should have had a nineteenth-century edition of the legend of Canute, the first king on record who learned that he could 'not control the sea. Immediately on reaching Toulon, His Majesty visited the squadron, and was present at another great sham attack of the harbour. From Toulon he went to Marseilles, and thence to Lyons, stopping in both of these cities to visit the works in progress. On Monday evening, the 31st ult., he had returned to his capital. He is said to have been excessively gratified by the spontaneously enthusiastic reception everywhere given to him by his subjects of the South. The Czar left Nice on the 30th ult. on his return to St. Petersburg. He was expected at Stuttgard on the following day to join with his sister, the Queen of Wurtemburg, in the celebration of a service commemorative of the death of their mother. Thence he was to go to Berlin, and, after a few hours' visit to the King of Prussia, proceed to St. Petersburg. The King of the Belgians has been staying at Marseilles, and is expected at Nice.

The floods caused by the swelling of the Rhone have been the source of much loss and distress. The low-lying lands about Avignon are flooded, and the stream runs under the old walls of that city, built by Boccanegra in the fourteenth century, and still capable of withstanding the attacks of the elements, although since the use of cannon their natural occupation is gone. At Arles the bridge of boats was carried away, and, being borne with violence into the small river shipping, did much mischief. The Emperor, after enquiring into these misfortunes, left the inhabitants of Arles with the substantial consolation of a promise that their projected stone bridge should be made as speedily as possible. The Loire is reported to be rising rapidly, and fears are entertained of an inundation there also. The floods caused by the rise of the Loire in 1852 will be remembered for a long time as one of the greatest calamities which have desolated that part of France.

The rumours of a new French loan are denied; but a project is on foot for establishing a public works fund of 30,000,000*l.*, to be raised by bonds. The object of the fund will be to supply the many works of public utility wanted throughout the whole French empire. Thus it will occupy towards the whole country the same position which is filled by the works fund towards the city of Paris. The advantages of it are to be extended to Algiers. Marshal MacMahon, the governor-general of that province, has invited his subordinates to send in statements of the works required in their several departments, in order that the most necessary of them may be submitted to the central authorities for their approval.

ITALY.

If additional light could be thrown on a difficulty by repeating the arguments on both sides ad nauseam, the real gist of the Franco-Italian Convention would now be as clear as noonday. We have already stated what the positions of the several parties are. On the one side is the Papal faction in France, who insist upon it that the Italians are bound according to the treaty to give up all thoughts of Rome. Their arguments are backed up by the ultra-French press, if we may so call them—those, namely, who are jealous of an extension of the Italian power. On the other side are the more moderate Italians, who do not consider that the claims upon Rome are at all affected by the treaty; and this is the view which the present Italian Government is supposed to take of the matter. Then there are the Red-Republican Italians, who believe that the object of the Convention is to defraud them of their coveted metropolis; and the Pope himself, who considers that he is betrayed by its terms. Thus there are two parties who agree to the treaty, the one because it tends to realise the Italian aspirations for Rome, the other because it extinguishes those aspirations; there are two who object to it on the same grounds. The fun of the affair is that all parties refer to the same documents in support of their views; so that the terms of the treaty must be like the spear of Achilles, which could heal with its butt-end the wound which it gave with its point. The Italian Parliament has been adjourned for a few days, having nothing to discuss until the all-absorbing question of the day is settled. The bill for the transfer of the capital to Florence has been submitted to a committee of nine, chosen by as many preliminary committees, or permanent bureaux composed of members of the House. The similarity of this plan to the system of the Presidential election in America is curious; and as in America the real contest is fought in choosing the delegates from each State, so here also the great discussions took place in the bureaux upon the nomination of the several committeemen. The opposition demanded that Florence should be designated in the bill as the 'provisional capital,' or that the House should confirm the vote of March 27, 1861, proclaiming the right of Italy to Rome. They were, however, unable to gain a majority in any of the bureaux; the committee elected declared in favour of the Convention, and for the transfer of the capital to Florence. The supporters of the Government in the House have held a private meeting; 200 members were present, and a unanimous vote given in favour of the Convention. The National Bank has been officially invited to establish itself at Florence; in view of the proposed change, the council of the bank have determined to increase their capital by 400,000*l.*, and have therefore called up the 250 francs still due upon each of their shares. The King, impressed with the necessity of economy and retrenchment, has given up 140,000*l.* of the civil list in favour of the State. Correspondence from Turin speaks with great admiration of Signor Lanza, the Finance Minister, by whom the bill for the transfer of the capital was brought forward. He has been a member of the House since 1848, and during his fifteen years' service he has acquired a reputation for eloquence, and a personal influence over the minds of the deputies, which now make him complete master of the House. It is to his exertions that is due the spirit of order and moderation, as well as the earnestness and activity, by means of which the proceedings of the last fortnight have been successfully carried out. The Chamber of Deputies reassembles to-day (Thursday) to receive the report of the committees. It is said that a bill is to be brought forward for compensation to the city of Turin.

Concerning the inroad of Garibaldians into Venetia, we have no further reports; there are said to be about 500 of them now hiding in the mountains. A certain Signor Cairoli has issued a proclamation calling upon the people to support the insurrection, and requesting assistance for the insurgents. The Diritto and the other journals which have published this have been seized. The Opinione says that the originators of the movement are known, and are a few 'generous but inexperienced young men.' It states that the Government disapproves these inconsiderate movements, not disavowing the principle of them, but considering them inopportune. It must be remembered that these 'generous but inexperienced' men have undertaken a desperate enterprise; that they attempted to draw into it the defenceless population of the country which they invaded, men whom they pretend to call fellow-citizens; and, finally, that they well knew that, in the almost certain event of their failure, their unfortunate dupes would assuredly be the victims of Austrian vengeance, while they themselves could count upon a safe retreat into the mountains. If the Opinione has no harder censure than this for the selfish and stupid vanity which can only be fed by the desertion of the men whom it is pretended to succour, we must allow that they who look for Italian patriotism elsewhere than in the ranks of the Italian Government have some excuse for their notions. A band of 500 Garibaldians has appeared in Illyria, commanded by an ex-Garibaldian officer. They respect private property, but take everything that belongs to the Austrian Government.

A wagon, containing the sum of 6,000*l.*, belonging to the railway contractors, and escorted by a guard of six lancers, was stopped on the road to Foligno (on the northern frontier of the present States of the Church) by a band of twenty brigands, who succeeded in carrying off the whole sum.

SWITZERLAND.

M. and Madame Trümpi were a married couple living at Berne at the beginning of the present year. M. Trümpi was engaged in commerce, and had latterly been somewhat unsuccessful in his undertakings; he was a man of violent temper, and was consequently unhappy in his household; he was often on bad terms with his wife, partly from his own character, partly from some suspicions of her fidelity; on one occasion he had thrown a decanter at her in the heat of a quarrel, and cut out her eye. He was by no means a moral man, and at the time to which we have referred, his health was seriously impaired by his excesses. Dr. Demme, the family doctor, a young man of great promise, who had only failed in consequence of his youth in getting the Professorial chair of medicine in the University of Gottingen, was summoned to attend him. He performed an operation upon him, and treated him medically for some little time. After some rallyings and relapses, M. Trümpi at last died, apparently of apoplexy, so at least thought Dr. Demme; but in order to satisfy some suspicions which had arisen as to the manner of his death, and also, as he said, to be able to make a due report to the life insurance societies which would be indebted to the representatives of the deceased, and, further, at the request of the prefect of the district, he made a post-mortem examination. The report, confirming Dr. Demme's previous opinion, was forwarded to the prefect, who examined it with great care; so little satisfied was he with the manner in which it was drawn up, that he requested two eminent Swiss doctors to repeat the examination. On their inspection of the body, they found to their surprise that Dr. Demme had opened the head only, leaving the internal organs of the body untouched. It was to these that they turned their attention; a slight analysis detected the presence of ten grains of strychnine. Upon this the prefect of Berne put the whole affair into the hands of the College of Health, and requested that body to report whether the poison had been taken by accident, or through a determination to commit suicide, or whether a horrible crime had been committed. They reported that it was impossible that so large a dose could have been taken by accident; that circumstances did not exclude the possibility of suicide; but that to distinguish between murder and suicide was not in their province, but the duty of a court of law. Dr. Demme and Madame Trümpi were thereupon arrested on the capital charge. Their trial began on the 25th ult. The procedure of a Swiss court is very similar to that of France; there is no ceremony or pomp of any kind, no gowns, wigs, or ermine. On the other hand, the public prosecution is never offensively violent, nor the president bent on considering the guilt of the prisoner as a foregone conclusion. The facts from which the prosecution inferred the guilt of Dr. Demme were, the criminal connection which was shown to have existed between the two prisoners before the death of M. Trümpi; the marked deficiency, if not falsehood, of Dr. Demme's report; and the glaring inconsistencies in his narrative. Madame Trümpi appears to be a person of doubtful sanity; her demeanour in court confirmed this idea; she said she heard voices, at one time urging to confess the crime, at another to conceal it. Nevertheless, the doctors were inclined to think that she was capable of distinguishing right from wrong even then, and much more so at the time of her husband's death. In favour of the theory that M. Trümpi had committed suicide, several sayings of his were quoted, showing that he was expecting to die shortly, and that he had contemplated self-destruction. One of the most horrible features of the case was that Dr. Demme had engaged himself to the daughter of Madame Trümpi immediately after the death of her husband. This engagement, according to the prisoner's account, was only the result of previous arrangements made before Trümpi's death. According to the theory of the prosecution, it was intended to divert suspicion from his criminal intimacy with her mother. The evidence for the prosecution showed that Dr. Demme had been sleeping in the house for several days before the death of his patient, and had had ample opportunities for administering to him the fatal dose. The same fact was used by them to rebut the theory that Trümpi had committed suicide; for a doctor of the eminence of Dr. Demme would never have allowed a patient suffering from a dangerous illness to take a dose of poison so hard to get at and so difficult to conceal effectually without his knowledge. A very remarkable piece of evidence against the accused was an unfinished letter written by Madame Trümpi in a moment of acknowledged delirium after her arrest. In it she confesses the whole crime, and accuses herself of theft, lying, adultery, and murder. The counsel for the defence contended that such a document could not be considered as trustworthy, and Madame Trümpi herself repudiated it in court.

The trial is not yet concluded; it is one which must be interesting to English readers, as it contains two of the peculiarities of many of our English cases of murder, the suspected use of poison by a physician, and the alleged insanity of one of the accused. It will be instructive to hear what remarks will be made on these two points in a foreign criminal court.

DENMARK.

But for the insane attempts at insurrection in Venetia, Europe would at this moment be at peace. The treaty between Austria and Prussia on the one side, and Denmark on the other, was signed at Vienna on the 30th ult. It differs but little from the preliminaries already executed at Vienna. In conformity with Article 2 of the preliminaries, the Jutland enclaves in the Slesvig territory, situated south of the southern limit of the district of Ribe, and ceded by Denmark to the German Powers, have been exchanged against a portion of Northern Slesvig.

The new frontier of Slesvig will be fixed to the north of the town of Christiansfeld; on the east it descends to the south of Stenderup, in order that the eastern side of Slesvig, which if possessed by Germany would be a continual menace to the island of Fünen, may remain with Denmark.

The ratification of the treaty of peace will take place within three weeks, but the Prussian troops will only evacuate Jutland at the expiration of twenty-one days after that event, during which period Prussia will continue to retain all her former power in the province.

It is asserted that the round sum to be paid by Denmark to satisfy the claims of the Duchies on the public property will amount to 8,500,000 rigsdalers, and that she will also have to pay an indemnity for all the captured shipping.

The Rigsraad will meet on the 7th inst. to complete the ratification of the treaty on the Danish side. There were rumours of a new hitch in the arrangements, which were confirmed by the new pressure put upon Jutland by General von Falkenstein. He gave notice that on the 1st inst. all the postal officials in Jutland would be dismissed, and that after that time he should himself appoint all functionaries in that province. He further entirely prohibited all exports and imports by sea from and to Jutland. The unfortunate Danes were obliged to yield to the pressure, which was apparently used to extort from them a last concession. The final defeat was, we must suppose, not accepted until every effort had been made to induce other Powers to interfere on behalf of oppressed Jutland, for, according to the Dagblad, 'The Minister of the Interior has informed the representatives from Jutland to the Rigsdag that the complaints made by the Danish Government to the neutral Powers concerning the violation of the preliminaries of peace by Prussia have always been fruitless.'

GERMANY.

The Prince and Princess of Wales went from Copenhagen to Hanover, to visit their relations in that kingdom. The present King, George V., is, as is well known, the son of Ernest Augustus, Duke of Cumberland and son of George III.; he is consequently first cousin to the Queen of England. Though afflicted with blindness—a calamity which is dreadful to all, but particularly to a king, who governs as well as reigns—he is able to take his part in the administration of his country. They were received and hospitably entertained by the King, the Queen, and the Crown Prince. They paid a flying visit to the grandmother of the Princess, and were doubtless grieved that they could not present to her the infant Prince, her descendant in the third generation. Before going to Hanover they spent a day in Brunswick, where they must have looked with interest on the cradle of the great House of Guelph, the royal House of Europe during the last 900 years, of which the Prince himself is not the most insignificant member. From Hanover they went to Cologne, accompanied by the Crown Prince and Princess of Prussia, who had gone from Berlin to Hanover to escort them on their way. It was remarked that none of the royal family of Hanover went down to the station to salute the Prussian Prince; and the reason for it was found in the very unceremonious way in which the Prussians turned the Hanoverian troops out of Rendsberg. At Cologne the princely party could not be let off without a review: a sham fight was got up, representing the capture of the city of Cologne. From Cologne they go to Frankfort, and thence to the palace of the Prince of Leiningen, where the Prince of Wales means to shoot, and the Princess hopes to rest. After that it is supposed that they will pay a visit to the Princess Alice of Hesse. Then they will perhaps be attracted by Bonn, where Prince Alfred is now staying, and finally make their way home through Brussels.

The event of the day in German politics is the resignation of Count von Rechberg, and the nomination of Count von Mensdorf-Pouilly as his successor. Count von Rechberg had done good service to his country; he had taken its affairs in hand after the peace of 1859, when they looked gloomy enough, and restored them to a moderate degree of prosperity; but he was so entangled in the meshes of the Prussian alliance, which has become very burdensome to Austria, that the Emperor saw no means of extricating himself from his difficulty but by cutting the Gordian knot, and taking another minister. He has, however, given Herr von Rechberg the Order of the Golden Fleece, and requested him to remain as Austrian Plenipotentiary in the Conference of Vienna; he has therefore signed the treaty of peace on behalf of Austria. The appointment of Count von Mensdorf-Pouilly is supposed to inaugurate an entirely new line of policy, one point of which will of course be a withdrawal from the present close intimacy with Prussia. This is expected to conciliate the smaller German States, who look with great suspicion upon the policy of annexation which is the characteristic of modern Prussia. The relations with France will also probably be put on a more satisfactory footing, an event which will rejoice the hearts of the Viennese, who appear to have conceived an intense admiration for Napoleon and Napoleonism. Herr von Mensdorf-Pouilly, the new Foreign Minister, has up to this time been acting as military commandant in Galicia; it is said that a very early measure of his will be the removal of the state of siege in Galicia; the deputies from that province have decided not to abstain from the deliberations of the Reichsrath any longer. Herr von Mensdorf-Pouilly is a first cousin of the Queen of England, her mother and his having both been daughters of the Duke of Saxe-Saalfeld-Coburg. He holds the rank of lieutenant-field-marshal in the army; he served in the Italian war of 1849. In 1850 he was sent to London on a diplomatic mission on the occasion of the Slesvig-Holstein war of that date. After that he filled the embassy at St. Petersburg, and more lately he was appointed to various military commands in the Austrian provinces.

Herr von Bismarck returned from Paris to Berlin on the 30th ult., and proceeded direct from the railway station to the residence of the Minister of War. A conference of Ministers took place on the 31st, after which Herr von Bismarck had an interview with Prince Gortschakoff.

The Duchies of Slesvig-Holstein are very angry at the treatment they have received in the Conference of Vienna. They declare that some exclusively German territory has still been left to Denmark, that the share apportioned to them of the Danish national property is smaller than their due, and that they have been saddled with at least their portion of the public debt, besides the expenses of the war, which ought to have been paid by Denmark. The only way to quiet the angry feelings which have been excited in the Duchies, is for Austria and Prussia to hasten a solution of the question of the succession. Of all the candidates who were in the field, the Duke of Augustenburg is virtually the only one left; the Duke of Oldenburg either has given up his claim as hopeless, or is waiting for the act of renunciation in his favour by the Czar of Russia, an act which, it is whispered, never has been signed and never will be signed. As to the Duchy of Lauenburg, Herr von Bismarck has, they say, got leave from France to annex it, if he can find a decent pretext or excuse for the proceeding to give to Austria.

The exertions which have been made by Professor Liebig in the cause of philosophical agriculture have been recognised in England by the deference with which his opinions are quoted by all classes in this country. So gratified is he with our appreciation of him, and so interested in the results of the experiments now being made here in the utilisation of sewage, that he has given up the chair of Chemistry and the Laboratory of the University of Munich, and is about to come to London, where he will occupy a very important post in the company formed to carry out the purpose which he has so much at heart.

GREECE.

We mentioned last week that the King had sent a message to the Assembly complaining of the very dilatory manner in which it is considering the Constitution, and hinting that, if it be not completed in a month, some strong measures will be taken. This message, although much criticised by some who say that a constitutional king ought to have constitutional patience, has produced a most salutary effect; the House has at length betaken itself to the task of legislation in earnest, and there is little doubt that the King's object will be attained. The legislative union of Greece with the Ionian Islands will come into operation on the 1st of January next. It will probably involve a complete assimilation of law—that is, the abolition of the Ionian code and the introduction of the Greek. The chief mischief of this will be that it will bring with it the dismissal of all the present Ionian functionaries, and the distribution of the patronage among needy Greek lawyers. The assimilation of the fiscal system will not yet be carried out, as the olive crop is good, and the Government wish to obtain all the benefit of the present export duty. It is feared that in the present state of Greek commerce the receipts of the Custom House, on which the King's income and the pensions of the discharged officials are secured, will not be a very good guarantee.

SPAIN.

No new feature has presented itself in the Peruvian difficulty; diplomatic correspondence between that country and Spain is suspended. The insurgents of Santo Domingo have made serious proposals of peace, throwing themselves unreservedly on the clemency of the sovereign. The Minister of Finance has been trying to raise money; he called a meeting of capitalists, and appealed to their patriotism either to negotiate 600,000,000 reals (rather more than 8,000,000*l.*) of the bonds given in payment of the national property, or to subscribe to an issue of hypothecated notes of the bank, bearing interest at 6 per cent. The meeting separated without coming to any decision.

Admiral Pareja has been sent to the Pacific, not, as was supposed, to replace Admiral Pinzon in command of the fleet, but to supersede Señor Salazar y Mazarredo as plenipotentiary. General Espartero, Duke of Victory, has declined the presidency of the Progressist committee; they, however, have refused to accept his refusal. The majority of that party have agreed to continue to abstain from politics; but a strong and very respectable minority have combated this resolution as unpatriotic and ungracious, in the face of the very liberal circular addressed by the Minister of the Interior to the governors of provinces on the subject of the elections. The Minister of Public Instruction has written a letter to the various instructors in the kingdom, reminding them that the Catholic religion alone is acknowledged in Spain, and that the acknowledged form of government is an hereditary constitutional monarchy under the present dynasty; and that, therefore, any attacks made on these two cardinal principles would meet with severe punishment.

PORTUGAL.

The Government has contracted a loan of 225,000*l.* with Portuguese capitalists. Colonel Facio, the envoy of the Emperor of Mexico to the courts of Madrid and Lisbon, has presented his credentials to the King of Portugal.

TURKEY.

Osman Pacha has been appointed Commissioner for Turkey to superintend the allotment of lands to the Suez Canal Company according to the decision made on that subject by the Emperor of the French. The English chargé d'affaires has officially expressed to the Porte the regret felt by his Government that the Italian Minister has been excluded from the commission appointed to settle the difficulties in Syria.

ALGIERS.

THE news from Algiers is still very favourable to the French cause. General Yusuf has received the submission of the greater part of the civil tribes of Boghar. Colonel de Lacroix reports that the tribes in his district are evincing a like spirit of submission, which may be in a great part owing to the skilful military combinations effected by that commander, which have placed the natives completely at his mercy.

MOROCCO.

THE Sultan of Morocco has given to the commercial world an invaluable boon in the shape of a lighthouse on Cape Spartel, the north-western promontory of the continent of Africa. This was for centuries one of the most dangerous coasts in the world; but the apathy of the Moorish sovereigns was too great to admit of the obvious improvements which might have diminished its perils. In 1860 the Brazilian frigate Doña Isabella was lost here with nearly all hands. The Sultan then, at last, acceded to the prayers of the French consul, and ordered the present lighthouse to be erected. The engineer was supplied by the French Government; the expenses of the building, which were very great, from the fact that no wood could be used in the construction in consequence of the dampness of the climate, were defrayed by the Sultan. We give the bearings of the light for the benefit of those who may be interested:—N. lat. 37° 47′ 14″; long. W. of Paris, 8° 15′ 50″; height of tower, 78 ft.; height of lantern above the level of the sea, 310 ft. It shows a steady white light.

MEXICO.

Two victories are reported for the French arms. The corps of Ortega, Negrete, Carhajal, and Patoui, had united in their retreat into Chihuahua under the command of Juarez, forming a body of 4,000 men with 20 guns. They were caught by Colonel Martin with 500 French Zouaves and 100 Mexicans, attacked in position, and routed with the loss of all their artillery, 500 killed and wounded, and 130 prisoners. They were forced in their flight to blow up all their ammunition. The French loss was one officer, eleven French soldiers, and three Mexican, killed; three officers and 41 French soldiers wounded. The officer killed was, unfortunately, Colonel Martin himself, who was cut in two by a cannon-ball early in the action. Near Vera Cruz the Imperial General Calderon fell upon the guerilla bands, and dispersed them; the chiefs, Crispino, Martinez, and Valentino Garcia, were taken prisoners and shot. Cortina, the leader of the Liberal party in Mexico, had given in his adhesion to the Emperor Maximilian unconditionally. The Emperor was away in the interior, but was expected to return shortly to the capital.

SOUTH AMERICA.

In Chili the question of the subjugation of Araucania and the occupation of that country for Chilian colonisation had received much attention. With a view to placing the coast in a state of defence, an income-tax was proposed of 5 per cent. on all incomes exceeding 200 dollars, but it was not expected to be carried.

In the northern provinces large deposits of guano had been discovered which will yield 25 per cent. of ammonia.

Ex-President Moutt has proceeded to Peru as plenipotentiary from Chili, to take his place in the proposed South American Federal Congress, and to represent Chili in aiding Peru, if necessary, to repel from her territory the enemy of South American independence.

In Peru, as in Spain, the Spanish-Peruvian difficulty remains the same, no steps having been taken towards a solution.

The Government of Peru has accredited M. St. Banduson on an extraordinary mission to the Court of Madrid.

The Spanish squadron lies peaceably at the Chincha Islands, receiving abundant supplies. The only inhabitants left on the islands are Chinese labourers.

The Peruvians are still actively engaged constructing their navy, and their monitors are being completed with vigour.

The Government has decreed that no charters for the exportation of guano are to be entered into after October 1 till further notice, in order that the large stocks in Europe may be wrought off.

LETTER FROM CANADA.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

QUEBEC: October 17, 1864.

PUBLIC interest is daily growing more intense respecting the question of a federation of the provinces. The Intercolonial Conference sits daily for four or five hours, and I believe its proceedings are going on harmoniously.

Since the Canadian Ministers' return from the Charlottetown Convention, they deputed two of their leading members to draw up a projet of Confederation in order to be submitted to the Conference. After the preliminary business, including the appointment of Sir E. P. Taché as chairman, it proceeded to the consideration of this document. During the first few days the discussion was conducted in committee of the whole, and every member was placed under injunction of secresy not to divulge any statements made by particular delegates.

It appears that a majority of the delegates would prefer a legislative to a federal union of the Upper and Lower Provinces. The necessity, however, of conciliating Lower Canada, which feels that its peculiar interests can only be secured by the protection of a local legislature, will, it is thought, cause a concession to be made. At the same time, the aim will be to make the Confederate Government as strong as possible, and to delegate but a circumscribed power to the local legislatures. In the division of powers certain specified privileges will be conferred on these bodies, but everything else will fall to the share of the general government. The appointment of the local governors is likely to be vested in the Confederate Government, the head of which will be appointed by the Crown, possessing the title of viceroy or governor-general.

It was suggested in a sort of compte rendu of the proceedings of the Charlottetown Convention, which is known but not acknowledged to be official, that the Confederate Government should, out of the revenue it would collect from existing sources, make an annual allowance to the local legislatures. Several objections to this proposal were made, and it is understood to have been abandoned. Among other things, it was objected that if the local legislatures obtained a revenue without the responsibility of imposing and collecting taxes, a dangerous temptation to extravagance would be given. The chances at present are that the local legislatures will be left to raise their own revenue, and it is questionable whether this can be done without resorting to the alternative of direct taxation. As the general government will monopolise the great sources of revenue, which, in these provinces, consist chiefly of customs and excise duties, there seems no other course left to the local governments. None of the provinces have been accustomed to this mode of raising their revenue, beyond what is necessary for mere municipal purposes; and it is only in Upper Canada that municipal institutions have been fully developed.

The cry that the Confederation will inevitably lead to direct taxation for the support of the local governments has already been raised in Lower Canada, where that precise form of taxation would be more objectionable than perhaps in any other portion of British America. It is being used as a weapon of opposition at an election of a member for the Upper House by what are called the Rouges, who, as a party, are strongly opposed to the new scheme. An anomalous condition of things exists in this contest; the ministerial candidate—an Englishman and a Protestant—receiving the entire support of the Catholic clergy in the electoral division, against a French-Canadian and a member of their own communion.

So far as the clergy referred to (who are almost all-powerful in Lower Canada) have shown any leaning on the question of confederation, it has been in favour of the Government project. There may have been some exceptions, but this is the general rule. An instance will serve as an illustration:—

Some time ago an opposition French organ, published in Montreal, printed several letters purporting to be written by a curé. The Roman Catholic bishop of the diocese caused his secretary to address a letter to the editor, calling in question the allegation that they had been written by a priest, and conveying an intimation that the bishop desired the clergy under his charge not to interfere in politics. This was a piece of clerical diplomacy, the real meaning of which was that the bishop did not desire his priests to write in the sense his curé, real or pretended, had written. It is understood that the Roman Catholic hierarchy as a body have resolved to take a quiescent position in the meantime until the project is introduced, when they will meet and pronounce ex cathedrâ upon it. Their influence may be considered sufficiently effective in deciding the fate of the elections in about two-thirds of the Lower Canada constituencies. To their credit be it said, that they have hitherto used their power with considerable moderation, and there is no instance, I believe, since the union of the two provinces in which they have made a determined or systematic opposition to any government. As a rule, they scrupulously abstain from intermeddling in political contests, unless they conceive that the issues before the electors involve the interests of their Church.

The debts and tariffs of the various provinces being necessarily dissimilar, will cause some difficulty in their adjustment. The difference of the debts of the three principal provinces (Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick) is not very serious. The amounts, of course, vary vastly, but when we come to consider them with reference to the population, the percentage per head does not exhibit any higher difference than 36s. sterling. Viewed in this light, the debts of Canada and New Brunswick are about equal—the difference being that the liabilities of Nova Scotia are so much the less. Prince Edward's Island is almost literally without debt, its entire obligations to creditors being not much more than equal to one year's revenue. As a means of indemnifying this island for the larger share of debt it will have to assume as a member of the Confederacy, its delegates demand an equivalent in money; such money not to be applied in any predetermined manner, but to be used as the local legislature may deem fit. Had the Intercolonial Railroad been constructed on the terms last agreed upon by the three provinces interested—namely, five-twelfths of the expense to be borne by Canada, and seven-twelfths by Nova Scotia and New Brunswick united—the debts of the two latter would be relatively larger than that of Canada. The (late) Canadian Government, in breaking up the compact into which they had voluntarily entered for the construction of this road, will ultimately entail upon this province a much greater share of the cost. Canada will probably have to pay eight-twelfths instead of five-twelfths of the entire expense; that being more in proportion to the relative resources of the various provinces than the previous proposition. Perhaps, however, the difference will be more apparent than real, because in any case the Confederation must assume the entire debt of all the provinces.

Taken altogether, the tariff of Canada is higher than that of any other of the provinces—considerably higher than some of them. In Newfoundland, where there exists a general feeling in favour of the Confederation, a fear is felt that the intercolonial free trade, which would be an incident of the union, must considerably reduce their revenue; customs duties being, in the opinion of the colonists, their only resource. They have not, like Canada, any distilleries, and scarcely more than a brewery, from which to obtain excise duties. Direct taxation in a colony, the leading pursuit of which is an uncertain fishery, and in which one-fourth of the entire revenue is sometimes absorbed in relieving unsuccessful and, for the time being, pauperised fishermen, is absolutely impracticable.

FROM BUFFALO TO CLEVELAND.

NOTES OF AN EXCURSIONIST.

September, 1864.

In the evening we started for Buffalo. An hour's ride in the cars brought us to the depot or railway station, here pronounced 'dēpō,' and five minutes more to the American House, the chief hotel of that city. Buffalo is a handsome city of 100,000 inhabitants, just at the lower end of Lake Erie. The main street is one of the finest streets I know—a broad, well-paved avenue stretching from the quays on the lake shore for a distance of three miles back into the country; the lower end composed of enormous warehouses, stores, shops, and hotels—the upper portion of splendid private residences. We could not help noticing how different from Canada was the aspect of everything we saw in this the first great American city which lay in our road; how busy were the wharves and the streets leading to them, how fine were all the buildings, how tasty and elegant the 'boulevards' running into the main street from the various suburbs of the city; how wealthy and prosperous everything looked and everybody; how 'go-ahead' was legibly written on all that met our eyes, and echoed in every word that struck our ears. There's a peculiar characteristic about these new American cities which is unlike anything I have ever seen upon our side of the Atlantic. The people themselves express this trait by the word 'fast,' an epithet in which they take the greatest delight, for they are everlastingly assuring you that this much-prized feature is to be found in their national character to an extent unknown in the Old World. 'We are a very fast people, yess- - - -sirrrr- - - -eeeeee.' And true enough there is a rapidity of development in their national and individual life, in their ideas and institutions, which in great measure justifies their vainglory; the egg is prematurely hatched, the fœtus artificially developed, and yet the pace does not kill. The wheels run easily, the machinery is well oiled; there is no hitch or clog about it as in Canada. In Buffalo and in Cleveland which I passed through yesterday, and still more in Chicago where I now am, there is a smartness, a brilliancy, a dash about everything, the like of which I did not see in the Canadian cities, still less have I seen it in steady-going old England. I don't know how to explain to you what I mean—I hardly know how to realise to myself what it is that makes this people differ so from any other with whom I have come in contact; but there certainly is amongst these Western men a marked element of dissimilarity from all European races, a peculiarity of character which I have never seen sufficiently brought out in the writings of any newspaper correspondent or author. In fact, the more I see of the Americans, the more plainly I see how great and lamentable an ignorance of each other the people of two continents may live in, spite of all the modern facilities of communication, when they have 3,000 miles' breadth of water interposed between them, and no direct reason for improving their acquaintance.

In the evening the intelligence reached the town that General M'Clellan had been nominated at the Chicago Convention. I was disappointed at having missed the opportunity of seeing and hearing the orators of the day, but I could not manage otherwise, so I had to content myself with hearing the matter discussed in Buffalo, where the news of the General's nomination was enthusiastically received. Bonfires were lit, and guns fired, and flags waved, and windows broken, till a very late hour of the night; for 'little Mac,' as he is familiarly called by his friends, is high in favour just now at Buffalo; not that he is considered the best representative of his party, but the Democratic 'platform' which he is intended to typify is the popular one in the great trading cities of the West, where, as far as I can see, the Republican 'ticket' will carry no favour. To those who are accustomed to look upon Conservatism as the religion of the rural districts, and Liberalism as the faith of the towns, it must seem strange to find the order of things exactly reversed on this continent, for the country farmers are here the Radicals, and the Conservative element is affected in the populous cities. This is, of course, a very interesting time to travel here with the approaching election so near at hand, but it is extremely difficult to get with anything like certainty at the probable result of the coming election. Both parties are now equally confident of success, and I have as yet little means of judging which is the stronger. Besides, people are very cautious about what they say on the subject of politics; they will venture readily enough upon general remarks, but beyond these they are unwilling to trust themselves. Indeed, I have only met with one man who opened his heart to me, and gave me what I suppose to have been his real ideas; but he may have been a spy only, sounding me. Still there is plenty of talk and squabble amongst themselves, for party feeling, running at all times far higher than it does with our less excitable politicians, is naturally swollen by the flood of war; and Democrats and Republicans have a gulf between them which no coalition could bridge over.

Two travellers joined G—— and myself at Buffalo, and the following evening our party of four left by one of the Lake Erie steamers for Cleveland on the Southern shore, intending to take the cars thence to Chicago, a distance in all of 530 miles. But that is a mere nothing to the erratic people of this continent—a distance which I believe they would travel if they could every day of the year. For travelling is cheap, and, though not rapid (in the West), extremely comfortable. Locomotion is made very easy; the arrangements are perfect; everybody plays into everybody's hands; the hotels, the trains, the boats, and the omnibuses all work together most harmoniously. If the train by which you are to travel stops anywhere to enable the passengers to dine, you won't get dinner at the hotel; if the boat gives a breakfast, you must take it on board, or go without; if the train gets in by supper time, you are expected to look for nothing to eat at the refreshment rooms, but wait till you reach your hotel. Then the steamboats all 'connect' with the trains, and the trains with the steamboats, and the omnibuses with both. Where the cars run in connection with the boats, the line is carried right down to the side of the wharf; where no water communication exists, the railway runs down the principal street, and the depot is in the centre of the town; for an American does not look upon a railroad as a nuisance to be kept out of sight down amongst the back slums of a city, but treats it as what it really is, the greatest comfort and convenience of the present century. Add to all this the low rate of the fares, fixed in most cases by Act of Congress, and thereby prevented from participating in the general rise of prices. Well, then, with every inducement to travel, the Americans turn out in extraordinary numbers; every one does his or her proper number of miles in thousands every year. Country seats are unknown, and some change being necessary to keep them alive, the people rush to and fro in a restless way that would surprise you were you to see it. One old gentleman told me that he took his family to the seaside, 1,800 miles every year, and 1,800 back, with less trouble and concern, I dare say, than a Londoner would make about going down to Ipswich. A youth of fifteen thinks himself ill-used if he has not seen all the great cities of his country and the interior of every State; a girl of thirteen considers her education neglected if her parents have not allowed her to see more. But it's not only in summer that the traffic is so enormous; it's all the year round just the same. People in the East are sure to have friends and relations in the West, who have come to grief and migrated thither, and the truants must be visited every year. Adventurers and prodigals from the West must be welcomed as often in their deserted homes. So the nation is in a chronic state of 'fidgets.' Men and women of every age, babies in arms, and men who are here called old, females almost as numerous as the males, crowd the cars, stuff the steamboats, overwhelm the omnibuses, and storm the hotels. This fearful overcrowding of all the conveyances is the only nuisance which I have hitherto experienced, and in the cars it has sometimes amounted to something more than a personal inconvenience. You have heard, of course, of the extravagant respect paid by the people of the West to what I cannot conscientiously call here the softer sex—their frames are much too angular and uninviting. Now I don't believe in all this exaggerated deference to the weaker sex. If I have paid my fare for a seat in the cars, I don't see why I should give it up to any ill-clad woman who enters after me. If I have taken the trouble to secure a berth in the steamboat, I don't know on what principle of equity I am called upon to give it up to the ugliest woman who may ask for it. In the street cars the evil is far worse. No matter how full of hard-worked men the car may be, any fishwoman with her basket on her arm will hail it, knowing that some gentleman must rise for her. It's an unnatural, untrue, mock respect, productive of ill consequences in the female mind, and besides totally superficial; for with all this unhealthy outward show of deference, there's not half that quiet easy courtesy and real genuine veneration which are the acknowledged tribute to the fair sex amongst the educated classes of England.

THE FEDERAL DEFEAT ON CHARLES CITY ROAD.

The Richmond Enquirer of October 15 says:—

Further accounts from the battle-field of Thursday (the 13th) fully sustain the general idea of the completeness of our victory over the enemy on that memorable day. The effort to carry our lines was well matured, and the enemy was fully prepared to make the great sacrifice they did in the endeavour. During Tuesday night heavy reinforcements were thrown across the James from the enemy's front at Petersburg, and all day Wednesday was occupied in getting the men up to the lines in front of Chaffin's, and preparing for the conflict of the following day. The main force moved up the Charles City Road, and on Thursday morning, when the attack was begun, it was evident that the principal fighting would have to be done in the vicinity of that road, although the enemy's left rested near the Darbytown Road, and the advance by that route was simultaneous and in strong force. The advance of the enemy was checked about a mile and a half from our main works, and soon after the battle was joined their troops began massing near the Charles City Road for those desperate and repeated charges which proved so disastrously unfortunate for them. They advanced repeatedly against our lines and breastworks, but were literally mowed down as repeatedly, and not in a single instance did they secure an advantage, with all their compulsory recklessness in their foolhardy charges. Beaten at every point of the line, they were at last compelled to abandon the contest, not only giving up the field, but their dead and many of their wounded. The repulse was as complete as it was sanguinary, and furnishes room for a lengthy pause ere the effort to flank Chaffin's Farm may be attempted again. But the necessities of the political campaign at the North can recognise no such considerations. The terrible losses of this day will be concealed, as others before it; and before many days are over we may expect to hear of just such another and perhaps more disastrous and important assault. Our losses in the engagement will not exceed one hundred.

The Richmond Examiner of the same date says:—

After their bloody repulse of Thursday the enemy had no stomach to repeat their experiments on our works. Their defeat was much more thorough and disastrous than many are aware of. They made five distinct and determined assaults, and each time, being met by a most murderous fire of musketry at close range, were driven back in rout and confusion, leaving the ground thickly strewn with their dead. Notwithstanding these facts, we have no doubt Grant has already telegraphed to Washington that the affair was, on his part, nothing more than 'a reconnaissance in force, when, its object having been fully accomplished, our forces withdrew.' We know it to have been no reconnaissance, but a determined effort to break through what was supposed by the enemy to be a weak part of our lines, and we take our success then as an omen of the result when the grand tug of all shall come, when the Dutch Gap Canal shall have been completed, and Grant, with combined army and navy, shall make his grand old 'On to Richmond,' with a view of affecting the Presidential election.

Charleston papers of October 11 announce the death, by yellow fever, of Colonel Harris, chief engineer of General Beauregard's staff.

MR. BRIGHT'S LETTER.

The following is the text of the letter addressed by Mr. John Bright to Mr. Horace Greeley:—

Rochdale, October 1, 1864.

Dear Sir,—For more than three years the people of this country have watched with a constant interest the progress of the great conflict in which your people have been engaged; and, as you know, some have rejoiced over the temporary successes of the enemies of your Government, and some have deeply lamented over them.

At this moment we turn our eyes rather to the political than to the military struggle, and there is with us the same difference of opinion and of sympathy as regards your coming Presidential election that has been manifested in connection with your contest in the field.

All those of my countrymen who have wished well to the rebellion, who have hoped for the break-up of your Union, who have preferred to see a Southern slave empire rather than a restored and free Republic, so far as I can observe, are now in favour of the election of General M'Clellan. All those who have deplored the calamities which the leaders of secession have brought upon your country, who believe that slavery weakens your power and tarnishes your good name throughout the world, and who regard the restoration of your Union as a thing to be desired and prayed for by all good men—so far as I can judge—are heartily longing for the reelection of Mr. Lincoln. Every friend of your Union, probably, in Europe—every speaker and writer who has sought to do justice to your cause since the war began—is now hoping with an intense anxiety that Mr. Lincoln may be placed at the head of your Executive for another term.

It is not because they think Mr. Lincoln to be wiser or better than all other men on your continent, but they think they have observed in his career a grand simplicity of purpose, and a patriotism which knows no change, and which does not falter. To some of his countrymen there may appear to have been some errors in his course. It would be strange indeed if in the midst of difficulties so stupendous and so unexpected any Administration or any ruler should wholly avoid mistakes. To us, looking on from this distance, and unmoved by the passions from which many of your people can hardly be expected to be free, regarding his Presidential path with the calm judgment which belongs rather to history than to the present time—as our outside position enables us, in some degree, to regard it—we see in it an honest endeavour faithfully to do the work of his great office, and, in the doing of it, a brightness of personal honour on which no adversary has yet been able to fix a stain.

I believe that the effect of Mr. Lincoln's reelection in England and in Europe, and indeed throughout the world, will be this: It will convince all men that the integrity of your great country will be preserved, and it will show that Republican institutions, with an instructed and patriotic people, can bear a nation safely and steadily through the most desperate perils.

I am one of your friends in England who have never lost faith in your cause. I have spoken to my countrymen on its behalf; and now, in writing this letter to you, I believe I speak the sentiments and the heart's wish of every man in England who hopes for the freedom and greatness of your country.

Forgive me for this intrusion upon you; but I cannot hold back from telling you what is passing in my mind, and I wish, if possible, to send you a word of encouragement.—Believe me always, with great respect, yours very truly,

John Bright.

Horace Greeley, Esq., New York, U.S.

'THE PROGRESS OF CONQUEST.'

(From the New York Daily News, October 19.)

Texas has been ceded to the Confederacy! Mr. Jefferson Davis is sovereign lord of the region that extends from the Mississippi to the Rio Grande!

The attack on Mobile has been abandoned. Even Farragut, gallant old sailor as he is, has turned from its torpedoes, and artillery, and earthworks, and stern resolution, in utter hopelessness. Charleston, like Mobile, has proved too hard a nut to crack; and while serving to illustrate Black Republican barbarity in a bombardment of devilish wantonness, keeps the Federalists at arm's length, baffled and defeated.

Albemarle Sound is dominated by a Confederate ironclad. Expelled from Plymouth, we have lost our foothold in the Valley of the Roanoke; but are allowed to enjoy the lordship of Newbern, subject to the deadly protests of yellow fever.

Grant's army still languishes in the region of 'tidewater' fevers. The death that frowns upon his front gives his troops occasional respite; but until the return of winter frosts, there appears to be no rest for them from the death that preys upon his rear. And yet, what has been the material result of all this fearful loss of life? Fifty thousand additional victims of conflict or congestion have, it is stated, been added lately to the masses under Grant. But what of this? So completely paralysed is he known to be by his vigilant opponent, that even that tremendous accession of force was not allowed to interfere with the withdrawal of Confederate troops from Richmond for the reinforcement of Early. The auctioneer-like 'blowing' of the Administration must weigh as nothing in the face of this evidence of General Lee's calm, intelligent confidence in his own strength. The flank movement on Butler's right, the repulse of the Federal advance of last Thursday, the threatenings of Confederate attack on our extreme left, the detachment of several thousand reinforcements to the Valley, and Hampton's late 'operations' in the Federal beef-market, constitute an irresistible demonstration of the fact that the army of Northern Virginia is one of tremendous power of offence. Marchings and counter-marchings, stories of cradle robbings and grave plunderings, and all the enginery of bullet and bulletin have failed, after fighting it out 'on this line all the summer,' to disturb the hard fact that General Lee is sovereign lord of all the broad lands of old Virginia!

The Sheridan soap-bubble has collapsed. Even the censors can no longer turn that enterprising officer to any political account. The 'starving' masses that the Herald represented as wandering 'without arms' through the mountains, appeared, suddenly, well fed and well equipped, rushing down into the plain in furious pursuit of the Federal retreat from Brown's Gap! The denial of that disaster to Sheridan's arms has become, at last, of no avail; for, behold, it is declared to the world in the acknowledged fact that, after having fallen back more than fifty miles, Sheridan had returned, at last accounts, as far northwardly as Strasburg. Early, in the full flush of reinforcement and advance, is following up the Federal retreat; and, unless we accept the sanguine conclusions drawn from the partial encounter of last Saturday, will surge up once more to the Potomac, threatening the inoffensive people of Pennsylvania with the reprisal of fire and sword.

Burbridge has been hurled back from Saltville, in Western Virginia, with heavy loss. Kentucky threatens to blaze out into a general flame of irregular warfare; for while guerillas dash up into the neighbourhood of Covington and of Lexington, General Buford pushes forward, in cooperation, by way of Clarkesville, with a following of twelve hundred horsemen. Clouds of Southern cavalry are scudding up through Tennessee, and threaten to break upon Central Kentucky like an inundation.

Forrest, and Wheeler, and Roddy, and Dibrell, have burst, with all their followers, like a cloud of locusts, on Middle Tennessee. Decatur and Athens captured, bag and baggage, horse, foot, and artillery, on their way, these bold troopers have destroyed one of Sherman's lines of communication; and, two weeks ago, had moved forward to destroy the only one remaining. The censor has covered up, in that case, the work actually accomplished; but we may infer that it has been done very thoroughly, from the fact that Forrest remained, at last accounts, master of the situation. Twelve hundred infantry that had ventured down the Tennessee to dispute his sway, fled from his presence with the loss of their transports and their guns.

All of Western Tennessee has reverted to the Confederacy. Columbus is said to be endangered, and Southern advance sweeps up once more towards the Ohio at Paducah. Northern Mississippi does not own the presence of a single Federal soldier. Corinth, of bloody memory, is in the hands of the South; and, while enjoying free communication with the Gulf by way of the Mobile Railroad, sends beef, and bacon, and corn, and wheat, from the fat prairies of Mississippi and Alabama to the Confederate commissaries that drink the waters of the Tennessee at Tuscumbia.

Hood holds his whole army on Sherman's line of supply. Covering the work of Forrest and Wheeler, he threatens to confront the Federal retreat towards Chattanooga. With Talladega a terminus of his railway communications on one hand, and Tuscumbia an alternative on the other, a well organised system of wagoning, never exceeding a transportation of over a hundred miles, may enable him to retard Sherman's retreat by falling back before him even to the junction of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad with the Nashville and Chattanooga road, at Stephenson. If strategy do not enable the Federal chief to foil the bold design thus apparently contemplated for his destruction, he may not be able to do so by even a rapid succession of direct blows in less than, perhaps, three or four weeks. If Hood's alleged deflection towards Bridgeport be true, then does he intend, after having done the work of destruction to Sherman's communication as far as Dalton, to carry them out from Bridgeport as far as practicable towards Nashville. The formidable danger thus threatening Sherman, if it shall not show the madness of his venture by the capture or destruction of his army, will, should Beauregard not fail in skill, demonstrate the folly of an invasion that may, in the moment of its triumph, be compelled to resume its work de novo, two hundred or two hundred and fifty miles in its rear.

The sovereignty of Arkansas has returned to her own domain, 'vice' the government of Mr. Murphy, 'retired.' Murphydom has, to borrow an expression from Mr. Horace Greeley, been thus 'kicked out of the Union.' Marmaduke, and Cabell, and Fagan, and Shelby, tramping, and champing, and prancing, at the head of swarms of horsemen, have gone into Missouri; and having gathered an abundance of stores and recruits to cheer his heart, called up General Price with all his long and deep ranks of the victorious infantry of Kirby Smith. The great army that has thus swept down towards St. Louis, destroying the communications with that city as it passed, has moved on in peace and quiet towards the West; and having looked in at Jefferson City, sits down leisurely, with none to say it nay, in the enjoyment of the good things that concentrate in the Valley of the Missouri at Boonville!

Oh! ye of supple belief, hearken unto the voice of the bulletins that bid you be of good cheer in patient abiding of the assurance that 'this most wicked rebellion' is about to be crushed in—just ninety days!

Voting in Indiana.—The Philadelphia Age says: 'In Wayne township and city of Fort Wayne, Allen county, which are Democratic, 3,098 persons, between the ages of 20 and 45, were enrolled for military service, and the vote polled was 2,878. Now, mark the contrast. In Indianapolis and township, which are controlled by the Abolitionists, 4,762 persons were enrolled for military service, and the majority for Morton, the Abolition candidate for Governor, is claimed to be 6,000. This difference is worthy of attention. It shows the means by which the Abolition party are endeavouring to cheat the people out of their rights, and make the elective franchise a farce. But one more fact: In a Democratic county, where the judges of the election acted under the solemnity of an oath, and in strict accordance with the election laws of the State, out of 450 soldiers who were brought to the polls, only seventy-two would take the oath and submit the proofs that would entitle them to deposit their ballots. And yet, in an adjoining county, where the Abolitionists ruled the polls, two regiments of Massachusetts soldiers, with their State numbers on their caps, were allowed to vote, and in this way nullify the wishes of the legal voters of Indiana.'

The Nitre and Mining Bureau.—The United States, with the markets of the world open to them, employ 80,000 men in this business, which under the charge of the Nitre and Mining Bureau of the Confederacy employs but 10,000. These employés of the Nitre and Mining Bureau are composed of near 6,000 negroes and 4,000 whites. Its operations on the frontier, and often within the lines of the enemy, have compelled its officers to withhold facts that would have corrected misrepresentation and often prevented gross injustice. We are advised that out of its conscript force of 4,000 men over 1,500 are and for a month have been doing service at the front. At Saltville they fought and won the commendation of their officers for good conduct. In Tennessee, Georgia, and Alabama they have repeatedly responded to the call for troops, and have invariably done the service credit.—The Richmond Enquirer.

Reported Death of Mrs. Greenhow.—The Wilmington Journal reports the death of Mrs. Greenhow, who was returning to the Confederacy from Europe. The journal says: 'Up to the time of writing, we have obtained few particulars. We know that on Friday night or Saturday morning the steamship Condor, in endeavouring to come over the New Inlet bar, got aground, and that a boat from her got swamped on the 'rip,' and that Mrs. Greenhow, being a passenger on board the boat, was drowned.'

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of THE INDEX, 291 Strand, W.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

Advertisements should be sent and Money Orders made payable to J. B. HOPKINS, INDEX Office.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1864.

Capture of the 'Florida.'

THE Confederate authorities in London have received a telegraphic despatch, dated Lisbon, from Captain MORRIS, commander of the Confederate steamship Florida, announcing the capture of that vessel on October 7, by the Federal steamer Wachusetts in the harbour of Bahia. At the time of capture, the Florida was lying under the guns of the Brazilian forts and of the Brazilian fleet, and Captain MORRIS was on shore. Captain MORRIS is now on board the Magdalena, bound for Southampton.

We forbear to comment at length on the above intelligence. We hope in a few days to receive such details as will enable us to form a complete judgment on the affair. In the meantime, the facts stated justify the assertion that the act of the Federal officer in command of the Wachusetts has no precedent in audacious disregard of the rights of neutral Powers. Brazil is weak and the United States is strong; but a gross outrage on the first principles of maritime law demands the earnest attention of every maritime Power.

The Odar.

ONCE more we are startled with the news of a great Federal victory, and to add to its significance it is one of SHERIDAN'S victories. They are always complete. It is no drawn battle, no indecisive engagement—the success is undeniable, the rout is unparalleled, the captures incredible. SHERIDAN'S career in the Shenandoah Valley is a romance of history. He has, according to his own account, destroyed at least two Confederate armies. At Opequan Creek he inflicted a tremendous defeat on EARLY'S army; at Fisher's Hill Gap he annihilated it. There never was an army so routed and demoralised as EARLY'S, he informed the Northern public. Yet a week afterwards this panic-stricken corps, represented as making for Richmond, took up a strong position in his front, repulsed an assault of the Federals, and in its turn became the assailant. SHERIDAN retreated up the valley as far as Strasburg; there the beaten army pressed him too closely; he advanced to the attack; General COOK, his subordinate, with his accustomed impetuosity, charged, and threw the Confederates into confusion, and they retired without giving him the opportunity of another victory. It was strange at least, that the army which was so soon to become the assailant should at once withdraw when threatened—stranger still that a day or two later SHERIDAN'S force should itself have retired beyond Strasburg and the intrenchments which it had thrown up in front of that town. But now we come to SHERIDAN'S greatest triumph. He reports that on the 19th LONGSTREET'S army attacked his army at Cedar Creek, before daylight, threw it into disorder, and drove it four miles, capturing large numbers of prisoners and a quantity of artillery and matériel. The General himself was at Winchester when the attack took place; he hastened up, was in time to rally his troops and reform his line, repulsed an attack, assumed the offensive, and finally drove the Confederates off the field, capturing fifty guns and 1,600 prisoners. Now this is a very remarkable statement. For an army surprised and beaten, driven in disorder over four miles of ground, with heavy losses in guns and prisoners, to rally, become the assailant, and finally in the afternoon to defeat the victors of the morning, would be a great feat. But that it should not only defeat, but rout and drive its assailants several miles, recapture its own guns, and take some five and twenty from the enemy, is little less than marvellous. We do not deny SHERIDAN the possession of energy, dash, and skill; but that the mere appearance of one individual in the field of battle should suffice to convert a disgraceful defeat into a brilliant victory, is more than we can credit on that gallant officer's unsupported statement. Until we get the Southern accounts of the engagement, it is of course idle to speak with any degree of certainty as to its results. But, taking the affair as it is now represented, we think we are justified in considering it as another of those indecisive engagements which have unhappily been so frequent during the war. LONGSTREET'S force, although attacking, would be obviously inferior in numbers to that of the Federals; and it is possible that his earliest success may have encouraged him to continue the attack even after the Federals had been heavily reinforced. But we are more inclined to believe that LONGSTREET would have been quite content with his first triumph, and that the afternoon's battle was fought with a view principally of carrying off the trophies of victory. It may turn out that, aware of the arrival of reinforcements from Winchester, LONGSTREET had already commenced his retrograde movement, and that the action on his part was confined to defending his rear against the attacks of SHERIDAN'S enormously superior force of cavalry. That his army was not routed is proved by the fact that night alone put an end to the struggle, and that nothing was heard of any pursuit on SHERIDAN'S part. The casualties on both sides must have been severe. Northern correspondents admit a loss of 5,000 men, and almost for the first time no estimate is given of the number of Confederate killed and wounded. But as the Federals were surprised and terribly cut up in the morning, and as in the afternoon they were compelled to become the assailants, it is probable their loss far exceeded that of their opponents. As to the capture of the fifty guns, the figures look very large, but at least half of these were lost, on SHERIDAN'S admission, by the Federals, and we strongly suspect General LONGSTREET'S account will give a very different version of the whole affair. In the meantime it is significant that although the battle was fought on the 19th, nothing further had been heard from SHERIDAN on the evening of the 22nd, and that the day after the report of this great victory reached Washington gold went up two per cent. From other quarters the news is uniformly favourable to the Confederacy. It is now quite certain that HOOD and BEAUREGARD have become the assailants, and that great movements are on foot with a view to the expulsion of SHERMAN from Atlanta. HOOD'S whole force, when last heard of, was at Lafayette, marching westwards, either for Huntsville, Alabama, or for Bridgeport. At the same time a large Confederate cavalry force was in the neighbourhood of Chattanooga, and Confederate horse were actively employed between Chattanooga and Knoxville. All communication between the West and SHERMAN'S army had been cut off, and it seemed likely that HOOD would make Tuscumbia his supply depot, if not his base of operations. FORREST was busy in Western Tennessee and Western Kentucky. His cavalry were threatening at the same time Memphis and Lexington, and all the reports of his having been driven across the Tennessee River were mere inventions. SHERMAN was evidently perplexed by the new tactics of the Confederates. To follow them with a large force from Georgia would be to leave his line of railway unprotected, and to expose the garrison of Atlanta to considerable peril. Moreover, HOOD would be falling back upon his new base, whilst SHERMAN would have to move through an unfriendly and very difficult country, with no railway to assist his transport, and constantly exposed to the harassing attacks of a general possessing better means of provisioning his troops, and a far more intimate knowledge of the country. An advance by SHERMAN into Northern Alabama is out of the question, and if HOOD shall seriously threaten the Nashville and Stevenson railroad, it will be a hard matter for SHERMAN to retain his hold upon Atlanta. In Missouri PRICE is still making progress, and wherever his army advances fresh recruits flock to his standard; and although there are rumours of the concentration of Federal troops for an offensive movement, up to the present time all the efforts of the Federal commanders seem to have been made to avoid an engagement. The Northern Government is now trying concentration, and it finds the new system hardly more profitable than the old one. SHERMAN and GRANT monopolise the resources of the North, and withal effect very little, whilst in the outlying tracts the Federal power is every day losing ground. Texas has not a single Federal soldier on her soil; Arkansas can boast of but one strong garrison; Missouri is almost occupied by Confederate armies. If the extent of territory ruled by the Confederate Government in November 1864 be compared with that possessed in the same month last year, the gain is enormous. And yet there are found Englishmen who profess to believe in the possibility of the South being overcome and subjugated by Northern armies.

Presidential Elections.

THE near approach of the Presidential election in the United States invites attention to the mode by which the chief magistrate of the model republic is invested with his authority, by which a change of rulers is effected, or the power held by a reigning President is entrusted for four years more to his hands. There is, perhaps, nothing of which the English people know so little as the mechanism of a Presidential election; nothing which is, indeed, so difficult for the foreigner to understand as the complex working of the agencies of popular conventions and electoral colleges in elevating to the highest seat in the State some man theretofore often without consideration or influence. DE TOCQUEVILLE, who was probably the most sagacious cis-Atlantic observer that ever thought and wrote upon American affairs, somewhat offended the amour propre of the people of the United States, by declaring that the tendency of their institutions was to raise inferior men to the Presidency. At the time this opinion was advanced, the Presidents had been men of eminent qualities, conspicuous, before they became such, for statesmanship and a mastery of political science. But when we consider what sort of men have since moved across the stage in the procession of Presidents, a procession commencing with the imposing figure of GEORGE WASHINGTON, and terminating with the ludicrous image of ABRAHAM LINCOLN, we are compelled to accept the opinion of DE TOCQUEVILLE as safe and wise. Of BUCHANAN, LINCOLN'S immediate predecessor, it might be said, in the oft-quoted verdict of the Roman historian upon GALBA, that he would have made a worthy President had he never been elected—Omnium consensu capax imperii nisi imperâsset; but of LINCOLN nothing whatever could have been predicated, and his conduct in office, which has excited the derision and indignation of the world, was foreshadowed by no antecedent notoriety beyond the narrow limits of a local electioneering campaign.

Theoretically it is presumed that the choice of the people in the election of their President will fall on their most capable and worthy man. And so it might, did not party machinery interpose between the popular preference and the polls. Perhaps; for it cannot always be supposed that the popular preference will be for that best and wisest person. But here the popular preference is controlled by King Caucus. There are two, three, or four parties, each one of which is to put forward a candidate. The mode of selection is by the vote of a convention composed of delegates elected in primary meetings of the voters belonging to the parties respectively. If any one supposes that these primary meetings are expressive in any sense of the will of the people, or even of a fair majority of the voters they represent, he is egregiously in error. The resolutions are regularly written out in advance, and carried through by small party managers; and the delegates are committed from the beginning to some political candidate of their preference, failing to secure whose nomination, their next aim is to defeat the nomination of some odious competitor. And so the party conventions are composed of men who go into the body with their course marked out beforehand. In convention the names of the most eminent leaders of the party may, or may not, be brought forward, but on none of these is the nomination likely to descend. For eminent leaders must have been many years in public life, must have made a 'record,' must have sown the seeds of enmity far and wide, and must be compelled to contend in the outset with elements of opposition of long-standing and embittered animosity. So that a caucus or secret meeting is held during the session of the convention, while the ballots are yet hopelessly divided between half-a-dozen candidates, in which the friends of three or four combine to defeat the possible nomination of one, and thus 'availability' secures the selection of some 'illustrious obscure' against whom nothing can be said, simply because his career in the public councils has been marked by nothing salient or striking whatever.

It may here be observed that the occupant of the Presidential chair goes into the convention for a second nomination with the overpowering advantage of the patronage of his office, which is, in the majority of cases, potent to secure his selection by his party, as afterwards it may be, though we cannot say with certainty that it will be, to secure his election by the people. A whole army of postmasters, clerks, custom-house officers, commissioners, Indian agents, sub-treasurers, and other dependents upon executive favour, a vast and powerful combination of Government contractors, wielding an immense influence, and representing a great moneyed interest, stand by the President in the convention, while the most serious danger to be apprehended by him in the subsequent campaign is from the antagonism of the 'outs' towards the 'ins,' and the multitude of impecunious adventurers who desire another shuffle of the cards. When the convention has decided that he shall stand for a second term of office, he may find himself opposed by some new and wholly untried aspirant for political honours, who has won military laurels, and is therefore famous, or achieved a parochial victory in a State election, and is therefore thought likely to carry the day when put forward for the first office in the gift of the people.

As soon as the candidates of the several parties have been chosen by the party conventions, the excitement and frenzy of the Presidential campaign begin to be manifested throughout the land. Biographies of the candidates are published by the thousand, in which their extraordinary talents, virtues, and services are set forth in eloquent periods, and it forthwith appears that two, three, or four men are before the people, each wiser, braver, purer, more disinterested than the other. All are men 'worthy of the better days of the Republic,' according to their biographers; all are deserving the Penitentiary according to the statements of the opposition press. For three or four months the daily papers are wholly given up to the question of the next Presidency. Arts, letters, education, public works, sanitary matters, all are left to take care of themselves till it shall be determined who shall live for the next four years in the White House. In the larger cities the hurly-burly is heightened and exacerbated by the orgies of political clubs, which parade the streets with torches and banners and music, always ready to provoke a fracas with their opponents, while in the country districts the 'mass meeting' calls together thousands and thousands at many points easily accessible by the railway, all the industrial interests of the land being neglected while the mighty question of the day is yet pending.

The demoralisation of the people inevitable to this periodical agitation, and the bitter hatreds engendered by this quadrennial upheaval of society in a popular election, were anticipated by the framers of the Constitution. They endeavoured by the establishment of the Electoral College to avoid this very tumult and commotion, and they fondly imagined they had thereby provided against the possibility of permitting the election of President to become a fierce and furious strife among the masses of the people. The calm statesmen of the earlier age would have bowed their heads in humiliation had they supposed that the illustrious competitors for the highest office in the republic would ever have the white robes of their candidature covered with the dust of the political pied poudre, far less bespattered with the mire of the cross-roads. And so they appointed that the President should be chosen by an Electoral College. The discussion in the convention which framed the Constitution was long and earnest as to the mode in which the election should be effected. At length, having decided that neither Congress nor the people should elect, they agreed upon the following clause:—

> Article II., Section 2.—Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of senators and representatives to which the State may be entitled in Congress.

And this clause was followed by another prescribing the manner of voting for President in the Electoral College, and of transmitting the vote to the President of the Senate. The theory was, that the electors should be free to choose, without interference or dictation from any quarter, the person whom they should deem fittest for the exalted position. In like manner it was provided that Senators of the United States should be elected by the State Legislatures, in order that they should be removed far above the atmosphere of party excitement and popular clamour. But in the election of Senators, as in the election of Presidents, the tendency of universal suffrage to popularise all such intermediate agencies, and to break down the barriers which the Constitution had erected for the preservation of the nation's liberties, was sufficiently proved by the fact that in the memorable contest between Douglas and Lincoln in Illinois—the only occasion on which Lincoln, prior to his election as President, had ever been placed prominently before the country—the two candidates went all over the State addressing the people upon the hustings upon the issues of the day for a seat in the Senate; and the Legislature of Illinois, yielding to the pressure from without, permitted itself to be made the mere instrument of carrying out the popular choice.

The Hon. James Williams, in his admirable volume entitled 'The Rise and Fall of the Model Republic,' has shown how the intentions of the framers of the Constitution with regard to the election of President were in course of time frustrated and openly set at naught—how the Legislatures of the several States, with the single exception of South Carolina, directed that the choice of electors should be committed to the direct vote of the people—how it soon became virtually settled that the Electoral College should have no range of selection outside the nominees of the party conventions—how these nominees came to entertain no opinions and to adopt no policy that the 'platforms' of the party conventions had not expressed and marked out—and how, in this manner, the great cardinal principle of the sovereignty of the States, which underlay the whole fabric of the political system, was utterly abandoned to the inevitable ruin and enslavement of the South, had they passively submitted to the election of a candidate upon an issue purely sectional, in which their dearest rights and interests were involved. The Electoral College degenerated into being the blind and unreasoning agent of the party convention, the nominee of the party convention pinned his faith to the party platform, the law of majorities was established beyond all restraint or interference; and thus the States dwindled into the rank of counties or shires, their ancient prestige and influence lost in the rage and swell of popular domination. Had the Electoral College been wholly abolished, had all State lines been obliterated, and the destinies of the country been left to the will of the mere numerical majority counted by the head, there would at least have been a majority clearly ascertained for some one candidate; but the retention of the constitutional forms and the voting by States, while the rights of the States and the spirit of the Constitution were repudiated, made it possible for a candidate to be elected who was not the choice of the people, and thus Lincoln obtained his seat, wanting more than one million of votes to constitute a majority; a result which demonstrated, as Mr. Williams very well remarks, that in pursuance of the "fatal policy of cheating the Constitution, and cheating the States composing the Confederacy," the American people finally "cheated themselves, by placing a President in power in direct violation of their own will as expressed at the ballot-box."

It is, perhaps, idle to speculate on the probable issue of the political struggle now going on in the United States, an issue which will be decided before another week shall have rolled over our heads. The contest is complicated by the element of military dictation, hitherto absent from the elections of Presidents, and may not be terminated without disturbance at the polls, ushering in that inevitable day of doom for the 'Model Republic' when no law shall be recognised but the law of the strongest, when anarchy shall imperil civilisation, and civilisation, if rescued at all, must be rescued by the creator of an organised despotism. The answer given by Mr. Lincoln to the 'Loyal Tennesseans' who waited on him with a protest against the imposition of test oaths, that he expected 'to let the friends of George B. M'Clellan manage their side of the contest in their own way, and that he should manage his side of it in his own way,' would seem to imply that he was prepared to forestal any resistance to arbitrary 'management;' and he may, and probably will, prove too powerful to be displaced by the combined opposition of the War Democrats and the Peace Democrats, the men who desire the control of affairs, and the men who are weary of the shedding of blood. But the result, whatever it may be, will furnish only another illustration of the fact that the Presidential election has become a very different thing from what it was designed to be by those calm, pure, worthy men who started the United States of America, less than a century ago, upon their career of glory and of shame.

The Trial of Muller.

Mr. Baron Martin, in sentencing Franz Muller to be hanged for the murder of Mr. Briggs, affirmed that 'he was as certain that the prisoner did the deed as he could be of any fact which he had not seen with his own eyes.' The manner also in which the case was left to the jury by one of the most discreet and most merciful Judges that ever sat on the bench, plainly indicated that the Lord Chief Baron was at one with his brother Judge on the question of Muller's guilt. The circumstance that the jury considered fifteen minutes ample time for deciding the fate of a fellow-creature, demonstrated that they had no more doubt than either of the learned Judges. To differ from the experience of Judges and the honest sense of twelve jurymen argues a singular obliquity of the perceptive faculty, and most undoubtedly we have no intention of shaking the faith of our readers in the guilt of Franz Muller.

Perhaps no conditions so manifestly display the power of judicial acumen as the existence and the disregard of difficulties. We remember a case which was tried before the present Lord Chief Justice of England, in which the evidence against the prisoner was convincing. There was, however, one serious objection to his guilt. The spoil of the burglary was found in a newspaper bearing a date subsequent to the capture of the accused. The Judge admitted that he could not explain the objection, though he held that it was not worthy of regard. The prisoner was convicted. The newspaper, as it turned out, had been published before the capture, but, according to custom, bore a date many days later than the actual day of issue. Similarly, in the case of Muller, there were points of evidence which explanation alone can render consistent with the guilt of the accused. Yet these were in the eyes of the Judges mere straws in comparison with the irresistible weight of the evidence of guilt.

Indeed, there was one feature in the case which must find its support in the force of moral suasion and not in logical calculation. Matthews, the principal Crown witness, had one story for the coroner and another for the court. In the one place he had bought a hat at Downs's in Long Acre, in the other place he admitted that since that assertion he had discovered that there was no such shop. Before the coroner he recognised Muller's hat, 'because it was turned up more on one side than on the other, probably from the prisoner lifting it by that part;' before the Judges he remembered that he had instructed the maker to turn it up in that fashion. Moreover, he confessed that he had spent every day, and the whole of every day, from July 9 to July 15, in the streets of London, that he had visited public-houses, cab-stands, and other places of resort used by cabmen, and that until the last-mentioned day he had never heard of the murder. His wife knew the facts on the Monday, but, with a peculiar and inexplicable reticence, never even gossipped over her tea. He himself, too, could read, and at times bought his penny paper; yet, oddly enough, he never saw the placards which were affixed at every cab-stand, and never beheld the bulletins which daily were emblazoned with capitals announcing the details of the crime. Nay—strange and perverse being that he was—the man, in whose breast lay the secret that was to unravel the mystery of the murder, never even heard the street-boys shout the news, and never listened to a fellow-cabman discussing what was in the mouth of every Londoner. But the Court believed Matthews, and even the counsel for the defence did not venture to reject his testimony as falsified by his own enormous inconsistencies. Now to take the other side of the case. Mr. Thomas Lee, for aught we know a thoroughly respectable person, swore that he saw and spoke to his friend Mr. Briggs at Bow station; that in the carriage with Mr. Briggs sat two men, one opposite to and one by the side of the deceased gentleman. The description given by Mr. Lee of the two men finds no counterpart in the appearance of Muller, and Mr. Lee believes that Muller was not one of the men. Immediately after addressing Mr. Briggs, Mr. Lee entered the next carriage, and the train started. Now, if Mr. Lee was correct in his statement, it was next to an impossibility that Muller should have been the murderer of Mr. Briggs. Of course, Mr. Lee did not closely observe the two individuals in the railway carriage; but it may be that if one of them had been a poor German tailor, Mr. Lee would have marked him as a quaint occupant of a first-class railway carriage. On what ground then is the evidence of Mr. Lee disregarded? The witness on being asked why he did not, on hearing the news of the murder, inform the police of what he had seen at Bow station, answered that 'he did not think his evidence of importance, and that an appearance in a prosecution was a bother.' We will not abruptly assume that this strange reply procured the rejection of his evidence, but we may be pardoned for a remark on its nature. There are persons to whom notoriety is pleasing; there are others who have a deep-rooted and unconquerable aversion to an appearance either in the witness-box or in the columns of the press. Mr. Lee may be one of them, and his reply may consequently have been a sin in language rather than in substance. If he did not think his evidence of importance, he cannot incur censure for this supposition, because that was precisely the opinion formed by both judge and jury of what Mr. Lee had to say. Why then was Mr. Lee dismissed from all consideration? Why was it assumed that he who had never seen MULLER in his life before was committing perjury to save the murderer from his just fate, or that he had no eyes wherewith to see, and no ears wherewith to hear? The explanation is not difficult. Mr. LEE's evidence was an objection to the theory of guilt, but it was an objection that was swept clean away by a torrent of facts utterly inconsistent with any possible theory of innocence. By the side of these difficulties the objection of MULLER's physical incapacity to perform the act, of his declared intention of emigrating, of his entering his passage in his own name, of his pawning the chain in Cheapside, are of minor importance, and only deserve mention as elements in the fashioning of the mystery of the case.

The three weapons by which MULLER was defeated were the watch and chain of Mr. BRIGGS, the hat of Mr. BRIGGS, and the hat of MULLER. Unless MULLER acquired the watch and chain between 8 A.M. and 10 A.M. on July 11, he beyond all doubt possessed them before sunrise on July 10. That he purchased them at the Docks on the Monday was an invention due to the distinguished advocate who defended MULLER at New York. The prisoner on board the Victoria declared that he had possessed the goods for a year or two. The proof that MULLER wore Mr. BRIGGS's hat after the murder, and that the same hat was in the box of the prisoner found on board the Victoria, is not quite conclusive. Only one hatter would affirm that in the second-hand trade hats were stitched and not gummed, while other witnesses swore that shellac was always used, and that the work before them was not that of a hatter, but of a person skilled in sewing. But the proof that MULLER cut down and stitched a hat does not demonstrate that the subject of the operation was the hat of the murdered man, and Mr. DIGANCE has made too many hats to lend strength to the proof by the mere fact that he was hatter to Mr. BRIGGS. There remained, however, the damaging evidence of MULLER's hat being left in the railway carriage. Mr. WALKER swore that he made but two hats with the peculiar lining found in the hat produced—one for MATTHEWS, the other for MULLER. It is odd—perhaps nothing more than odd—that though at least a week elapsed between the making of the two hats, yet that Mr. WALKER inserted in no other hat a similar lining. But it is indeed strange that both hats had disappeared, and that neither the cabman nor the prisoner could offer any explanation of the loss.

We admit that mystery surrounds the case; but it must be conceded that the guilt of MULLER is beyond question. Even if humanitarians do wrest the difficulties inseparable from imperfect means of knowledge into arguments for false mercy, we are sure that the words of Mr. BARON MARTIN will sink so deeply into the mind of the advisers of the Crown as to cause a summary rejection of impertinent appeals.

Arming the Negroes.

ON October 18, the New York papers republished an article from the Richmond Enquirer on the subject of arming the negroes. Curiously enough, on October 22 it is telegraphed from New York as if it were latest intelligence. It is also stated that the Government of the State of Louisiana recommends the measure. Without some explanation, this telegram may lead to misapprehension.

Now, the Government of Louisiana recommends the arming of some of the negroes as a species of retaliation, and as a means of protecting the coloured race. The Federals have kidnapped a large number of negroes in Louisiana for their armies, and have treated the negro women and children with the most horrible barbarity. It is therefore suggested that the negroes should be armed, and necessarily admission into the military service of the Confederate States will free them and their children.

The Richmond Enquirer, like the rest of the Southern press, is an independent organ of public opinion, and what it recommends has no official stamp. But there is good sense and earnest patriotism in what it says about arming the negroes. The South is fighting for independence, and for that cause the institution of negro slavery will be given up. If the North is to win, then the negroes will pass into the hands of the Yankees, therefore if any danger arises of the North overrunning the country it will be politic to arm the negroes. If all the whites are enlisted, Virginia will fight the invader with her blacks. The Enquirer, which, like the rest of the Confederate press, is always discounting defeats and manfully preparing for the direst extremity, recommends that Congress should authorise the Government to purchase 250,000 slaves, enlist them in the army, and of course free them.

We do not see any probability that the Confederate Congress will adopt this advice, because there is at present no need of such a measure. The Confederate armies were never numerically stronger than at this moment, and the Northern Government never found it more difficult to recruit its rapidly and continually depleted ranks. Still there are conceivable contingencies in which the negroes might be armed. If after another four years of war the South is half as badly off as the North now represents her to be, or even if she is as hard pressed as were the colonists in the first war of independence, the negroes may be called upon to fight for home and country, for life and family. That freed negroes will fight vastly better for their Southern masters than for their Yankee kidnappers is past questioning. It seems to us altogether improbable that the Confederates will have to enlist negroes. Still the battle is not over, and all other sources failing, the Confederates have the card in their hands of 'arming the negroes.'

THE POWER OF THE SOUTH.—The Morning Post of Tuesday contained a letter from which we extract the following:—'The mere numerical superiority of the North is grossly exaggerated. The population of the fourteen Southern States is 12,000,000, and of the Northern States 19,000,000. I shall be reminded that some of the Southern States are not under the control of the Confederate Government, and that I ought not to include Kentucky, Maryland, or even Tennessee and Missouri. I reply that the sons of these States are in the ranks of the Southern armies, though not to the extent they would be if the forces of the North did not keep them back. But here is a point curiously overlooked by our political arithmeticians. These States, if they did not send a single recruit to the Confederate armies, would still have to be counted in the resources of the Confederacy. They do not add to, but take from the resources of the North. They are declared by Mr. Lincoln to be under martial law, and they are undoubtedly under martial law. Mr. Lincoln is obliged to employ a large army to keep them in any sort of subjection. Since these States engage a large Northern army, they are just as much a source of strength to the South and of weakness to the North as if they were situated like Virginia or South Carolina. If this were remembered, it would explain, in a great measure, the utter failure of the North. Even in respect to mere numbers, it is not so much as two to one in favour of the North. It may be objected that I include the negroes in the Southern population, and that the negroes are not available for the Southern armies. Is the whole male population of the North available? Since they have not negroes, the Northern fields must be tilled by white men. The negroes are not idle. If I am to deduct 33 per cent. from the Southern population on account of the Southern tillers of the soil, I must at least deduct 33 per cent. from the Northern population on account of the Northern tillers of the soil. I say at least 33 per cent., for it is undeniable that a larger portion of the Northern than the Southern population is necessarily engaged in non-military occupations. A careful examination of the question will convince any candid enquirer that in respect to mere numbers it is not nearly so much as two to one in favour of the North. Is it not an axiom in war that, to have a chance of success, the invader must in numbers be vastly stronger than the invaded Power? A whole people cannot be enlisted in a foreign war—a whole people is enlisted in a defensive war. The Federal Government conscripts armies for offence—the whole South is a camp, and every man is an enemy. Nay, the very women of the South are active enemies. The Northern armies have not only to contend with the Southern armies, but against the entire population. In a military point of view I maintain that the invading North has not a numerical superiority.'

MR. LINCOLN'S WAY.—A deputation of citizens of Tennessee waited upon President Lincoln to deliver a protest against the recent illegal proceedings in that State. The following account of the interview is given by Mr. John Lellyett, the accuracy of the narrative being attested by the Hon. Charles Mason:—'I called upon the President to-day, and presented and read to him the subjoined protest. Having concluded, Mr. Lincoln responded: "May I enquire how long it took you and the New York politicians to concoct that paper?" I replied, "It was concocted in Nashville, without communication with any but Tennesseans. We communicated with citizens of Tennessee outside of Nashville, but not with New York politicians." "I will answer," said Mr. Lincoln emphatically, "that I expect to let the friends of George B. M'Clellan manage their side of this contest in their own way; and I will manage my side of it in my way."—"May we ask an answer in writing?" I suggested.—"Not now. Lay those papers down here. I will give no other answer now. I may or may not write something about this hereafter. I understand this. I know you intend to make a point of this. But go ahead, you have my answer."—"Your answer, then, is that you expect to let General M'Clellan's friends manage their side of this contest in their own way, and you will manage your side of it in your way?"—"Yes." I then thanked the President for his courtesy in giving us a hearing at all, and took my leave. Judge Mason, of this city, was present at the interview, to whom I refer in regard to the correctness of this report.'

CHAPIN'S FARM.—The following from the Richmond Enquirer, of October 15, shows how much truth there was in the Federal report that Chapin's Bluff had been taken:—'There is a field about a mile below our defences on Chapin's Farm, and not far from Fort Harrison, which is concealed by an intervening hill and a growth of woods. Here the enemy have been for some time industriously at work, defending their operations from observation by a line of sharpshooters. The new works are evidently designed to operate against our defences at Chapin's Farm.'

BURBRIDGE'S RETREAT.—The Cincinnatti Enquirer says:—'Parties who conversed with some of the officers of General Burbridge, state that our forces were greatly harassed by the enemy during the retreat from Saltville, Virginia. The roads were literally lined with bushwhackers, and even the women and children fired upon our troops. Trees were cut down across the roads to impede their progress, and other means were resorted to by the people to destroy them.'

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN FRANCE.

FROM A CONFEDERATE CORRESPONDENT.

PARIS: November 2.

DURING the past week the Paris journals have been completely deluged with American correspondence. The Moniteur, the Patrie, the Pays, the Temps, the Mémorial Diplomatique, the Courrier du Dimanche (which last journal reappeared yesterday after a two months' suspension), the Siècle, and even the Opinion Nationale, which had hitherto contented itself with relying solely upon the enlightened judgment of the infallible Malespine in everything pertaining to the American question, have published letters from America more or less authentic in their character, and more or less impartial in their statements.

The correspondence published by the Moniteur cannot fail to excite the deepest interest in the minds of its readers, even of those who busy themselves but little with the consideration of those grave matters of which America is now the theatre. Although no signature is appended to the letters published in this journal, it is nevertheless easy to perceive that they are not all the production of one writer. The most remarkable feature in these communications, whose writers are evidently well acquainted with American politics, is their thorough impartiality. Whilst showing, with a moderation which gives them a double weight, that both right, justice, and humanity are on the side of the South, they evince a rigorous impartiality towards the North, and the most punctilious Federal would fail to find in them anything which would justify him in questioning their honesty.

Certainly the same could not be said either of the correspondent of the Siècle or of that of the Opinion. The correspondent of the first-named journal, for example, having adopted a certain system, adheres to it through thick and thin, nor will he depart from it come what may. According to him, the Southern Confederacy is at all times within an inch of its destruction, it is demoralised, discouraged, ruined, and the North has but a slight effort to make to effect its dissolution. Should the Confederates carry the lines of General Kantz, then this correspondent, assuming the tone of General Butler, exclaims: 'A great victory for the North!' Should General Hood, by a skilful manœuvre, place himself on Sherman's rear, then he writes: 'The news from Georgia is satisfactory.' Doubtless it is well to have principles, but when pushed to such an extreme as this virtue becomes vice.

The correspondent of the Opinion, M. L. Cortembert, proceeds otherwise; he has not that placid confidence possessed by his colleague as to the depression of the South; he acknowledges that St. Louis is greatly menaced, and advocates coercive measures of the most violent character. I rather think that I had the honour of knowing this redoubtable correspondent in America, and he is, if I do not mistake, a Red Republican, who has for a long time occupied the post of leading editor of the Revue de l'Ouest, a French journal published at St. Louis, in which the following lines recently appeared:—

We wish for a war without mercy. We wish to see the war prolonged until a general bankruptcy and a general arming shall become inevitable, until every man capable of bearing arms, be he Jew or Christian, native or foreigner, is enrolled. Until the American soil shall have been watered by the blood of a myriad combatants, all hopes of making peace are vain!

This superb morceau will give you some idea of the general tenor of M. L. Cortembert's communications.

The correspondent of the Courrier du Dimanche, a man, it must be acknowledged, of no mean capacity, does not express himself in such violent language as the above; still, his remarks betray that disingenuousness which is so marked a feature in writers who maintain an unjust cause. By the side of ingenious and sometimes very just sketches of the present position of American affairs, he places assertions which are not only frivolous and erroneous, but known to be incorrect. I willingly admit that this correspondent is mistaken when he states that the South is exhausting its vitality in its complicity with its partisans in the North; when he affirms that 'Confederate', in the South and 'Democrat' in the North are synonymous; and when he points to the Southerners as 'the most curious example of what education and interest combined can effect in the shape of infatuation, blindness, and iniquity': but I refuse to believe him in error when he speaks of the violent military despotism of the Confederate Government, of the Unionists who are thereby oppressed, and when he affirms that Mr. Vallandigham has been named President of the American Knights by Mr. Davis. Such glaring blunders as these could not be unintentionally committed by so well-informed a writer.

I am glad to notice, on the other hand, that this correspondent has given a tolerably exact account of the state of feeling in the South-west:—

The service rendered to the Union by the Border States (he says) is an unwilling service, and their sentiments are those of a conquered country. There, it is no longer a factious minority which resists, but the majority of the citizens, who, notwithstanding the military rule to which they are subjected, are engaged in a secret and perpetual conspiracy. Missouri may almost be regarded as a rebel State and a conquered country; the Federals only maintaining themselves there by a state of siege. Families are to be found in that State whose numbers have been decimated by the war, but who nevertheless have not furnished a single soldier to the Northern armies, their sons being all sent to the South.

Are not these important and loyal admissions on the part of a Federal correspondent?

I informed you some time since of the flattering portrait of Mr. Lincoln [which had been drawn by the correspondent of the Temps; this week he has favoured us with that of General Butler, which is worthy of preservation.

Butler, according to this chronicler, is one of the most popular men in the United States; his mental resources are very great, he has an acute perception, his energy is invincible, and he has a special aptitude for influencing the masses! In what manner would this appreciation be viewed by Lord Palmerston, by whom the hero of New Orleans was so severely stigmatised in open Parliament?

The Patrie of Friday last contains an excellent article, by M. Aucaigne, on the question of the American election. It remarks as follows:—

Whether Mr. Lincoln or General M'Clellan be elected, the question of emancipation will be neither advanced nor retarded. For the first time during thirty years no Abolitionist candidate has entered the lists. This is an anomaly all the more strange, since it has been made to appear that the North was fighting for emancipation, and after four years of a disastrous war, each of the candidates for the Presidency who have offered themselves has effaced the word 'abolition' from his banner.

This word, to which the Northerners attribute their misfortunes, has certainly not been reserved by M'Clellan. Neither has Mr. Lincoln the right to call himself an Abolitionist candidate, since his Minister of State, his alter ego, Mr. Seward, recently declared at Auburn, that 'slavery has nothing whatever to do with the war.'

It is therefore clearly proved that the South is not fighting for the maintenance of slavery, since neither of the candidates for the Northern Presidency has the word abolition inscribed on his banner. The Confederates are fighting, not in defence of their peculiar institution, which no one attacks, but for the establishment of their autonomy, their national independence.

In the France, M. le Baron de Bazancourt examines the present situation of affairs in America, and shows that, contrary to what is believed by many, the South everywhere opposes the advance of the Federals, whose few partial successes have made them far too presumptuous.

He also criticises Grant's campaign in Virginia, and remarks:—

History will perhaps one day recount the horrible destruction of human life exacted by this persistent Virginia campaign, and it will then be asked if such butcheries as these can be called glory, and if such profligate sacrifices of wealth can be called government.

A pamphlet was published by Dentu, some days since, entitled 'The American Question in 1864,' which is certainly the best publication that has yet appeared on the subject in France. This pamphlet—or I should rather say volume, for it contains forty large-sized pages of closely-printed matter—bears the signature of M. J. Bourgeois, a gentleman whom I have not the honour to know, but who has the advantage over most of the foreigners whose works I have read and with whom I have had opportunities for conversation, inasmuch as he evidently possesses a deep knowledge of the history, institutions, and politics of America. I would particularly recommend this work to the attention of those of your readers who are acquainted with French.

THE FACTORY OPERATIVES AND THE WAR.

FROM OUR SPECIAL REPORTER.

Oldham: October 31.

A meeting of the most pitiable character I have ever witnessed has just broken up within a short distance from where I am now writing. It was a gathering of between 5,000 and 6,000 wretched paupers, many of whom were women with children in their arms, who, starved apparently in body and spirit as in raiment, had met together to exchange miseries, and ask one another what was to be done. This assembly of wretchedness took place in accordance with the following invitation, which, if somewhat 'sensational' in its terms, is tameness itself in comparison with the result it produced—which in all conscience was 'sensational' too—but in by no means the opprobrious sense of the modern epithet:—

'The Crisis! The Crisis!! The Crisis!!!

'These are the times to try men's souls, their patience, and their pockets.

'A meeting will be held on Monday next, October 31, on Oldham Edge, at two o'clock, to take into consideration the present condition of the country.

'Fellow-countrymen, attend in your thousands, and let your voice be heard. Why should you be idle? Let that question be fairly and openly discussed at the meeting.

'The meeting will be addressed by speakers from various parts of the cotton districts.

'The chair will be taken by Mr. Kinder Smith, of Oldham.'

The Chairman, who is a member of the Oldham branch of the Central Relief Committee, opened the proceedings by lamenting the necessity which had called the people together. He next proceeded to defend the District Committee, of which he was a member, from certain attacks recently made upon that body. He had heard it said that the Oldham Relief Committee deserved to be hanged for the negligent and stingy manner in which they had doled out relief. He himself, as a member of that Committee (though an operative), had been taunted in the streets of Oldham for the part he was supposed to have borne in the mismanagement of the funds. He was anxious to say that the blame ought to be laid where it was due, viz., on the people of Manchester, who were the first to ordain the degrading 'labour-test' for distressed operatives, and were the first to say they ought to be sent to the 'bastile' (the workhouse), notwithstanding the complimentary distinction that had often been drawn between 'chronic paupers' and factory hands unfortunately out of employ. So long as there was a farthing in Manchester or London of the money contributed by the public for the relief of the operatives, they ought to be supported out of that fund. But while they would be thankful ever for such support, it was after all only living on alms. The truth was, they would never regain the position they had lost—the position they ought still to occupy—until the American war was brought to an end. Supplies of cotton from any other quarter would only serve as a stopgap, and the miseries of the operatives would only be prolonged to an indefinite period. He himself had formed one of a deputation to Sir Charles Wood, to urge the repeal of the Indian import duties upon Lancashire manufactures, and Sir Charles Wood's reply was, that the duties could not be spared. Mr. Laing, however, directly controverted that statement. It would be a public benefit if Sir Charles Wood were superseded at the India House by Lord Stanley. But these things were foreign to the occasion upon which they had met together, and he would at once conclude by inviting the respective speakers to bring forward their resolutions.

Mr. John Matthews then moved the following resolution:—

That in consequence of the widespread distress that now prevails in the cotton districts by the continuance of the war in America, this meeting is desirous that Her Majesty's Government should use their influence, together with France and other European Powers, to bring both belligerents together in order to put a stop to the vast destruction of life and property that is now going on in that unhappy country.

In support of that resolution, the speaker, who is a Lancashire weaver, though a so-called 'agitating' one, said it appeared to him that so long as the devastating war in America was continued, there would be nothing but material and moral pauperism for the working men of these four northern counties. The very fact that so many thousands could be convened on a Monday afternoon was, to his mind, a cruel proof, a proof that placed the matter beyond the pale of controversy, that 'something ought to be done.' While belonging, therefore, to no party, he wished it to be distinctly understood—and the evidence of it was before him in that immense meeting—that the resolution he had proposed was one to which he believed they had already arrived by conscientious conviction. He had no objection to say it was quite true that there was a difference of opinion upon the American question. Some said the South was right—and they were many; others, though few, but whose opinions he respected, took the side of the North. For himself, he thought he had no right to say either to the North or to the South how they ought to be governed, or what form of government they ought or ought not to have. The only question in which he was concerned in the present instance was—How are our people to live while the war goes on? They had been told by one party in the State that they had no right as a Government to interfere in the affairs of other countries. That doctrine, he held, would be sound enough if it did not interfere with their own material and most important interests; but since this war broke out, there had been nothing but starvation for the people and bankruptcy for the small tradesmen in these districts. They had been told that neither the Government nor the Parliament could interfere. Away with such doctrine! Let them ask themselves what Governments and Parliaments are for, if not to enable the people to live. If the Government now in power and the Parliament now existing cannot do that, let them abdicate their places, as they will have abdicated their functions. There would never be any settled confidence in the cotton trade, nor any return of employment for the pauperised families in the cotton districts, until American cotton finds its way freely into the ports of this country.

The resolution having been seconded by a factory operative named Joshua Coop, the chairman put it to the meeting, and all hands were held up for it.

The next resolution, moved by Mr. M. Grimshaw, another well-known 'agitating' weaver, but a man of considerable powers of speech and influence with his class, was as follows:—

That this open air meeting of factory and other operatives, held October 31, 1864, on Oldham Edge, Oldham, memorialise the Right Honourable Viscount Palmerston, Her Majesty's First Lord of the Treasury, for the immediate and total repeal of all duties now levied on cotton goods and yarns when imported into British India, and that such memorial be signed by the chairman on behalf of this meeting; that a deputation be appointed to present the memorial to his Lordship; and that a request be made to the borough and other members of Parliament to accompany such deputation.

The speaker supported that resolution in a long and somewhat intemperate speech. He condemned the Government and the House of Commons for not taking action three years ago to stop what he called 'this wicked war.' Abraham Lincoln was 'no statesman,' and the war would go on so long as he remained President. It was the 'duty' of England, France, and other European Powers to prevent the brave and self-governing people of the Southern States from being exterminated, while the cotton spinners, manufacturers, and operatives of Lancashire were brought to the verge of ruin and starvation. A general election was not far off, and the operatives must 'see to it' that no man is returned to the next Parliament without pledging himself to advocate a speedy termination of the war. He, for one, would not appeal any more to Earl Russell, 'but would go direct to Lord Palmerston,' for it was a matter of certainty that they would have such a winter as had never been known. There was nobody to 'move' in the matter unless they did it themselves, and it was impossible for things to be made worse than they were at the present time. The Americans were making slaves of them. He objected to be starved for the sake of the emancipation of anybody else. Lord Palmerston must 'be given to understand' that he must remove Sir Charles Wood from the Indian Office, and he must also be 'distinctly told' that he must no longer remain inactive on the American question, but that he must 'go in' for the war to be ended, or resign his post as first adviser of the Crown. The war must be stopped upon some 'plan' or other, and the sooner the Government set about it the better it would be for themselves.

An old man named John Cheetham, without committing himself to all that had been said by the last speaker, seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

A deputation, in which it was said several towns were to be represented, was then appointed to wait upon the Premier, and after a vote of thanks to Mr. Kinder Smith, the meeting broke up, the men dispersing moodily, and the poor women and children trailing after them, a picture of wretchedness in its most pitiable form.

'Charity begins at home,' says the proverb, so eminently English alike in its best and its worst interpretation; so characteristic of the good sense which recognises domestic duties as having the first, highest, and holiest claim on the energy and devotion both of men and women, and indignantly reprobates those who, not finding these duties sufficiently onerous for their ascetic disposition, or sufficiently interesting to satisfy their craving for excitement, desert the post in which God has placed them to find more active, noisy, and notorious offices elsewhere; so characteristic of that national vanity which seriously supposes that the well-being of England and of Englishmen is the first object for which not merely England but the world exists, and which, in a curiously perverted form, animates that school of politicians which would not shed a drop of English blood or spend an English sovereign to defend the liberties or save the lives of our nearest kindred and closest allies. And yet the policy of England affords a strange contradiction of this peculiarly English doctrine, our charity as a nation seeming to become earnest and active in proportion to the distance from home of the scene in which it is exercised. We have recognised the rule of non-intervention, at least in that stricter sense in which it refers to the internal affairs of foreign nations, as the absolute guide of our European policy. We decline to consider the most atrocious misgovernment, the most frightful anarchy, as affording ground for forcible interference in the domestic politics of any European country. We allow the Poles to be massacred without lifting a finger in their defence, however noisily may wag the tongue of Exeter Hall, and however busily the pen of the Foreign Secretary may cover sheets of foolscap with despatches, which our determination not to give them practical effect renders rather worse than useless. We had words of commiseration and of censure for the sufferings of Poerio and the brutal tyranny of King Ferdinand; but no English statesman ever dreamed of sending a British fleet to enforce humanity and decency upon the King of Naples. Greece may fall into utter anarchy, and we shall give her no help; nor is it at all likely that we shall send a squadron to Cadiz to extort material guarantees for the payment of the Spanish debt. Yet we are not so scrupulous when other quarters of the globe present occasions for a charitable interposition. We sent a force to Mexico to cooperate with France first in compelling that organised anarchy to pay the money it had borrowed of British subjects, and to refrain from its bad habit of assassinating and robbing foreign residents in the course of domestic broils; and secondly, in establishing there some sort of government with which it might be possible for civilised Powers to hold diplomatic relations. True, we backed out of the affair without making an effort to accomplish the latter object; reflection having apparently convinced the Cabinet that Mexico was a little too near home, in a moral and political, if not in a geographical point of view, to be a proper scene for the exercise of that kind of political charity. In Japan we were a good deal more peremptory in our good offices. We undertook to enforce upon that strange and exclusive country a proper sense of the advantages of commercial intercourse with the rest of the world; and in order to complete our instructions, we took it upon ourselves to punish one refractory Damio by burning his principal city, and have just sent a squadron to take the batteries and seize the vessels of another. In China we went still further, and in order to prevent the triumph of a set of rebels who showed a singular incapacity for Government, we allied ourselves with the existing Administration, and enabled it, by the assistance of British forces at the outports, and of British officers in the interior of the country, to reassert its authority, hang and crucify a certain number of Taepings, and drive their chief to the extremity of suicide. We have civilised India by the simple and effectual process of conquest; a conquest satisfied and justified, in our view, by the charity which has prompted us to use our power for the benefit and elevation of the native race. We have put down infanticide, suttee, and human sacrifices; and while nearer home we pride ourselves on a strict adherence to the principle of non-intervention, in India we never hesitate to annex the dominions of a prince whose tyranny or incapacity render his subjects more miserable than our conscience will permit us to leave them.

But it is on the coast of Africa that the strangest manifestation of our peculiar policy is to be witnessed. In that quarter charity—kindness and pity for the savage races who inhabit that sultry land—has been undoubtedly the chief if not the sole actuating motive of our policy during the last forty years; and in order to carry out that policy we have deliberately set aside every ordinary rule of national action, and not a few rules of international law—have paid exorbitantly for the right of searching ships under the flag of one nation—have made disadvantageous treaties with another—have deliberately committed piracy against a third—have spent valuable lives and enormous sums of money—have maintained expensive colonies and a squadron which costs us yearly some of the best officers and seamen in our service—have sent English troops and civilians to perish in a pestilential climate—have run the risk of war with the United States, and offended several of our natural and most faithful allies. To suppress the slave trade has been our main purpose; to civilise the negroes the second. We have made and are making great sacrifices for these ends; it is well that we should listen calmly and patiently to men who are competent and willing to tell us what have been the results of our efforts.

It is from the light which they cast on this question that Captain Burton's works derive their chief value. That officer is a hard-headed practical man, with ample information and no preconceived prejudices, knowing more about the negro race than any other English writer, and perfectly free from that sentimental affection for 'our coloured brethren' which is always most prevalent among those who know least about them. His dissent from the popular views is of more weight, as testimony to the real character of the negro and the real effect of our policy, than ten thousand Abolitionist stories and the declarations of a hundred Exeter Hall philanthropists. And perhaps the most valuable part of his evidence is that which is given indirectly, in the course of a narrative not intended to illustrate the question, but simply to convey a true account of the things he has seen and heard; such as the history of his 'Mission to the King of Dahome.'

Landing at Whydah, the port of this negro realm, Captain Burton travelled, principally in a hammock carried by native bearers, to the capital, which is many days' journey inland. The account of his journey is very clear and interesting; though he met with no perils and few adventures, and the ceremonials of his reception at each town through which he passed were tiresome and monotonous. All that he saw on his journey tended to convince him that the population and power of Dahome have been immensely exaggerated; that she is on the decline, and has within herself no resources whereby to repair the losses she has sustained; and that the conquests made by former kings—their policy lacking altogether any element of conciliation or assimilation—have rather diminished than increased the numbers and the strength of the nation. These impressions were strengthened when he reached Agbome, the capital, and had leisure to form a careful estimate of the forces gathered around the King on the occasion of the Grand Customs. He considers that the famous corps of Amazons does not exceed 2,500 in number; and that only two-thirds of these are really fighting women. The existence of such corps he attributes simply to the fact that among the negro tribes of this part of the coast the women are equal in size and strength to the men, and not unfrequently superior; and his estimate of the real value of the 'fightresses' as he strangely calls them, is very low indeed. Altogether, it seems probable that a brigade of Sikhs or Goorkhas would put to flight the whole Dahoman army, and reduce the country under British rule.

The Customs of Dahome—the practice, that is, of systematic human sacrifice—consist of three distinct kinds. First there are the grand customs, which occur only on the death of a king, when perhaps as many as a thousand lives may be taken in the course of the year. Then there are the annual customs, which involve a much less frightful sacrifice of life, but which are still horrible enough. Finally, it is the practice of the King, whenever he builds a new house, receives a visit from a white man, or has any other matters of interest to communicate to his predecessor, to send a messenger to the shades with the announcement; and Captain Burton supposes that the number of lives taken in the two last ways amount to five hundred annually. He is disposed to apologise for these atrocities on two grounds: first, that the victims are always either criminals or prisoners of war, which can hardly be true of so vast a number, though we may believe that such are always selected by preference; and secondly, that Ashantee, Abbeokuta, and other negro states, excel Dahome in the frequency and cruelty of their murders. It is impossible to read his account of the customs without a thrill of horror and disgust, when we remember that these victims are slaughtered for no earthly purpose except the maintenance of an insane and diabolical superstition, within a couple of hundred miles of European settlements; and reflect that these are the same creatures who, under the mild and kindly rule of white masters, may in two or three generations become happy, contented, useful Christian labourers. That man must be strangely wedded to his prejudices who is not led by the contrast between the life of the negro in Alabama and in Dahome, to ask himself whether there is no screw loose in the anti-slavery creed in which he has been educated; no error in the policy of his country. Can it be right to spend hundreds of thousands of pounds and scores of English lives every year, in order to prevent the subjects of King Gelele from being transferred to Cuba or the Carolinas? In Africa the negro lives the life of a miserable savage; suffering every evil that the brutality of a savage master, the barbarism of a government that reverses every principle of rational and Christian policy, the cruelty of merciless enemies, and the bloody rites of a degrading superstition can inflict; and withal he is the helpless, hopeless slave of his equals in brutality, ignorance and degradation. Are we doing well to strive so hard against his removal to a country where he may enjoy the advantages of civilisation and Christianity; and where, if he be a slave, he will be the slave of a humane and merciful man, who is to him a superior being, and protected by laws which render his life and limbs as sacred as those of his master?

No doubt, even in Captain Burton's volumes, we may discern the fact that many aggravations of the negro's misery arise out of the slave-trade, even apart from the additional horrors created by our endeavours to suppress it. Slave-hunting—wars and forays undertaken for the express purpose of procuring slaves to sell to the white trader—kidnapping, and cruelties only less horrible than those of the murderous customs—are incident to the traffic; and it may be added, that while such a trade exists, all attempts to introduce a more legitimate trade and to promote honest industry on the African coast, will be futile. On the other hand, it seems certain that the negro will never of his own accord abstain from murderous raids on less powerful tribes, from human sacrifices, and from the enslavement of his fellows. If we intend to civilise the negro, and to civilise him in his own country, there is but one way of doing it. We failed in all attempts to abolish the malpractices of Hindoo superstition until we conquered the country, and affixed severe legal penalties to the sacred rites of widow murder and infanticide, of Juggernaut and Meriah sacrifice. If we wish to do likewise by the customs of Dahome and Ashantee, we must use the like measures. We must not send envoys to sit for hours in the sun before Gelele's door, and wait two months for leave to deliver Her Majesty's message: but we must undertake ourselves the government of the country, and govern it on the same principle of beneficent despotism that has marked our rule in India, with that additional stringency of supervision which the vastly inferior intelligence of the African races demands. If we shrink from this task—and it is one from which we well may shrink—it is labour lost to negotiate with barbarian chiefs for the abolition of customs in which they delight, and of a traffic by which they are enriched. The negro will work when he is compelled, and abandon his savage habits only when forced under the influences of civilised masters; and if we are not prepared to apply that compulsion, we may be sure that he will continue to prefer slavehunting to the laborious cultivation of palm-oil, and to delight his eyes with the death-agony of as many fellow-creatures as he can afford to kill.

In his recent attack upon Abbeokuta, undertaken soon after the close of Captain Burton's mission, Gelele sustained a signal defeat; and the power of Dahome received a blow from which it is not likely to recover. The overthrow of this ferocious and aggressive kingdom will no doubt be a blessing to its neighbours; but the barbarism of Abbeokuta is hardly less loathsome than that of Agbome; nor is it likely that the rich territory of Dahome will ever be cultivated by industrious and peaceful labourers while it remains under negro rule. The only real hope for negro races lies in the presence and control of white men; under that control, as in the Southern States of America, they improve to such degree of civilisation as their nature and intellectual capacity permit; without it, as in Africa, they remain in the most miserable bondage and the most loathsome barbarism; removed from it, as in Haiti, they rapidly sink back into their native savagery. It may be doubted whether Africa has gained anything by the substitution of English rule for that of other races, who, if they thought less highly of the negro, expected less from him, and were therefore more patient with his shortcomings. The men of the Southern States alone of all the English race have been successful in the management of Africans.

Captain Burton, in common with almost everyone else who has ever had anything to do with negoes, has no mercy on that theory which supposes them to be simply Caucasian men with dark skins, and supposes colour to be the sole distinction between the slave race and its masters. On the natural and incurable inferiority of the negro to the white man, he dwells as strongly as any Southern physiologist, and warmly accepts the views announced by Dr. Hunt, and so ill received by what he describes as the 'ignorant' party in England. He lashes with just severity the fools who imagine, as many Abolitionists have asserted, that Athanasius, Origen, and Tertullian were negroes, because they lived in Africa (i. e. Egypt and Libya, then settled by Greeks and Italians); and the knaves who instance mulattoes and quadroons as examples of negro intelligence, concealing altogether the fact of their double origin. With similar severity he treats some of the falsehoods lately propagated by itinerant mulatto agents of the Abolitionists. The following remarks point to a source of error that is too generally overlooked in all controversies on this question:—

> The second error is the confusion of the negroid, the Semiticised, or noble African, with the ignoble pure negro. This is a more venial error than the first, because ethnological knowledge is requisite to draw the distinction, but its effects are even worse. The traveller is ever falling into this pit, and the mass of observers is as yet hardly aware of the distinction of the alphabet invented by the Vai or Vahie—a race cognate with the Mandenga and cognisant of the Koran. Commander Forbes remarks: 'How far we must have mistaken the African's constitution.' Mr. Winwood Reade proposes to apply the term 'negro' to the maritime races, and 'African' to those of the interior; but in the central continent there are tribes as purely negro as on the coast. Others would assume 10° N. latitude, and the same line south of the equator as the boundaries of the race: in the interior, however, it crosses both these limits, nor has any frontier been traced by travellers. As I have said, the fetor is the grand discrimen; thus we distinguish the Somali Semite and freeman from his slave neighbour the Kisawahili, and the Asiatic Malagash from the negro Johanna-man, who will call himself an offset from the noble Arabian Kuraysh. By not attending to this distinction between nobles and ignobles, the Moor of Venice has been represented as a 'nigger.' When such men as Toussaint l'Ouverture ('The Opener') are quoted as 'full-blooded blacks,' I must discover, before assenting to that proposition, what was their descent. They might be of Hansa, or other Semiticised blood; and this would be confounding Norman with Saxon. The negroid has taken a long step in the way of progress; for the Arab and the negro, as might be expected, combine better than the European and the black. El Islam, by forbidding impure meats and spirituous liquors, by enjoining ablutions and decent dress, and by discouraging monogamy and polyandry, has improved the African's physique, and through it, by inevitable sequence, his morale. It is a cognate and a congenial civilisation, not one imported from 1,500 miles of latitude, and sitting grotesquely upon the black mind, as the accompanying vestments upon the sable body—both being made contemptible by the contrast of what is and what ought to be. The pure negro does not exist in septentrional or in Southern Africa. North of the Sahara men are more Semitic than Hamitic, and resemble the peoples of Southern Europe more than they do the typical negro. I have elsewhere given reasons for suspecting in the great Kafir family a considerable mixture of Arab, Persian, and other Asiatic blood.

In Captain Burton's works we find more abundant information concerning the various African races than is contained in the writings of any other traveller; combined with a practical sense and contempt for sentimental theories which entitles him to peculiar confidence. It is a pity that the vehemence of his language should occasionally detract from the dignity which befits an impartial witness, and that his attacks on all who differ with him should be so fierce as to provoke a degree of enmity very prejudicial to his influence and usefulness.

THE QUARTERLY AND BRITISH QUARTERLY REVIEWS.

THE Quarterly Review shares the weakness of its contemporaries. The subjects proposed are of moderate interest, and the skill displayed in their treatment is not such as to redeem their character. In point of utility the article on the sanitary state of the army in India is worthy of attention, and the first statistics presented are of a startling nature. In the year 1862, the European army in the Empire of India was 74,500 strong, and of these men 48,000 were in Bengal, 12,000 in Madras, and 14,000 in Bombay. Now, the mortality of men of the soldier's age in the healthy parts of England is such, that on an average eight in every 1,000 die annually. In the British army at home 17 men in every 1,000 die annually. In the British army serving abroad the mortality is about 41 in 1,000. But in India since the first occupation of the country by British troops, the mortality has oscillated round 69 per 1,000. Consequently, in addition to the number of men who might, under ordinary circumstances, be supposed to die in a healthy part of England, 60 men in every 1,000 are lost by causes peculiar to India. One company, therefore, in every regiment, disappears every twenty months. Soldiers leave few children, and the gaps created are filled by new shiploads of recruits. To put the figures in another way, it would be found that 8·6 is the mean period of service; that eleven recruits are required annually to keep up the standard of each hundred men, and that to maintain an army of 85,856 men, 10,000 annual recruits are required. Half of such an army will have served only six years, and but one-fourth will be veterans of ten years' standing. The elements of destruction are fever, dysentery, diseases of the liver, and epidemic cholera—diseases which rage in the sultry plains, but whose violence is mitigated on the more elevated lands. Of course bad ventilation, bad drainage, and unwholesome water create disease everywhere; but India adds a high temperature, and consequent rapid decomposition of matter, to universal mischief. The principal agent of evil is malaria, and malaria is the product of heat, moisture, and vegetable decomposition. It is absorbed by the soil, and is emitted under the influence of rain. At great elevations it disappears with the disappearance of humidity and vegetation; yet an adjacent tract of low country may send up malarious influences to the height of thousands of feet, and render deadly a station which seemed far removed from danger. But the soldier is injured before he ever sets his foot on the empire, for he goes out as a representative of ballast or outward cargo at such a period of the year as to arrive in the sickly season, and he is fed in the most deleterious manner during his voyage. For the future, however, the troops will be sent by the overland route, to the saving of time and the relief of the soldiers. To discover the evil is, in point of fact, to find the remedy; and drainage, ventilation, water supply, and the substitution of cool drinks for spirits are among the natural recommendations of the Commission. The question of arrangements to facilitate marriage among the troops is justly considered of deep importance, and in the absence of these to discover some means of annihilating the results of celibacy. To sum up the matter in the words of the article, good drainage, regulations as to sewage and water supply, hill stations for European troops and invalids, and location of recently-arrived English soldier sin such stations, are the methods of health in India. Such are the main features of the report of the Royal Commission. But great error would exist if the fact was not carefully observed that in 1862 the deaths in the forces in India had sunk to about twenty-five in each 1,000, and that immense exertions have already been made by the authorities.

Workmen's Benefit Societies is a striking comment on the force of cooperation. It is something to be told that the Manchester Unity of Odd Fellows has an income of 350,000*l.* a year, and spends 300,000*l.* in sick relief, that the ancient order of Foresters contains 250,703 members belonging to 3,053 lodges. Next to these two great orders follow the Grand United Order of Odd Fellows with 56,603 members, the Loyal Order of Ancient Shepherds, 40,000, the Order of Ancient Druids, 38,913, the National Independent Order of Odd Fellows, 32,000, and the United Order of Free Gardeners, 18,577. Besides these Societies there are the orders of the Ark, the Rechabites and Templars of Nazareth (Teetotallers), the Sons of the Phœnix, and the Sons of Temperance (both Teetotallers), the Order of the Golden Fleece, the Order of the Peaceful Dove, Knights Templars, Knights of Malta, and the Ancient Order of Buffaloes. There are, also, trades clubs of considerable wealth and importance performing the double function of providing for the sick and securing what are deemed the rights of the members as workpeople as against their employers. The figures given are elaborate and of much interest.

In the way of theology there is an article upon Dr. Newman's 'Apologia,' which at once admits the nobility of the apologist and defends the cause of the Established Church. There is also an article on Dr. W. Smith's 'Dictionary of the Bible.' It is impossible to give an idea in a short space of the exhaustive manner in which the persons and things of Scripture are taught, and the article has no other course itself than to serve up a few prominent topics as themes for quotation. We may, perhaps, be pardoned for an extract of a striking description of the apostle St. Paul:—

> We have no very trustworthy sources of information as to the personal appearance of St. Paul. Those which we have are the early pictures and mosaics described by Mrs. Jameson, and passages from Malalas, Nicephorus, and the apocryphal Acta Pauli et Theclæ (concerning which see also Conybeare and Howson, i. 197). They all agree in ascribing to the Apostle a short stature, a long face with high forehead, an aquiline nose, close and prominent eyebrows. Other characteristics mentioned are baldness, gray eyes, a clear complexion, and a winning expression. Of his temperament and character St. Paul is himself the best painter. His speeches and letters convey to us, as we read them, the truest impressions of those qualities which helped to make him The great Apostle. We perceive the warmth and ardour of his nature, his deeply affectionate disposition, the tenderness of his sense of honour, the courtesy and personal dignity of his bearing, his perfect fearlessness, his heroic endurance; we perceive the rare combination of subtlety, tenacity, and versatility in his intellect; we perceive also a practical wisdom which we should have associated with a cooler temperament, and a tolerance which is seldom united with such impetuous convictions.

There are also articles on Photography, Cochin China, and Cambodia, and on the State papers and MSS. relating to English affairs existing in the archives and collections of Venice and in other libraries of Northern Italy. The value of Mr. Rowden Brown's efforts to provide, by an exposition of the Venetian archives, materials for the history of commerce and diplomacy, cannot be too highly appreciated.

In the British Quarterly we may notice two articles, one on 'William the Conqueror' being a review of Sir P. Palgrave's work, 'The History of Normandy and of England.' Errors taught in childhood are not easily eradicated, but it is pleasant to find a few grand mistakes exposed. Thus, we are no longer to believe in 'the disgraceful battle of Hastings,' seeing that the combatants fought from nine in the morning until sunset, and that the death of Harold did, in fact, decide the struggle; we are not to suppose that William changed the language and laws of England, for it may be remarked that without the cause of conquest the Danish language has undergone more change than the English, whilst customary tenures, and the courts of the burgh and the shire, are living witnesses of the endurance of the Saxon rights. Nor again was a Saxon maiden an object of condescension, but of ambition, as the bride of a Norman. Lastly, the curfew was rung at an hour which to the good Saxon was midnight, and his duty was not to put out fire or light, but to cover it with turf or slow coal. That men should at that hour be within doors was a municipal regulation in the middle ages not disobeyed even by the London 'Prentices.'

'Chevalier's Mexico' deserves attention on the ground that, though to a certain extent obscured by the terrific drama being acted in a more northern latitude, the progress of the new empire is keenly watched by all students of the destiny of the American continent. France looks to Mexico for much in return for benefits conferred her. She requires a merchant marine. She must have commerce. Colonies are, therefore, to her indispensable. Algeria is but a province held under the sword. Mexico, situated equally distant from Europe and Asia, having noble harbours on the two great oceans, combines the advantages of an American colony and an oriental dependence. It commands the isthmus which only waits the skill of the engineer to unite the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific. Mexico is the Switzerland of the tropics, yet its European prototype is but its miniature. Mexico has the climate and the vegetation of all the zones. Cortez found it the cradle of the only civilisation of the new world. Its very ruins raised Spain to the rank of the most wealthy and powerful nation. In spite of most improvident administration, Mexico for four centuries has loaded the coffers of the Old World with its treasures. Mexico needs capital, industry, enterprise, and a regular Government. It has labour and natural wealth. If France supplies the needs of Mexico, she may obtain in return harbours for her ships, sugar, cotton, tobacco, coffee, rice, indigo, cereals, and precious metals for her trade. Mexico will also open to the French what India and the colonies have supplied to England, a field for the abundant energy and ambition of a fiery youth, which, cooped up in France, has only the excitement of war or revolution to satisfy its cravings.

ALABAMA.—The General Assembly of the State of Alabama has passed the following resolutions:—'Whereas, this General Assembly did, on August 29, 1863, adopt the two resolutions following, to wit:—1. Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Alabama in General Assembly convened, that the war now being waged against the people and property of the Confederate States, by the United States, is unprovoked and unjust, and is being conducted by our enemies in utter disregard of the principles which should control and regulate civilised warfare; that our oft-repeated purpose never to submit to abolition rule remains unshaken; that our late reverses, not being attributable to any want of courage or heroic self-sacrifice on the part of our brave armies, should not discourage our people or produce doubts as to the final success; and that we hereby pledge to the cause of independence and perpetual separation from the United States all the resources of the State of Alabama. 2. Be it further resolved, that, in order to insure a speedy triumph of our cause and the firm establishment of our independence, it is the paramount duty of every citizen in the Confederate States to sustain, invigorate, and render effective our gallant armies to the full extent of his ability, by encouraging enlistments, by furnishing subsistence to the families of soldiers at prices corresponding with the means of such families, and by upholding the credit and currency of the Confederate Government; and that to dishearten the people and the soldiers at a period like this, to enfeeble the springs of action and destroy the elasticity requisite to rise superior to the pressure of adverse circumstances, is to strike the most insidious, and yet the most fatal blow at the very life of the Confederacy. And whereas, this General Assembly still entertains the opinions and cherishes the spirit herein expressed, therefore—Be it resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Alabama, in General Assembly convened—1. That the resolutions above copied be and the same are hereby reasserted and readopted, as expressive of the feelings, sentiments, wishes, and determination of this General Assembly at the present time and in the present exigency. 2. That in the military events of last year no case for despondency is found, and that neither patriotism nor wisdom can tolerate any termination of the present war without the maintenance of the independence of the Confederate States.'

SETTLEMENT OF THE MORAL DRAINAGE QUESTION.—Since Australia refuses to allow our convicts to come near her, would Abraham Lincoln take them? As recruits they would constitute food for Confederate powder quite as good as the voluntary refuse employed; and one sure advantage of sending them to fight the battles of the Yankees would be that we should never see them again.—Punch.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

THE appearance of the money market has been favourable the last few days, and it is hoped that the present month will see us out of our difficulties. It is quite clear that the late circumspection has largely reduced outstanding engagements, and that the existing state of things is much healthier than in the beginning of October. Although the Bank quotient is 9 per cent., and the rate in the open market is about 8½ to 8¾, the tone is much better with more encouraging prospects for the future. We may have additional failures—that is very likely from the condition of the produce markets and the advices from abroad. It is nevertheless probable that if the Bank directors shall be able to reduce the rate of discount to 8 per cent. in the course of the next week or fortnight, there would be a strong stimulus to confidence, with a recovery in trade and a rally in prices. How long the Bank court may feel it necessary to keep things in check it is not for us to say; but if the governor and the deputy-governor see their way to an amelioration, the sooner the better. Speculation is quite at a stand in the Stock Exchange. There need be no apprehension about any return to inflation. The public are too full of securities to be led into temptation again, and for the present the company movement has been thoroughly subdued. The supply of money in the open market must go on increasing, because through the absence of confidence the bankers and discount houses are receiving a full accession of deposits.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The market for bullion and specie continues in a very satisfactory state. There is very little specie going out of the Bank, but although the quantity sent in this week has not been large, there is no doubt that it will be greatly increased within the next few days, in consequence of the large arrivals from abroad. The amount of gold sent in has been 121,000*l.*, and the only parcel taken out has been 20,000*l.* for the West Indies. The arrivals of gold amount to 691,877*l.*, of which 406,000*l.* is from the West Indies and Pacific, 128,000*l.* from Melbourne, 143,000*l.* from New York, and 14,877*l.* from Alexandria. In addition to the above, the Magdalena has arrived at Lisbon from the Brazils, and brings 43,039*l.* for this country. In the early part of the week the silver market was very inactive and depressed, and a portion of the Mexican dollars by the packet of last month were sold at 59½*d.* per oz., being a further decline of ⅛*d.* to ¼*d.*, but a demand has since sprung up, the chief enquiry being for Amsterdam, and nearly all the dollars in the market were purchased for Japan at 60¾*d.* per oz., being an advance of 1⅛*d.* The bar silver by the last Mexican packet has been sold at 60⅞*d.* per oz., being an advance of ¼*d.* upon the previous sales.

TENDERS FOR BILLS ON INDIA.

The biddings for 30,00,000 rupees in bills on India took place to-day at the Bank of England. The proportions allotted were—to Calcutta, 27,57,000 rupees; to Bombay, 1,75,000 rupees; and to Madras 68,000 rupees.

The minimum price was, as before, 1*s.* 11¼*d.* per rupee on Calcutta and Madras, and 1*s.* 11½*d.* on Bombay. The applications within the limits amounted to 52 lacs. Tenders on Calcutta and Madras at 1*s.* 11¼*d.* will receive about 51 per cent.; on Bombay at 1*s.* 11½*d.*, in full; all above these prices in full.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The market for American Government and Railway Securities has not been particularly active; but nevertheless a fair amount of business has been transacted. Prices have not materially varied, but quotations were rather firmer at the close. The dealers still refrain from speculating in these securities, and the transactions which take place are chiefly on behalf of Americans. Dealings are recorded in United States of 1882 at 42½, 42¾, and 43; ditto of 1881, at 41½, 41, 43, 42, 42¼, and 42½; ditto of 1874, at 43; Virginia State Six per Cents., at 27; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York Section, 1st mortgage, at 70, 70¼, and 70½; Ditto Pennsylvania Section, 1877, at 70½, 71, and 70; Erie, $100 shares, all paid, at 40, 40½, 40, and 41; Illinois Central, at 72; and ditto, $100 shares, all paid, at 51, 50½, 50¾, 51, 51½, and 51.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market for this security has been quiet all the week, with rather a falling tendency more or less influenced by the conflicting accounts from the seat of war. The closing price is 59 to 60.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

Under the influence of the improved aspect of monetary and commercial affairs, the stock markets, both English and foreign, have continued to present a better appearance. Business has been generally more active, and prices in almost all instances have steadily advanced; but the rise in the English securities has not been so rapid as it was last week, nor to so great an extent, although it has been quite sufficient to prove a more healthy state of things. Foreign stocks have not fluctuated to any great extent, not having been affected by any political rumours of importance from abroad, with the exception of Spanish, which have been prevented attaining a higher quotation through the unsatisfactory state of financial affairs in that country. Consols closed this evening at 89⅝ for money, and 89⅝ to 89½ for the account, which, as compared with this day week, is a rise of ¼ per cent. Exchequer Bills have also further improved, the present price being for the March issue 6s. to 1s. discount, and those of June 14s. to 10s. discount. Greek stock has advanced ⅜ per cent., being up to 22 to 22½; Mexican are 26¾ to 27, being a rise of ½ per cent.; Spanish Passives are up ¼, and the Certificates ⅛ per cent., the prices respectively being 31 to 31½ and 14 to 14¼. Turkish Six per Cents. of 1854 have improved ½ per cent., and those of 1860 to 1½ per cent., the quotation for the former being 89 to 90, and for the latter 71½ to 72½.

MERCANTILE SUSPENSIONS.

The following suspensions have been announced since our last number:—Messrs. W. J. Morgan & Co., in the cotton trade, liabilities 80,000*l.*; Messrs. H. C. Smith & Co., Liverpool, in the River Plate trade, liabilities 150,000*l.*; Messrs. John C. Cole & Co., in the Spanish trade, liabilities 100,000*l.*, owing to the failure of Messrs. Hartley of Seville; Messrs. Arthur Hoare & Co., in the woollen trade, liabilities 25,000*l.*; Messrs. Leiske & Co., merchants, of Gracechurch Street, liabilities not yet ascertained. The liabilities of Messrs. De Wolf, Schück & Co. are 100,000*l.*, not 35,000*l.* as stated last week.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

An extraordinary general meeting of the Egyptian Commercial and Trading Company has been held for the purpose of considering the terms of an agreement provisionally made with Messrs. Briggs & Co. of Alexandria, for the acquisition by this company of the goodwill of the commercial business hitherto carried on by that firm, and under the terms of which agreement Mr. Ross, the principal, will become the general manager of the company's affairs in Egypt; and, if the shareholders should approve thereof, to confer on the directors all such powers in reference thereto as the meeting should think proper; to consider the propriety of increasing the capital of the company by the issue of further shares; to consider the propriety of making alterations in the articles of association, so as to provide: firstly, that the ordinary meetings of the council of directors shall be held in London instead of Alexandria; secondly, for altering the constitution of the London and Alexandria boards respectively; and thirdly, for vesting the powers of filling up occasional vacancies in the council in lieu of the respective committees. Special resolutions were passed in accordance with the objects above mentioned.—At the twenty-seventh half-yearly ordinary meeting of the Great Central Gas Company, a dividend was declared of 5 per cent. for the half year, and a further payment of 4½ per cent. on account of dividends in arrear. This would absorb 17,047*l.*, leaving a balance of 1,129*l.* to be carried to the current half year's account.—At the annual meeting of the Queen Insurance Company a dividend was declared of 10 per cent., leaving a revenue fund of 114,312*l.*

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

In the produce trades there have been some indications of improvement, purchases having in many cases been made with more freedom. The revival of business, however, is still slow, and it is only in one or two instances that any decided activity is perceptible. The corn markets have been firm with moderate transactions; prices are regarded as in every way safe, and dealers are showing more disposition to replenish their stocks. The provision markets in general remain without much variation, but the tendency has been rather downwards than otherwise. American butters are more difficult of sale, but fine qualities still range up to 112*s.* The sales of bacon have been trifling and on lower terms—for American short middles, rib in, there is a moderate enquiry at 44*s.* to 45*s.* per cwt. Beef and pork remain out of demand. In sugar the dealings have slightly increased, and prices are the turn higher, but the market is without much animation at the close. Coffee maintains its value firmly so far as Ceylon kinds are concerned, whilst Brazil coffees are still neglected. Public tea sales have been in progress during the last two days, and they show a dull demand at about previous rates. In spices the quarterly sales of cinnamon form the only new feature. The quantity offered was very small, and the result has established an advance of 2*d.* to 3*d.* per lb. on the rates of July last, low to fine ranging from 1*s.* 10*d.* to 3*s.* 2*d.* per lb. Saltpetre sells steadily at 29*s.* per cwt. cash for fine Bengal. A good business has been done in petroleum, and the market is firm for American refined at 2*s.* per gallon. Crude is dull of sale at 16*l.* 10*s.* per tun. The tallow trade is still without activity, and prices are nearly stationary. Linseed oil has further declined to 33*s.* per cwt., but at this price there is more disposition to buy. Fish oils meet very little enquiry. Sperm offers at 64*l.* to 66*l.* per tun. Turpentine has further given way to 59*s.* per cwt. for French. In dyes but little is passing. China galls have, however, advanced, 62*s.* 6*d.* being paid for fine. Bengal turmeric realises 21*s.* 6*d.* to 22*s.* per cwt. Jute is more firm, and the small supplies brought to sale to-day realised 10*s.* to 20*s.* per ton advance. Cotton has been very active; higher rates have again been paid, but the market was barely so good to-day. The next series of colonial wool sales are fixed for the 17th inst., and will offer some 80,000 bales. There is more doing in American tobacco than for some time past, and full rates are paid. A much better feeling prevails in the metal market. Spelter is selling rather freely at 21*l.* to 21*l.* 5*s.*, and Scotch pig-iron has recovered to 50*s.* Copper is still dull, and English offers at 3*l.* to 4*l.* under fixed rates.

Liverpool, Wednesday, November 2.—In consequence of the improved aspect of monetary and commercial affairs generally, our cotton market has assumed a decidedly better appearance during the past week. The transactions have greatly increased, large purchases having almost daily been made by speculators and importers, besides considerable parcels having been taken by the trade. Prices have also advanced for almost all descriptions, and the market closed this afternoon with increased firmness. The sales this week have reached 84,000 bales, of which 36,000 were on speculation and for export. The total sales this year down to the present date have been 2,149,104 bales; and to the same period in 1863, 2,273,516 bales. There have been imported this year 1,879,362 bales; whilst last year the number was 1,318,671 bales. The trade have taken this year 1,298,310 bales; same in 1863, 1,146,592 bales. The total exports have been this year 470,718 bales, and to the same period last year 398,214 bales. There have been taken on speculation this year 374,958 bales, and in 1863 673,394 bales. The estimated stocks at the present time are 397,718 bales, and at the same period last year they were 163,818 bales. The closing quotations this afternoon were:—American descriptions. 21¾*d.* to 25¼*d.*; Pernambuco, 22½*d.* to 24½*d.*; Maceio, 23¾*d.* to 24*d.*; Bahia, 24*d.* to 24¼*d.*; Egyptian, 14¼*d.* to 28*d.*; Smyrna, 14*d.* to 15¼*d.*; Surat. 10¼*d.* to 19½*d.*; Bengal, 10½*d.* to 11½*d.*; Scinde, 10¼*d.* to 11½*d.*; China, 13½*d.* to 14½*d.*; and Peruvian, 22¼*d.* to 23¼*d.*

The markets at Manchester have generally an improved tone, but business is considerably restricted through buyers and sellers not seeming inclined to meet each other's wishes as regards prices. In shipping yarns there has been but very little doing, in consequence of the high prices demanded by spinners. It is understood that had they consented to accept a slight advance on last week's rates, buyers were prepared to give some extensive orders. The market, however, closed firm. In home trade yarns there has been a much better market, and prices have further advanced, but it has to a certain extent checked business. Fine yarns are rather dearer than they were last week, and generally there has been an advance of from 2*d.* to 3*d.* per lb. within the last week or ten days. The cloth market has become very buoyant, and prices have been gradually advancing from day to day. There has been a more general disposition to transact business on the part of both merchants and agents, and the circle of buyers has largely increased. More confidence is exhibited amongst all parties, and the market shows greater stability than for some time past. Manufacturers, in consequence of the state of the Liverpool cotton market, have greatly advanced their prices; but in most cases the advance has prevented the amount of business being done which might otherwise have been recorded. Annexed are the latest quotations:—⅞ Grey Printers, 6*s.* 6*d.* to 13*s.* 3*d.*, according to quality and weight; ⅞ Grey Madapollams, 5*s.* 9*d.* to 8*s.* 9*d.*; ⅞ Grey Printers, 8*s.* 9*d.* to 15*s.* 9*d.*; ¾ Grey Shirtings, 10*s.* 3*d.* to 22*s.*; Water Twist, No. 20, 1*s.* 6*d.* to 2*s.*; No. 30, 1*s.* 10*d.* to 2*s.* 4*d.*; No. 40, 1*s.* 4*d.* to 2*s.* 9½*d.*; Mule Twist, No. 20, 1*s.* 2½*d.* to 1*s.* 10*d.*; No. 30, 1*s.* 6*d.* to 2*s.* 1*d.*; No. 40, 1*s.* 8*d.* to 2*s.* 3*d.*; No. 50, 1*s.* 11*d.* to 2*s.* 6*d.*; No. 60, 2*s.* 2*d.* to 2*s.* 8*d.*; No. 70, 2*s.* 5*d.* to 2*s.* 11*d.*; No. 80, 2*s.* 7*d.* to 3*s.* 1*d.*; No. 90, 2*s.* 9*d.* to 3*s.* 3*d.*; and No. 100, 3*s.* to 3*s.* 7*d.*

THERE are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17 Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24 Rue Lord Byron.

AMERICA.

IN a supplement to the current number of THE INDEX, we print the official report of Lieutenant-Commanding C. M. Morris, the commander of the Confederate States steamer Florida, upon the seizure of that vessel by the enemy in the neutral port of Bahia; also the official correspondence on the same subject between the Consul of the United States and the authorities of the outraged country, a Brazilian newspaper account of the affair, and some further interesting particulars.

'GRANT'S repulse on the 27th was more serious than was at first reported. He lost 1,500 killed and wounded. Butler's losses were still heavier.' So say the advices per City of Washington. On Thursday, the 27th ult., the Butcher, as his men style him, made a 'reconnaissance in force' along the whole line, but he found no point unguarded in the Confederate lines, and was finally driven back with severe loss. This is the Federal version of this latest 'reconnaissance in force,' but when the Southern accounts come to hand it will be found that the so-called reconnaissance was a serious attempt to carry the Confederate lines. Of course the exigencies of the political situation particularly forbid the publication of any serious disaster to the Federal arms.

What at first appeared to be a reverse to the army of General Early, later and more authentic accounts prove to have been a decided victory. The force which Sheridan proclaimed broken up, though far inferior in numbers, attacked and routed the Federal army, driving it in disorder for several miles, capturing guns, wagons, stores, ambulances, camp equipages, &c., pausing in its career of victory only when the foe sought shelter behind his entrenchments. If General Early failed to reap all the fruits of his victory, it is not so very surprising when we consider the great numerical superiority of his antagonist and Early's entire lack of cavalry, while Sheridan has the largest and best body of horse in the Federal service. The wholly unreliable character of the Federal commander's despatch is apparent from the fact of his announcing the utter rout of Early, his arriving at Newmarket without an organised regiment, &c., whereas he brought off the field and safely landed in Newmarket 1,300 Federal prisoners. Our latest advices state that Early is again about to assume the offensive. His cavalry occupy Fisher's Hill.

It is rather difficult to learn the exact position of affairs in the West and South-west. Price is reported retreating into Arkansas after having suffered a reverse, while it is also asserted that a considerable body of his forces have crossed the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad, moving northwards. General Price may be retiring from Missouri, but there is as yet no authentic account of his having been forced to retreat, or indeed of any serious engagement between him and the Federal army.

In Georgia and Tennessee the movements of the two hostile armies become more interesting and important each day. General Beauregard has assumed supreme command of the Confederate forces in Georgia, Tennessee, Kentucky, Alabama, Mississippi, and East Louisiana. His first effort will doubtless be to rid Georgia of Sherman's army, and, from his recognised ability as a soldier, his great devotion to the cause of the South, the prestige of success which belongs to his history, and the unchecked scope of his authority within his department, we may reasonably expect to learn very soon that he has plucked from the Federal commander all the fruits of his bloody, wearisome, and costly campaign from Chattanooga to Atlanta. Already we have rumours of Sherman having evacuated Atlanta. There is at least a certainty that he has left that city with the main body of his army for the purpose of protecting his communications. But the railways are already broken, and though the line between Atlanta and Dalton may be repaired, to secure the several lines running to Chattanooga, Sherman must have followed Hood into North Alabama, perhaps into Tennessee, and forced him to battle under circumstances rather disadvantageous to the Federal arms. Beauregard is bringing forward reinforcements to Hood from the contiguous States, and the prospect seems fair for something like an equality of numbers between the Federal and Confederate armies of the West in the next contest. Forrest, too, is up and doing, threatening Columbus and Paducah, Kentucky; while a large body of cavalry from South-western Virginia has also invaded the same State. Large guerilla bands are also said to be operating on the Tennessee and Kentucky border and threatening the Nashville and Louisville railway. From this it will be seen that Sherman is very thoroughly cut off from the Ohio River, his true base.

PRESIDENT DAVIS had returned to Richmond, at our latest advices from that capital, from his tour in the Southern States. It is known to our readers that at Macon, Augusta, and other points of his journey, he addressed popular assemblages upon the exciting questions of the day; but from the versions of his speeches given in the press it was easy to see that the reporters had presented them in their own manner rather than that of the President, which has been so generally admired for its severity and composure. At Columbia, South Carolina, the President was more fortunate in his reporter, and his remarks to the citizens of that town on October 4, as given in the South Carolinian, are marked by all the characteristic excellences of his style. After expressing the satisfaction it afforded him to meet the people of South Carolina in the capital of their State, and to receive their plaudits for his official conduct, without which he might have feared that he had not discharged his duty to the country, Mr. Davis declared that he was confident that no son of their soil longed for the fleshpots of Egypt, or would consent to any measures looking to a reconstruction of the Union. The Confederate Government had made every honourable effort to avoid a collision of arms in the first place, and to secure since a settlement of the strife based upon the recognition of its independence. But all its efforts had failed. A passport had been refused to Vice-President Stephens when he sought to go to Washington on a mission of peace. Foreign intervention had proved an ignis fatuus. There remained but one hope of gaining freedom and peace, and this lay in uniting with energy and determination to fight the battles and achieve the victories which should teach the world that the Confederate people could defend their rights, and the Yankee nation that it was death to invade them. It was no time, said the President, to ask whether the law exempted one from the army, or to take out a writ of habeas corpus for the protection of legal personal rights. No man was too old, and no boy too young, if he had the physical capacity, to enter the ranks of the army. In the days of the Revolution the youth of the country rushed with eagerness to arms, nor laid them aside until the independence of the country had been accomplished, and the youth of Carolina were not degenerate sons of their Revolutionary sires. Indeed, they had proved themselves on more numerous and bloodier fields worthy of the memories of the past, and there were fewer who were lukewarm in the cause now than existed in the Revolutionary period. It was said that a plan of negotiation had been offered for consideration, and it was expected by some that the war might be ended through the intervention of the States. It was not easy to see upon what terms the States could negotiate. They had no constitutional power to do so. Mr. Lincoln had also declared that he would not negotiate with them unless they could control the army, and they could only obtain the power to control the army by traitorously entering into a treaty contrary to the Government they had instituted. But, admitting that this were possible, the only terms which the insolent enemy would be willing to concede were the acknowledgment of the crime of rebellion, submission to their authority, the emancipation of the slaves, and the surrender of the leaders, as they called the President himself, to be punished, when the Southern people would be permitted to vote, together with their negroes, according to the pleasure of Mr. Lincoln. If there was a man within the sound of his voice who could think of such a proposition, Mr. Davis pitied him from the bottom of his heart. The President referred hopefully to the condition of military affairs and the reasonable expectation all might entertain that Generals Beauregard and Hood would soon redeem Northern Georgia; he avowed himself the disciple of Calhoun, and the undeviating defender of the great principle of State sovereignty; and he paid a glowing compliment to the heroism and devotion of Southern women. The President expressed, in conclusion, a pathetic desire that he might live to see the final triumph of the Southern cause, and said:—'Prayerful for your welfare, confiding in the armies of the Confederacy to do that which soft words can never achieve, and in the hope that God will preserve the little ones of all brave men who are in the field or who are going to it, and trusting that in the future, under brighter auspices, it may be my fortune to meet the good people of Columbia, I wish you all, for the present, farewell.'

AMONG the countless atrocities committed on land and sea by the agents of the Federal Government, none has been more remarkable for savage brutality and cowardice than the murder of the crew of the Night Hawk by a boat's crew from the blockading fleet off Wilmington. The Night Hawk had run aground near Fort Fisher in an attempt to get into the Cape Fear River, and while she lay thus stranded she was boarded by twenty-five or thirty men from one of the Yankee vessels, who began at once, to the horror and consternation of all on board, slashing with their cutlasses and firing their revolvers, with the cry of 'No quarter!' The Night Hawk was an unarmed vessel, engaged in an enterprise purely commercial, and her officers and men were utterly without the power of making any resistance to the sudden attack thus so wantonly made upon them. In the darkness of the night, expecting no such murderous visitation, they fell helpless victims to the fury of their assailants. About sixty persons were on board the Night Hawk at the time she struck upon the breakers, of whom one-third had gone off in the boats to land before the Yankees came alongside, but for which the loss of life might have been greater than it was. The two engineers of the vessel were instantly killed; one had his head cloven through by the stroke of a cutlass, while several other persons were wounded by pistol-shots. This occurred on the night of September 30. The Yankees, after having accomplished their massacre, fired the vessel and then took to their boats in precipitation, as a rocket had been thrown up at Fort Fisher, and they feared the guns of that Confederate fortification might imperil their safe return to the fleet. The Night Hawk, in seeking to run the blockade, was fairly forfeit to the Yankee cruisers could they succeed in intercepting her, but it is a new and most abhorrent doctrine of international law, known only to the nation which attacks vessels in neutral ports, that the crews of blockade-runners may be slaughtered on their decks like pirates. To strike down unarmed and unresisting men is a work worthy of the Yankees; if these men happen to be Englishmen, the matter must be deplored, but it is idle to imagine that any reclamation will be made upon the United States in consequence. The powers of the earth would seem to consent that the United States should be left free to commit what outrages it will with impunity. With regard to this Night Hawk assassination, well indeed may the correspondent of the Times, to whom we are indebted for the details we have given of it, enquire of the English reader whether he is 'able to discern any difference between the conduct of this Yankee boat crew and that of the inhuman fiends who man the piratical craft which issue from th island of Formosa, and assail becalmed and defenceless commercial vessels in the Chinese seas.'

The citizens of Halifax, Nova Scotia, not less than the friends of the Confederacy everywhere, have been mortified at the curt civilities shown by Admiral Hope, commanding Her Majesty's fleet in American waters, to the Confederate steamer Tallahassee on her recent visit to that port. This vessel had barely appeared in the harbour when she was notified that she must sail within twenty-four hours, and would be allowed to lay in only 100 tons of coal; in consequence she was compelled to return immediately to Wilmington. The law of England in respect of belligerent ships of war appearing in her harbours must be enforced, it appears, rigidly against the Confederates, while it remains a dead letter against their enemies. It is notorious that the whole circumference of the island of Great Britain is patrolled by Federal steamers watching for Confederate prizes, and that these cruisers have again and again been received with hospitality in British ports. The Niagara remained several days in Liverpool waiting to intercept the Georgia. The Iroquois and the Kearsage were allowed to coal at any port they might choose to enter. The case of the Sacramento, which steamer was allowed to coal not less than three times at shorter periods than the law permitted, was so flagrant a departure from good faith, that even Earl Russell in his letter to the Board of Trade admitted the evasion of the regulations, and was constrained to act in the matter. It was but a short time ago that as many as four Federal vessels of war were in British waters, exhibiting upon every occasion an insolence which it is amazing has not been resented. The Sacramento dared even to pick up a Spanish vessel having on board the Spanish mails, under pretence of her being a Confederate privateer. While such is the temper of the Government at home, we may not wonder that British naval officers on colonial stations should be chary of their good offices towards Confederate vessels.

Lieutenant-General R. H. Anderson has been permanently assigned to the command of the corps lately commanded by General Beauregard, and Lieutenant-General Dick Taylor has been assigned to the command of the troops lately under Lieutenant-General Hardee.

The New York World makes an interesting and valuable summary of the loss which the North has sustained in the products of Southern labour contributed to the general economy before the war. The estimates are based upon the census returns of 1860. Besides the entire cotton crop, valued at two hundred and eight millions of dollars within a small fraction, it would appear that the Southern States produced one-fifteenth of the total crop of barley; one-tenth of the total crops of Irish potatoes, and of clover and hay; one-eighth of the total crop of orchards; one-fourth of the total crop of wool; one-third of the total crops of wheat, and of sorghum; one-half of the total crops of Indian corn, of hemp, of honey, and beeswax, and of animals slaughtered; three-fourths of the total crop of tobacco and of the articles included in home-made manufactures; four-fifths of the total crops of sweet potatoes and of peas and beans, and all the cane, sugar, and rice that was grown in the whole country.

Additional news from the Confederacy has unhappily confirmed the report, copied in this paper last week from the Wilmington Journal, of the drowning of Mrs. Rose O'Neal Greenhow, who was a passenger in the steamer Condor, on the first voyage of that vessel from a foreign port into Wilmington, North Carolina. The circumstances were exceedingly sad. As detailed by the careful correspondent of the Times, the Condor struck upon a reef under the guns of Fort Fisher, through the blundering of the pilot, after having safely eluded the blockading fleet, and Mrs. Greenhow, against the remonstrances of the captain, determined to attempt a landing in an open boat rather than run the hazard of again falling prisoner into the hands of the enemy. A boat was accordingly lowered, into which Mrs. Greenhow, the Hon. James P. Holcombe, who was returning from Halifax to the Confederacy, and one of the ship's officers descended, but, the sea running high at the time, the boat had no sooner left the side of the steamer than it was upset by an angry wave. All the other occupants but Mrs. Greenhow succeeded in clinging to the boat and were washed ashore. She alone was missing of the little party that braved the perilous venture. In the darkness of the night and in the fury of the elements no assistance could be afforded to the unfortunate lady. Her body was subsequently recovered, and was buried in Wilmington according to the ceremonies of the Roman Catholic faith. The news of her death created a very painful impression in Richmond, where she had many friends, and she will be lamented and remembered as one who rendered important services to the Confederate cause, and adhered to it through good and evil report.

A valuable life was spared to the country in the happy escape of Mr. Holcombe from the fearful danger in which he was placed.

The yellow fever, brought in by vessels running the blockade in the absence of proper quarantine regulations, has been prevailing to a painful extent both in Charleston and Wilmington. The enemy availed themselves of its appearance in the former city to reopen the bombardment from their batteries on Morris Island with great fury, so that the citizens who yet remained at their homes might be rendered as wretched as possible. The pestilence was thus welcomed as an ally by the besiegers. The mortality does not seem, however, to have been as great as in former years, and the early frosts of the autumnal season have probably already stopped its ravages.

The venerable mother of General John C. Breckinridge, of the Confederate Army, died at the house of the Rev. Dr. Bullock, in Baltimore, on October 8.

The following extract from Mr. Purdy's report will furnish a good test of the state of pauperism in the unions of the cotton district. The figures are, of course, confined to the legal relief:—

The maximum amount of pauperism in these unions during the distress was attained in the first week of December 1862, when the total number relieved by the guardians was 274,860.

The minimum was touched in the fourth week of August last, when the number of paupers was returned as	78,730

Total in receipt of relief from the poor-rates	106,490

Able-bodied Paupers.—The total number of adults on the relief lists of the 28 unions last week was 28,450, which is 1,011 more than shown by the previous statement.

Outdoor Relief.—The total sum expended in these unions last week was 6,475*l.* This amount is 1,554*l.* less than the sum disbursed in the corresponding period of 1863, and 281*l.* more than that of the week immediately preceding the last.

The convict Franz Müller, since his confinement in Newgate, has maintained a constant reserve with regard to the murder of Mr. Briggs. To his lawyer and a clergyman, a friend with whom he corresponds, he protests that he is innocent of the crime and was convicted on false evidence, the Repsch family being his enemies. His whole demeanour betokens quietness of mind, and it is thought that his satisfaction is caused by the knowledge that his countrymen in England are making every effort to obtain the reprieve of his sentence. He is studious still, as he has always been. On Monday, the 7th inst., the German Legal Protection Society presented a memorial on his behalf to Sir George Grey, the Home Secretary. The petition is long and diffuse; some of the suggestions thrown out in favour of the prisoner are rather startling. The memorial states, first, the accusation against Müller with regard to the chain and hat, the finding of the hat in the railway carriage, and the exchange of the chain at Death's in Cheapside, comprising the whole of the evidence. On his side the Society first advance his youth, steadiness in work, and humanity and gentleness of character, his repeated mention of his intention to go to America, and that he had been lame since July 7. He had, they say, enough money to pay his passage out before the 9th, and was at work that entire day, and was at the house of his sweetheart (Eldred) until 9.35 or 9.40 that evening. Mr. Briggs's train left Fenchurch Street at 9.50, allowing only ten or fifteen minutes for Müller to travel from Camberwell to Fenchurch Street—an impossibility. The remembrance of the omnibus conductor of his gouty passenger from Camberwell one evening in last summer, supposed to be Müller, his physical incapacity to turn a large man like Briggs out of the railway carriage without a coadjutor, and Mr. Lee's evidence of seeing two men in the carriage, are also brought to bear on the question. The chain, it is said, was bought of a pedlar at the docks, particularly described by Muller. A pedlar of such an appearance was missed from the docks when the police were first on search for the murderer. Would Muller, it is asked, if the murderer, have exchanged the chain at all or given the box to Matthews's child for a toy? As to the hat, Walker admits that he sells three or four dozen such hats in a week, and that the lining should be used only for Müller's and Matthews's hats seems to the Society almost incredible; other hat-makers or hat-menders being, they think, probably provided with the like pattern. Matthews cannot tell the fate of his hat. Why should Muller be a better prophet? An old hat sold into Petticoat Lane may be worn by any thief or murderer. Is the original holder accountable for its future? Muller's own hat, supposed to be the cut-down hat of Mr. Briggs, he states to have been purchased at Digance's in the middle of May; he describes the salesman, and mentions that the Repsches saw him cut it down. Digance refused to show his day-book to the prisoner's friends. Since the trial of Muller, a witness unknown declares that on the night of the murder he saw a man covered with blood, apparently stunned or drunk, about 100 yards from the place where Mr. Briggs's body was discovered. This individual, the Society infers, was one of the men Mr. Lee saw, and the companion of the person who, at the Hackney Wick station, swore at the porters, and was in such a hurry to leave the platform after the tickets for the passengers in the train were taken. It is also now stated that about 2 A.M. on July 10, from a cab passing down the Edmonton Road on its way from London, was thrown a pair of trousers at the window of a Mr. Poole, who immediately pursued the cab. Coming up with it after a chase, he discovered four men in the cab, one without his hat, his head being bound with a handkerchief; all the men bore an appearance of considerable disorder. Apologising to Mr. Poole, they drove on. The trousers, which were given into the possession of the Society, were stained with blood ascertained to be human. John Bennett, of Ponder's End, a place lower on the line of country, speaks of a labourer observing one of these men throw his hat into a pond, and reiterate's Lee's assurance that the men he saw in the railway carriage were both totally unlike the prisoner Müller. The memorial terminates by saying that Müller was condemned by public opinion before his arrival in England, comparing his case to that of Dr. Smethurst; and confidently hopes that if a respite is granted a like result may follow. There is not the smallest probability of the memorial having any weight with the Home Secretary, as it is clear that the judges at the trial considered the evidence as conclusive.

M. Berryer, the eloquent French advocate, arrived in London on Saturday as the guest of Lord Brougham. The Duke of Wellington, Lord Clanricarde, Sir Fitzroy Kelly, and other persons of rank, dined with Lord Brougham and his guest on that day. On Sunday, Sir F. Kelly was the host, and the luminaries of the law mustered in strong force, Lord St. Leonards, Lord Justice Knight Bruce, the Lord Chief Baron, and Vice-Chancellor Sir J. Stuart, being present. On Monday M. Berryer was present at the opening session of the Jurisprudence and Law Amendment Department of the Social Science Association. On Tuesday he appeared in the Court of Queen's Bench at Westminster, and was received with marks of high distinction by the Judges and the Bar.

On Tuesday night a grand banquet was held in the hall of the Honourable Society of the Middle Temple, at which M. Berryer was the guest, and the Bar of England the hosts. More than 400 persons sat down to dinner. The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer) was in the chair; on his right and left were M. Berryer and M. Desmarest, Lords Brougham and Kingsdown, the Lord Chief Justice of England (Sir Alexander Cockburn), the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord Justice Knight Bruce, two Vice-Chancellors, six Puisne Judges, Sir Hugh Cairns, M.P., the Solicitor-General, many Queen's counsel, serjeants-at-law, and members of the Utter Bar. After the health of the Queen and Royal Family had been given, the chairman gave the toast of His Majesty the Emperor of the French. Then the health of M. Berryer was given, and received with loud applause. The distinguished advocate replied in French, remarking on the relations of mutual respect and amity existing between the judges and barristers of England, on the fact that in France revolutions tended to place the bar outside of political influence, and to constitute it the asylum of those who refused to change their principles. Then followed the health of M. Desmarest and the Bar of France, of Lord Brougham, of the Judges of England, with the name of Sir Alexander Cockburn. That distinguished Judge said that in his eyes the crowning virtue of M. Berryer was that he had throughout his career conducted his cases with untarnished honour. The arms which an advocate wielded he ought to use as a warrior, and not as an assassin. He ought to uphold the interests of his clients per fas, but not per nefas. He ought to know how to reconcile the interests of his client with the eternal interests of truth and justice. M. Berryer had never forgotten the honour of the advocate, and for that the Chief Justice respected him as much as for the eminent talents which had cast so much lustre on his name and profession. The Houses of Lords and Commons formed the next toast, Lord Kingsdown responding for the one and Mr. Gladstone for the other. The festivities were prolonged to a late hour.

Louis Wasloushi, cook and steward to the good ship Conflict, summoned the skipper for wages in arrear, agreed on at the rate of 8*l.* 5*s.* per month, before the magistrates of Liverpool. The point at issue was the value of the American dollar, and the skipper made a tender on a calculation of 100 per cent. premium. The Justices ordered payment in full value, and refused to take cognisance of the present price of gold at New York.

The Royal Mail steamship Jura, one of the Quebec and Montreal Ocean Steam Navigation Company's line, was wrecked on Thursday last on one of the sandbanks at the entrance of the River Mersey. She had been boarded by a Liverpool pilot outside the Bell Buoy at midnight, and crossed the bar at flood tide at one in the morning. Near the Formby light ship the vessel got out of the channel and struck on the 'Crosby Spit' midway between Crosby and Waterloo. Her bows became firmly imbedded in the sand, while her stern hung in deep water. Steam tugs came alongside, and her passengers, mails, specie, and a large portion of her cargo were got out and conveyed ashore. At 6.20 A.M. she parted amidships, and thereby all hope of saving her was at an end. No lives were lost.

The new Lord Mayor of London, according to immemorial custom, went in procession yesterday from Guildhall to Westminster to be presented to the Barons of the Exchequer. In the evening he presided at a grand banquet in Guildhall. M. Berryer was present.

Viscount Amberley, the eldest son of the Right Hon. Earl Russell, K.G., was married on Tuesday last to the Hon. Katharine Stanley, daughter of Lord Stanley of Alderley.

The Prince and Princess of Wales arrived at Marlborough House on Monday from the Continent.

Mr. John Leech was buried on Friday last in Kensal Green, in a grave close to that of Mr. Thackeray. The pall-bearers were Mr. Mark Lemon, Mr. Shirley Brooks, Mr. Tom Taylor, Mr. J. E. Millais, R.A., Mr. Horace Mayhew, Mr. F. M. Evans, Mr. John Tenniel, Mr. S. Lucas, Mr. F. C. Burnand, and Mr. Henry Silver.

IRELAND.

Mr. Simms by his will bequeathed 500*l.* to two Roman Catholic clergymen to be applied for 'the maintenance and education of two priests of the Order of St. Dominick.' The residuary legatee holding that the Order was an illegal society, and that the bequest was null and void under 10 George IV. c. 7, filed a bill in Chancery, and the case came before the Master of the Rolls. The membership in the order was admitted. It was contended by the counsel for the legatees that the statute only struck at members coming into monastic orders subsequent to the passing of the Act, and further, in case of failure on that point, that by virtue of the cy près doctrine power was vested in the court to apply the legacy to that charitable purpose which was at once within the law and most nearly approximated to the wishes of the testator. His Honour held the bequest to be illegal, but ordered the same to be carried out cy près under the sign manual. In the course of his judgment His Honour expressed an opinion that the cy près doctrine in charitable uses was contrary to common sense. Formerly great injustice was involved in the doctrine, for during the existence of the penal laws a bequest for the maintenance of Roman Catholic priests might be applied to the maintenance of the clergymen of the Established Church. Now the legacy might without injustice be used for the education of two secular priests. The Act 10 George IV. c.7 enacted, among other things, that every Jesuit and every member of any other religious order, community, or society of the Church of Rome bound by monastic or religious vows should, within six months after the commencement of the Act, deliver under a penalty, to the clerk of the peace for the county or borough, a notice in the form therein set out; that any Jesuit or member of any such religious order coming into the realm should be guilty of a misdemeanour and be banished for life from the United Kingdom. There are also clauses against admissions of persons into the orders.

INDIA.

A frightful hurricane burst over Calcutta on the morning of October 5. The whole shipping of the port were driven from their moorings over to the Howrah side of the river, where they lay huddled together with mast-yards and hulls locked and crossed in great confusion. The Loochoo Azemia, the Lady Franklin, the Lady Rawlinson, the Vespasian, the Ville de St. Denis, and the Govindpore were totally lost. Three hundred ships were more or less damaged. The mischief on shore was frightful. The roads were completely blocked with fallen trees and ruins of houses. The gale lasted from 10 A.M. to 4.30 P.M.

A telegram, dated September 27, had been received by the Governor of Bombay from the director of the Persian telegraph, from Teheran, which occupied only sixteen hours and twenty-one minutes in its transmission from the Persian capital to Dapooree, announcing the completion of the telegraph from Bushire to Teheran. The line to Bagdad would, it was expected, be completed in a few days from the above date; but it could not be opened until the dispute between the Turks and Persians regarding the frontier has been decided. Messages can now be sent from Bushire to Shiraz, Ispahan, and Teheran, and to all parts of India, by the submarine telegraph through Kurrachee.

There are great complaints in all the cotton districts of deficiency in the rain-fall, and the supplies will be much inferior to those of last year.

The force destined to operate against the Bhootanese is 10,000 strong. There will be only two batteries and one regiment and a half of European infantry; the remainder of the force consisting of Goorkhas and Bengal Native Infantry.

THE CONTINENT.

FRANCE.

Fortunately for the French journalists, circumstances of engrossing interest have occurred this week in other countries which have preserved their papers from death by inanition. Of these the most important are the wrangling which still goes on, and has at length ascended to the very highest quarters, on the true meaning of the Franco-Italian Convention; the scandals concerning the Presidential election, and the apocryphal war news from America; the treaty of peace between Germany and Denmark; and the trial of Dr. Demme and Madame Trümpi in Switzerland. Of home news there is none worth mentioning. The cities which have been honoured by the passing visit of the Emperor have acknowledged the compliment in the usual spirit of profuse loyalty, which is only distinguished from other manifestations of the same sort by being exceptionally sincere. The Court goes to Compiègne on the 7th inst., where the Emperor will entertain the customary series of visitors. As to the Public Works Fund of which we spoke last week, it appears that M. Fould, the Finance Minister, is not inclined to satisfy the expensiveness of M. Beluc, the Minister for Public Works. That gentleman proposes to set the capital of the fund at 750,000,000 francs. M. Fould, who very likely sees an objection to the locking-up of so much capital in the present juncture of affairs, holds out for 300,000,000. The natural way of coming to an agreement is to split the difference and take 450,000,000, and this is probably the decision which has been arrived at.

ITALY.

We have already often said, that whatever the Franco-Italian Convention ought to mean, according to the wishes of the various parties interested in it, the French Government alone can tell us what it does mean. That oracle has at last spoken, and in no dubious language. Chevalier Nigra, Italian Ambassador in Paris, in his despatch of September 15, communicating to his own Government the conclusion of the Convention, gave them to understand that, although Italy had promised to use no material force against the Pontifical State, it would still be lawful to employ 'moral means' to complete the unity of Italy. He further asserted that the French Government neither had nor could have any intention of extinguishing the 'national aspirations' towards Rome. This, though of course only an ex parte statement, was of great assistance in satisfying the tender patriotism of those Italians who would hear of no fresh obstacle between themselves and Rome. The truth of this gloss upon the treaty was vehemently attacked and as vehemently defended both in France and Italy. The French Ministry alone kept up an ominous silence. At length, on the 30th ult., M. Drouyn de Lhuys sent a despatch to M. de Malaret, French Ambassador at Turin, in which, after accounting for his long silence by his desire not to embarrass the Italian Government in their communications with their Parliament, he uses these words, which may be considered as one of the most perfect specimens of a flat contradiction 'veiled in allegory':—

> I have felt bound to avow to M. Nigra that, if I did not raise any doubt as to the perfect sincerity of his intentions, or even as to the accuracy of the facts stated in his report, I was unable, nevertheless, to conceal my opinion that the document in question does not reproduce, in a complete manner, the physiognomy of the negotiations or the sense which we attach, and which the Italian Government itself must attach, to the engagements which resulted therefrom.

He then goes on to say, with sufficient firmness, that no hopes whatever may be built on the 'national aspirations,' or on the 'moral means' through which they are to be satisfied. The King of Italy has promised not to go to Rome, and this promise must be understood literally, without any arrière pensée of 'national aspirations' or 'moral means.' As for the possibility of a spontaneous revolution in Rome, this is not provided for by the Convention. 'For that eventuality France reserves her liberty of action.' M. Drouyn de Lhuys accounts for the absence of these explanations in the body of the Convention by saying that the admission of them would have been an insult to the Italian Ministry—a pretty plain hint that any action on the part of Italy contrary to the spirit of these explanations would be considered by France as a dirty trick. A second despatch, dated the 2nd inst., states that, in order to put an end to all misunderstandings, M. Drouyn de Lhuys and the Chevalier Nigra had exchanged explanations in the presence of the Emperor himself, at the conclusion of which Signor Nigra had declared his views to be in complete accordance with those of the French Government. A despatch from the Chevalier Nigra to his own Government, dated the 30th ult., informs them of the explanations which had passed between himself and the French Minister (prior, of course, to those given in the presence of the Emperor); the tenor of the whole letter is a confession that he has been obliged to eat his words, although he concludes by declaring that he maintains his former despatch in its integrity. As for the 'national aspirations,' he declares their object to be only a reconciliation between Italy and the Papacy upon the principle of a free Church in a free State. Thus France has a second time checked the hopes of the party of progress in Italy. If we look for the reason of this course, it appears to be simply this: that the French Government have with great prudence allowed the temper of the French people to display itself before compromising themselves in any way; they have discovered that the clerical party is very strong, and the ultra-French party, which is jealous of all further Italian aggrandisement, is numerous, if not respectable; they have seen that while there are some who on really conscientious principles object to a possible dethronement of the Pope, there are others who write and think in this fashion: 'While Spain threatens our rear, England, Belgium, and Holland our front, Germany, Austria, and Russia our flanks, Italy means to aim at our legs, and drive a bayonet into our stomach, the only part which, up to this time, we had thought was protected. The coalition against France is increased by one member.' (Progrès de Paris, November 6.) Without indorsing any such notions, the Government was obliged to take account of them. It has consequently been necessary to calm the religious fears of the one and the physical terror of the other, by contradicting the Italian hypothesis in the manner in which M. Drouyn de Lhuys has so effectually done it. Next as to the meaning of the French action. This is unmistakable; the weaker must go to the wall. Where the vital interests of the French empire are at stake, those of the Italian Government must consent, if need be, to be sacrificed. The necessity for this sacrifice is very possible; nay, it might have been highly probable, were it not for the great discredit in which the party of progress is at present in consequence of the revolutionary disturbances which it has excited in Venetia. The extreme delicacy of the position in which the Italian Ministry are now placed will be understood when reference is made to the discussion of the Convention in the Italian Parliament on the 3rd inst. Signor Petrucelli asked whether Signor Nigra's despatch was a genuine account of the state of affairs. The Minister, Signor Lanza, stated that it was not becoming to throw doubt upon a solemn diplomatic act from simple assertions of newspapers. The Minister continued: 'The note of Chevalier Nigra is true, and substantiated in every particular. It is also recognised as such by the two contracting parties.' Thus the Italian Government has committed itself to the truthfulness of a document which the French Government contradict and repudiate. The committee upon the bill for the transfer of the capital to Florence has been more prudent in its report, although even they are more sanguine in their hopes than is authorised by M. Drouyn de Lhuys' despatch. They think the Convention does not satisfy, but paves the way for the satisfaction of, the national aspirations. They assert boldly that the principle of non-intervention with regard to Rome will be carried out loyally, but at the same time they consider that any declaration of principle would be both mischievous and useless. With these observations, they recommend that the bill should be adopted as proposed by the Government. On Monday, the discussion of the Convention was renewed, with the help of the new light thrown upon it by the late despatches. General della Marmora stood manfully to his previous statements, and positively confirmed Signor Nigra's despatch of September 15. He had on the same day (the 7th instant) addressed a communication to Signor Nigra, regretting that M. Drouyn de Lhuys should have thought it necessary to allude to secret dealings, and the possibility of the Italians having recourse to them. The despatch further said that, while the two countries may have differences of opinion on the consequences of the Convention, no discussion ought to take place after Italy has promised in no case to violate the treaty. It concluded by reserving for Italy the same liberty of action which France has claimed for herself in the event of a spontaneous revolution in Rome.

So much for the Convention. With regard to the financial question, Signor Sella has made some very interesting statements. First, as to the compensation to be paid to the municipality of Turin, in consideration of the debt which that city has incurred while capital: it is fixed at a yearly payment of 1,067,000 francs, upwards of 40,000*l*. The Supreme Court of Appeal is also to be removed from Milan to Turin. To meet this expense, as well as the other necessary outgoings consequent on a change of capital, M. Sella proposes to reduce the national expenditure by 60,000,000 francs, 42,000,000 of which are to come from the military and naval departments; and to increase the taxation by about 40,000,000, to be charged on tobacco, salt, and other articles of common use. These reductions and augmentations will, of course, benefit the budget of 1865; but in the meantime the Government has pressing need of 200,000,000 francs, to cover the deficit of the year now closing. To meet this it is proposed to sell or mortgage Crown property to the value of 40,000,000 francs, and to anticipate the land-tax of next year to the tune of 124,000,000 francs; add to these sums 36,000,000 francs in Treasury bonds, and the sum of 200,000,000 francs is complete. In accordance with this scheme, the Crown lands have been mortgaged to the Crédit Mobilier and other credit institutions.

It is asserted that the Minister of Public Works has entered into negotiations with the British Government for the purpose of establishing a new Indian postal service by means of special trains on the Susa and Brindisi lines as soon as the Brindisi lines shall have been finished.

The Roman police authorities have taken two very important steps. They have burnt all the documents relating to political trials preserved in the archives of the Tribunal of the Sacred College, a step which looks very much like that of putting one's house in order before leaving it; and they have resolved to transform all the troops of the line in the Pontifical army into gendarmes; this is a move in the direction of the Franco-Italian Convention. Soldiers are used to repel the attacks of foreigners, gendarmes to repress the violence of citizens; therefore, when Cardinal Antonelli changes the whole Pontifical army into gendarmes, he means that the States of the Church are now secure from foreign invasion, but more than ever subject to insurrections at home.

The Opinione of Turin denounces the existence, in several towns in the centre of the country and on the coast, of offices for enlisting volunteers for the United States of America. The recruiting agents are said to have caused desertions in the Italian army.

SWITZERLAND.

The trial of Dr. Demme and Madame Trümpi on the capital charge of having poisoned M. Trümpi has been brought to a close. The evidence produced was at least as consistent with the opinion that M. Trümpi had committed suicide as with the suspicion of murder. The medical experts, with one exception, confined themselves to the proof of the fact that the poison had been taken voluntarily, and not by accident. The question whether it had been administered to the deceased by his own hands or by those of others was left to the jury. On this point a curious demand was made by one of the counsel: he desired to prove that the bitterness of strychnine was so great that it was impossible for ten grains of that poison to have been given without causing an attack of vomiting; he therefore required that the jury should themselves taste and report on it. With horror-struck faces the jury declined to make the trial. At last the foreman, with a deep sense of his responsibility, consented to experimentalise in this novel line of tasting, only requiring the physicians present to measure the dose given to him with extreme accuracy, and to take every possible precaution to neutralise its effects. Such a Curtius-like devotion to the cause of justice is worthy of a world's admiration. We are happy to say that he was not called upon to carry out his resolve. The one exception to the fairness of the medical evidence was in the case of Dr. Emmert. This gentleman was known to be a personal enemy of Dr. Demme, and his wife was strongly suspected of having written certain anonymous letters, which chiefly led to this trial. His report travelled out of the regular path of medical evidence to assert the guilt of Dr. Demme. He had collected and commented upon all the testimony against him. Even when under examination in court he persisted in the same course, quarrelling with the counsel, and even bandying words with the prisoner in his anxiety to procure a conviction. His conduct was a disgrace to the medical profession, and was received as such by the crowds of students who had assembled to hear the case; he was at last called to order and silenced by the judge, who found it difficult to repress the storm of indignation with which the audience received the evidence. The evident animus of this important witness told greatly in favour of the prisoners; and when it was found that M. Trümpi had allowed his affairs to become involved, that he had often openly spoken of committing suicide, and that he had bought strychnine from more than one person shortly before his death, the jury could scarcely, consistently with their oaths, have brought in any other verdict than that of 'Not Guilty.' Dr. Demme's suspicious conduct is explained to some extent by the supposition that he was cognisant of the suicide, and was desirous, for the sake of his friendship with the deceased and his family, to conceal it. In addition to the verdict of 'Not Guilty,' the jury awarded damages to Madame Trümpi, whose reason, it is feared, will be permanently affected by this terrible episode in her life.

DENMARK.

The text of the treaty of peace has been published. The only points in it which we need notice, in addition to those mentioned last week, are—Art. 8. The portion of the National Debt of Denmark with which the three Duchies are chargeable is fixed at 29,000,000 rigsdalers

(3,187,500*l.*), and Austria and Prussia guarantee that the same shall be paid to Denmark either in cash or in new State bonds. Art. 12. The Duchies shall pay the expenses of the war to Austria and Prussia. Art. 13. The vessels and cargoes captured on either side during the war shall be mutually restored, or their owners indemnified; a valuation shall be made of the contributions levied in Jutland during the war, which shall be set off against the compensation due from Denmark for captured shipping. The accounts shall be made up in three months from this time if possible. No mention is made of the 8,500,000 thalers which were reported to have been exacted from Denmark as the share of the public property fairly belonging to the Duchies; it is only stipulated that Denmark should repay into the Treasury of the Duchies all deposits or trust funds which she may hold of theirs. The Rigsraad of Denmark was opened on the 5th inst.; the speech from the throne deplored the unhappy result of the war, but hoped that the Rigsraad would resign itself to the late heavy misfortunes. The King promised shortly to submit to the House a bill for making the necessary changes in the constitution. The treaty of peace was then laid on the table of the House, and was discussed privately on the same evening: the public discussions will take place on two days during the present week. The Folksthing (Lower House) has approved of the proposal made by the Government to indict M. de Bille, late Danish plenipotentiary, member of the Rigsraad, and editor of Dagbladet, for high treason on account of the article published by him, and maintaining that by the peace of Vienna the present King loses his rights to the throne in favour of a prince of the house of Hesse. The punishment for high treason in Denmark is not so severe as it is in England. Instead of being hanged, drawn, and quartered, he will, if found guilty, be fined and imprisoned. Several mistakes have been made with regard to this prosecution. It was originally stated that M. de Bille had applied to the Rigsraad to prosecute the editor of Dagbladet. However, the editor is none but M. de Bille himself, who has indulged himself in this insignificant impertinence against the King of Denmark for no reason apparently except that he had identified himself with the war party in Denmark now out of office.

It is said that, immediately upon the conclusion of the treaty of peace, the King of Prussia telegraphed to General von Falkenstein, the commander of the army of occupation in Jutland, to suspend the execution of some of his late decrees pressing upon the province over which he is ruling. The General, who appears to be an adept in the art of torture, could not even perform the act of clemency dictated to him by his sovereign in any but the most ungracious fashion. He published a manifesto to the effect ordered, and concluded it with a threat that, if the Rigsraad of Copenhagen did not ratify the treaty with all speed, all the obnoxious ordinances would be put in force again with aggravation.

GERMANY.

The Danes may grumble about the hardness of the treaty of peace; but, after all, the Duchies are the real sufferers. They thought once that the war was to be for them entirely a case of 'Heads, I win; tails, you lose;' if the Germans were successful, they would gain their coveted liberty; if the Germans were beaten, it would not be their loss. The glorious vision of a substantive existence within the German Federation is somewhat clouded by the snug little nest-egg of a national debt which has been laid up for them—3,187,500*l.* to be paid down to Denmark; the expenses of the war to be reimbursed to Austria and Prussia; and an annual charge of 75,000*l.* for pensions to officials transferred from the books of the Danish exchequer to their own. And even if their patriotism is sufficient to make them overlook the money question, there is the grievous fact that they have as yet no sovereign, and apparently no immediate chance of getting one, even from the hands of their liberators. As far as their financial affairs are concerned, the Duchies have a sum of 120,000*l.* in hand, as they have had neither civil list nor military expenses to pay during the past year. The budget calculates on the meeting of the Diet of Slesvig-Holstein in March 1865, and has prudently put down 4,000*l.* as the probable expense of the session. This is apparently meant only as a sort of pledge to Germany of their determination to meet and decide on their own destiny; but it is scarcely likely that they will be allowed to do so. The official Prussian journal has informed the Diet that it is time for their army of occupation to leave the Duchies. 'Hanover and Saxony must settle the matter with the other minor States; that is not Prussia's business. All she requires is that they should relieve the country of their presence as speedily as possible.' It has been already stated that Austria and Prussia propose to call a jury of lawyers nominated by the six largest Powers in Germany to decide on the succession question; the Diet on the other hand wishing to have the appointment of this jury itself. The latter plan is, of course, favoured by the small States of Germany, and it was hoped that Herr von Mensdorf, the new foreign minister for Austria, would inaugurate his new policy by yielding in this matter to the wishes of the Diet. A semi-official journal of Berlin, however, asserts that no such change in the policy of Austria will take place, and that the two countries have exchanged the most satisfactory assurances on this subject. The Grand Duke of Oldenburg has submitted his memorial claiming the sovereignty of the Duchies to the Diet; that of the Duke of Augustenburg is already in their hands: it does not appear that the question is at all nearer to a solution in consequence; both memorials have been referred to that singular Slesvig-Holstein committee, which must be a body with the best digestion in Europe; it absorbs the most terrific number of diplomatic documents, in return for which it produces absolutely nothing. The substitution of Herr von Mensdorf for Herr von Rechberg is expected to have a most beneficial influence on the kingdom of Hungary. The late Minister, whether rightly or wrongly, was supposed to represent the party of reaction, and Herr von Schmerling always used him as the money-lender does that invisible partner of his, whenever the Hungarians applied for any reform—'Nothing would give me greater pleasure, personally; but, unfortunately, I am not omnipotent; and my partner is a very hard man—nothing to be got out of him.' This answer, to which the Hungarians had become quite used, must now be laid on the shelf; some real reforms are urgently demanded of the new Minister. There is some difficulty arising from the nature of the Reichsrath, which is summoned to meet on the 12th instant; it is the Full Reichsrath, the representative of the whole empire, which generally has enough to do in the discussion of the budget; the question of the proposed reforms in the Sclavo-German possessions of Austria must be decided in a Lesser Reichsrath, which has received no orders to assemble. However, it is expected that the Hungarian Diet (again another and perfectly distinct body) will be convoked, and such alterations made in the constitution of the country as will bring about a reconciliation with the Imperial Government. To facilitate this twenty new prefects have been appointed, all of them men of merit, and not members of the aristocracy; they are all ex officio members of the House of Magnates, which, it is hoped, will form the nucleus of an efficient Government party. The experiment of convoking the Diet was tried four years ago with but little success; the Germans were too patronising and the Magyars too excitable to work well together. Perhaps a little more humility on the one side and rationality on the other will lead to a better result.

The Prince and Princess of Wales followed the route which we traced out last week with fidelity; they were consequently very near Hesse Darmstadt on the 1st inst., when the confinement of the Princess Alice of Hesse took place. Prince Louis is rather disappointed that his second child is again a girl. The good-natured condolences and prophecies of his friends, both English and German, are somewhat comical in their homeliness. The Prince and Princess spent one night at Brussels on their way home, entertained by the Duc and Duchesse de Brabant as representatives of the King. They left Antwerp in the Osborne on the 6th inst., and were received at Woolwich at 2.30 P.M. on Tuesday the 7th, after their succession of most successful visits, whether we consider them from a social or from a political point of view.

The Czar of Muscovy, better known, perhaps, as the Emperor of Russia, passed through Berlin on the 1st inst. He dined with the King at Potsdam, visited the ballet at Berlin, went out shooting at Letzlinger, and on the 5th inst. started homeward for St. Petersburg, where he will stay for the winter.

GREECE.

The well-timed manifesto of the king has had the best effect upon the national assembly at Greece, which terminated its discussion upon the Constitution on the 4th inst., and adopted the draft of it on the following day. There are still some recalcitrants, who will probably refuse to sign the Constitution; but when once it becomes formally the law of the land, when the present assembly is dissolved, and a new, and let us hope, more manageable one elected in its stead, the factious opposition of a Republican or unprincipled minority need not be regarded.

RUSSIA.

It is amusing to watch the anxiety with which the French and Russian journals reciprocally disclaim all political significance in the late Imperial meeting at Nice. 'We warn our Government,' says La France, 'to avoid any attempt at a more intimate alliance with Russia. We want no more alliances, but must preserve at any cost our liberty of action.' L'Invalide Russe reproduces the whole article, and concludes by assuring La France that a more intimate alliance between the two countries is as little to the taste of Russia as of France, and that Russia also means to preserve her liberty of action—an exchange of amenities between two great European Powers, which proves them to be, in one respect at least, fully qualified to practise in a British Court of Bankruptcy.

TURKEY.

The budget for 1864-5 shows a revenue of 14,571,238*l.*, being a surplus of nearly 200,000*l.* over the calculated expenditure. This margin, though seemingly small, is equal to the surplus of nearly 1,000,000*l.* in the British revenue of 70,000,000*l.* The expenses for the ensuing year show an increase over that now closing, which is acounted for by the increase in the public debt, and the Circassian immigration. A reduction in the army and navy expenses of 37,758*l.* will be made. The cotton crop has suffered severely from the late rains, and it is calculated that sixty per cent. of it is spoiled or lost.

The authorities at Constantinople have begun to ship off some of their Circassian refugees to the provinces. On the 7th ultimo three ship-loads of them were received at Cyprus. The wretched people seem to have suffered as much in Turkish hands as in those of the Russians. They started 2,700 in number, of whom 1,344 only arrived. They appear to have died off by hundreds from want of water, and many others were washed ashore who had evidently been thrown overboard alive. They were not landed without much opposition from the Cypriote authorities; and when at last they were lodged in the lazaret, they died off by thirty and forty every day. The Western Powers, and particularly the English, who have experience in the packing of emigrant ships, ought surely to give advice and active assistance in such a matter as this, which the most timid Minister on earth could not construe into the much-dreaded 'breach of the privilege of non-intervention.'

SPAIN.

Do Spanish politicians ever read history? or, if that is too much to ask of them, do they ever read the libretti of the operas which they perhaps sometimes take the trouble to attend? If so, they may have read of one Gessler, a pompous and tyrannical bully who put his hat on the top of a pole, and ordered all men to salute it on pain of death; and they may further have read how Wilhelm Tell, a Swiss peasant, declined to do obeisance to the hat of any man, much more to that of an old vapourer like Gessler; and how Gessler was turned out of the place, hat and all, by the said Tell and his friends, to be an eternal warning to all arrogant but decrepid blusterers who are not satisfied with civility, but demand servility. If they have not read this little tale, as it is set to music by Rossini, we commend it to their notice before they again fire on a British ship. It appears that the Spaniards have erected a battery at Ceuta opposite to Gibraltar, and have given out that every ship coming within gun-shot distance of the battery shall hoist her flag. The English merchant ship Mermaid happened to pass without complying with these absurd and obsolete orders; straightway without the warning of a blank cartridge or even a shot fired across her bows, she is fired into by the battery and sunk, her crew with difficulty escaping. We have not heard what complaints have been made by our Government of this outrageous impertinence; 'of course,' it is said, the Spaniards will pay up a proper compensation, but that will evidently depend on the tone in which compensation is asked for. The Politica of the 4th inst. states that Señor Pareja is the bearer of an ultimatum to Peru, demanding from the Peruvian Government prompt and full satisfaction, and that, if he does not obtain it, the Spanish squadron is at once to take possession of the principal ports of the Republic and to destroy its fleet.

The insurgents in Santo Domingo are still said to be treating for peace, but doubts have been thrown upon the truth of this statement by a correspondent of the Standard, who asserts that the only negotiations going on are some in which the Spaniards have offered to the Dominicans to evacuate the island on being reimbursed the expenses of the war—a condition which the insurgents are apparently in no great hurry to accept. If this be true, it is evident that the Government of the island considers itself certain of victory, if not already victorious; otherwise an offer to evacuate the island would scarcely have been refused, however hard the conditions.

MEXICO.

The capture of Matamoras has been an immense success for the Imperial Government. Admiral Bosse, in his despatch describing the operations which brought about the submission of the Juarist General Cortinas and the surrender of the city, says: 'Eighty vessels of all nations are at this moment in the roads awaiting our permission to begin their commercial operations; the Custom House will make a good thing out of them. Already, in anticipation of the renewal of trade, a convoy of 500,000 piastres has been sent to Monterey, and is only waiting until the roads shall be officially declared safe to be brought on to Matamoras.' Vidaurri, the late chief of the province of Nueva Leon, has given in his adhesion to the Empire. It is said that the Emperor Maximilian has written to Napoleon, stating that the task of setting in order the chaos of Mexican finance is almost superhuman. He requests his brother Emperor to lend him some experienced financier to assist in getting affairs into better order. We do not hear any person named as the probable choice of the French Government; perhaps, when they have found their prize financier, they may be tempted to keep him 'for home consumption.'

MR. LINCOLN'S WAY.—We clip the following from a New York paper:—Mr. Jeremiah Burke, residing at 49 North Fifth Street, Brooklyn, a blacksmith, working in the boiler-maker's department, in the Brooklyn Navy Yard, for ten months past, makes the subjoined statement: On October 13, he, with fifty-four others, working in that department, was informed by Mr. Maxson, master mechanic of the boiler-maker's department, that he was to be turned over to the Naval Constructor's department. The following morning, with his fellow workmen, he appeared in the yard to be mustered in his new department, but was not mustered. A committee was appointed to wait upon Mr. Davidson, assistant naval constructor, to ascertain the reason for the non-muster. Mr. Davidson, after half an hour's delay, called into his office all the workmen, singly, and propounded the following questions:—First, 'Are you a Union man?' All answered in the affirmative. Second, 'Do you belong to the Loyal League?' To which two only of the fifty-five answered that they were members. Before propounding the third question, he stated that he had a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, in which he asserted that any man who voted for M'Clellan, or advocated his election, was a traitor, and disloyal to the Government, and could not be employed on any public works. Burke replied that he had served the country two years in iron-clads during the present war, and the question of his political preferment had never before been asked; that he was not a traitor, but a loyal man, and he should vote for whom he pleased. Mr. Davidson then replied that he could dispense with his services, and he was discharged from the yard at once. The two members of the Union League were the only ones who were restored to employment, and are now at work in the iron-clad shop.

GARIBALDI ON THE AMERICAN QUESTION.—'To the Editor of the Star. Sir,—A statement has recently gone round to the effect that Garibaldi had expressed pro-Southern views. The Index printed it under the title of "A Recantation." When reading it first, the thought struck me at once that my friend M'Tear, of Glasgow, for whom Garibaldi entertains feelings of the highest esteem, must have misunderstood him, owing to the conversation being held in English, in which Garibaldi does not express himself fluently. I have now received from Caprera a letter intended for publication, of which I enclose a translation for your influential paper, and I remain, sir, yours obediently, KARL BLIND.'—(Translation.)—'Caprera, October 30.—My Dear Blind,—M'Tear must have misunderstood my English. My opinion on the American question is well known. Not only do I hope from it the abolition of slavery, but I consider the question to be one affecting all mankind, and woe to the world if the North did not come out victorious from this struggle! I thank you for your good news. With cordial greeting to Mrs. Blind and to our friends, believe me, for ever, yours affectionately, G. GARIBALDI.'—Star, November 9.

LETTER FROM WASHINGTON.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

[We desire to draw the attention of our readers to the following letter. It is the first published of a series which we have every reason to think will prove of utility and interest. The writer has peculiar opportunities of learning the course of military operations, and his statements will, we believe, be characterised by impartiality and truth.]

Washington: October 21, 1864.

Being at the headquarters of information in the North, I propose to write you, at the end of each week, a condensed and, so far as it is possible, an impartial account of the week's progress of our sad American war. The materials will be drawn from both Northern and Southern sources, and the sole endeavour of this correspondence will be to extract the truth from the immense mass of despatches and letters which in both North and South contain the history of the conflict.

Seldom since the war began have Federal prospects been so gloomy. In the Shenandoah Valley after a series of reverses there has been a slight Federal success, which is magnified by official despatches into a victory, but everywhere else the South has achieved most marked success. The contest in the Valley is the most important of this week's events. Longstreet superseded Early in command of the Confederate forces there some two weeks since. At that time Sheridan with the Federal army was at Harrisonburg. Sheridan at once began to retreat. He withdrew to Strasburg, and on October 10 was encamped there. Strasburg is fifteen miles south-west of Winchester. East from Strasburg runs the Manassas Gap railroad to Alexandria on the Potomac. Thirty miles east of Strasburg on this railroad is Rectortown, and north-west from Rectortown a turnpike runs across the mountain ridges to Winchester. The Federal authorities, thinking that Sheridan's barbarous destruction of everything valuable in the Valley would prevent any more Confederate advances, ordered him to detach a large portion of his command to reinforce Grant. These troops were sent from Strasburg through Manassas Gap to Alexandria. The trains were fired into by guerillas, and many soldiers were killed, but they reached Alexandria, and some were embarked on the Potomac for Grant's camp. Sheridan, on October 13, was in Washington. The guerilla raids on the railroad were so fierce, however, that east of Rectortown for a half-mile on each side of the line the woods were cut down to obliterate their hiding-places. West of Rectortown, however, this could not be done; the woodcutters were driven off, and a train seldom passed from or to Strasburg. At Rectortown fortifications were built, and General Augur placed there with a strong force—a sort of outpost among guerillas.

The withdrawal of the troops to reinforce Grant was a fatal mistake. As soon as Longstreet discovered it he resumed the offensive. He came northward from Harrisonburg, with the cavalry in advance, having continuous skirmishes with the Federal rear-guards. In all but one of these he was successful, capturing prisoners and stores. In that one he lost nine guns and some wagons, his cavalry having in their impetuosity pursued the Federal troops too far and been ambuscaded. The Federal outposts all retreated, however, and on October 12 there was not a regiment south of Strasburg. Longstreet seized Fisher's Hill, the celebrated stronghold just south of the town, and encamped there. Sheridan, in Washington, heard of these rapid advances, and recalled the troops sent to reinforce Grant. Augur, from Rectortown, telegraphed him that guerillas cut all communication with Strasburg, and, on October 13, Sheridan, with his troops at Washington, started for Harper's Ferry, to get into the Valley by that route. The blow soon came, however. On October 13, Longstreet attacked the Federal troops in Strasburg and drove them out. He captured a large amount of stores and 800 prisoners, and the remnant of the command retreated to some earthworks on the north side of Cedar Creek, about four miles north of Strasburg. From Fisher's Hill as a base Longstreet then began a flank movement. He moved a strong column east to Front Royal, destroyed the Manassas Gap railroad there, and at once cut off all communication between Augur at Rectortown and the Federal post on Cedar Creek. Sheridan, on October 14, was at Harper's Ferry, and on the 15th at Martinsburg. On the 16th and 17th his troops from Alexandria were arriving at Winchester. Longstreet completely destroyed the railroad from Strasburg almost to Rectortown, and then his column started northward. On the 18th, Sheridan came down to Winchester, and, getting a slight inkling of Longstreet's movement, ordered the post on Cedar Creek to be given up and the troops to withdraw to Winchester. On the night of the 18th, when the retreat began, Longstreet's column was north-west of Cedar Creek. At dawn on the 19th, when the retreat had scarcely commenced, a Confederate column marched between Winchester and the outpost on the Creek; then turning southward met the advance of the retreating Federal column at Middletown, eight miles from Winchester. A battle began. At the same time a Confederate force from Strasburg crossed Cedar Creek, and attacked them from the south. Attacked in front and rear, the Federal troops were soon defeated. Their organisation was broken up, and they fled in confusion. Twenty-four cannon, many hundred prisoners, and large numbers of wagons and stores fell into the hands of the Confederates. The rout was complete, and the Confederates withdrew towards Fisher's Hill with their booty.

Sheridan came on the field with his troops from Winchester just as this affair was over. He attacked the rear of the Confederates as they were retreating southward. They fought him, but rapidly withdrew across Cedar Creek and into Strasburg. Sheridan's attacks became more and more heavy, and Strasburg was given up, the Confederates retreating to Fisher's Hill. In Strasburg, the Federal troops found a large number of artillery—Sheridan says fifty pieces—including among them some of the Federal guns taken in the morning. The pursuit halted at Strasburg, and the Confederates reached Fisher's Hill without further contests. The retreat had been stubbornly contested, and about 1,600 Confederate prisoners were taken. Some abandoned wagons and ambulances also fell into Sheridan's hands. The artillery captured were guns stowed away in Strasburg, many of them having previously been taken from Federal troops. In the various contests the Federal army lost 2,000 killed and wounded, and 3,000 prisoners. The Confederates lost 1,600 prisoners; their other casualties are not known. The Confederate General Ramseur was captured, and has since died from his wounds. The Federal General Bidwell was killed, and Wright and Ricketts, two corps commanders, were wounded. Sheridan lost heavily in officers, and evidently had the worst of the contest.

The Confederates did not halt at Fisher's Hill, but retreated south of it. Sheridan withdrew his main body to the old camp on Cedar Creek, and on the morning of the 20th sent a reconnaissance to Fisher's Hill which discovered that the enemy were gone. If Longstreet again advances, this party will fall back to Cedar Creek. After all this bloodletting we find the two armies in their old positions in the Valley. Sheridan's loss of 5,000 has done him no good. He cannot reinforce Grant now, and General Lee, who I have no doubt directed the movement in the Valley, has prevented an attack on Petersburg. The common report is, that all the armies were to have moved forward to-day, October 21. Grant on the north side of the James was to have made an effort to capture Chapin's Bluff. I scarcely think he will do anything now, though at last accounts he was evidently moving his forces to the north bank of the river. There was also to have been a naval attack upon Wilmington, North Carolina. The Baltimore people say that 107 Federal vessels, concentrating for some time past at Fortress Monroe, have sailed to attack Wilmington.

The movement of the Confederates in Sherman's rear is still enveloped in great mystery. It can be traced plainly for a certain distance, and then, just when the Confederate column reaches a point where news of its progress could, if the authorities chose, be telegraphed to us in the North, all information ceases. Beauregard is with Hood. He commands the Southern column. From Marietta up to Tunnel Hill, a distance of over seventy miles, the Atlanta supply railroad has been destroyed. All the bridges and culverts have been burned, the rails torn up, and in many places the ditches have been filled and the embankments broken down. The ruin has been complete. At least fifty out of the seventy miles will have to be rebuilt, and in an enemy's country, surrounded by guerillas, months will be required for the working parties to repair the road. Sherman, with three-fourths of his army, has been brought back to Chattanooga. At Atlanta there are about 20,000 Federal troops well fortified. If the Confederates can spare any force to threaten Atlanta, they could seriously endanger it. When last heard from, Hood with his forces had gone westward from Dalton to Fayetteville, a town on the road to Bridgeport where the railroad from Nashville to Chattanooga crosses the Tennessee River. Sherman's army was at Ship's Gap, eight miles east of Fayetteville. Sherman's last despatch states that Hood had left Fayetteville as if he were returning southward. General Wheeler is with Hood. General Forrest is at Meridian, Mississippi, having successfully eluded all the efforts to capture him or retake any of the prisoners or stores he had captured. In the west all fears of a Federal attempt to advance south of Atlanta are gone. It is extremely doubtful if Sherman can hold his own there. He holds no ground south of Chattanooga but the isolated post at Atlanta. Between Louisville and Chattanooga he has only the line of the railroad. Troops do not venture a mile on either side of it. Guerillas cut it daily, and one half of the railroad trains which pass along are destroyed. It has been over six weeks since a railroad train passed between Chattanooga and Atlanta; and five weeks ago all telegraphic or other communication with Atlanta was broken. We know nothing of what is happening there. Stanton says to-day that the telegraph is working to Atlanta, but that he has received no reports. Stanton must be mistaken. A Southern despatch just received says that the Confederates are within one mile of Atlanta, and they pick off every Federal soldier who ventures outside the works. They look for the fall of Atlanta at any moment. A new Confederate movement has begun. A column has concentrated at Talladega, Alabama, and is now on its way northward towards Huntsville, with the intention of striking at Nashville, which will be unprotected so long as Beauregard keeps Sherman employed. We have not yet heard of this expedition through Northern sources. Sherman's prospects are sad indeed.

At Petersburg everything is quiet. All attempts to reach the South-side railroad, or to capture the works on Chapin's Bluff, on the north bank of the James, appear to be given up. Terry and Kantz, who made the last attempt on Chapin's Bluff, were most wofully beaten. The truth is just coming out. They lost nearly 500 men, and retreated in confusion. Butler and Meade have a great quarrel, and Grant is unable to move. Three cabinet officers—Seward, Stanton, and Fessenden—have been down to the camp, trying to smooth the ruffled tempers and urge an advance, in view of the exigencies of the Presidential election. Petersburg is still safe, and juts out like a cape into the Federal camp. Grant has but 75,000 men, and if he contemplated any movement in view of the election, Sheridan's failure to reinforce him must have caused it to be given up. Grant's extended line of nearly forty miles, from the Weldon railroad away around to Chapin's Farm, is a long line to guard. The Dutch Gap canal slowly progresses, and it is now given out that no movement against Lee will be made until it is completed. Grant wishes to make up in gunboats for the weakness of his army.

In Missouri, General Price continues his march steadily but slowly westward towards the Kansas border. He follows a series of roads which run about twenty miles south of the Missouri river. His advance is now at the Blackwater river, just west of Sedalia, a town which he captured about four days ago. The point where he has struck the Blackwater and is about crossing it, is thirty miles east of the Kansas line. There is no force of Federal troops in front of him, and his march is therefore unobstructed. General Curtis has gathered all the troops he can find, and is now at Kansas City, on the Missouri, six miles east of the State line, and thirty miles northward of Price's post on the Blackwater. Curtis is labouring hard at fortifications. In North Missouri the guerillas control everything. Nine-tenths of Missouri is now in Confederate hands. Rosecrans, the Federal commander, is like one paralysed. He can do nothing and attempts nothing. Price's invasion is a most important diversion in favour of Hood.

Virginia will be Free at all Events.—The Richmond Enquirer says: 'We should be glad to see the Confederate Congress provide for the purchase of 250,000 negroes, present them with their freedom and the privilege of remaining in the States, and arm, equip, drill, and fight them. We believe that the negroes, identified with us by interest, and fighting for their freedom here, would be faithful and trustworthy soldiers, and under officers who could drill them, could be depended on for much of the ordinary service, and even for the hardest fighting. It is not necessary now to discuss this matter, and may never become so; but neither negroes nor slavery will be permitted to stand in the way of the success of our cause. This war is for national independence on our side, and for the subjugation of whites and the emancipation of negroes on the side of the enemy. If we fail the negroes are nominally free and their masters really slaves. We must, therefore, succeed. Other States may decide for themselves; but Virginia, after exhausting her whites, will fight her blacks through to the last man. She will be free at all costs.'

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

New York: October 25, 1864.

We have now the Confederate accounts of the battle of the 19th in the Shenandoah Valley, which has been made so much of during the past week as one of the greatest victories of the war, raising General Sheridan not only above Cæsar and Napoleon, but even above Sherman and Grant. The election is, however, only two weeks off, and bombast is the prevailing tongue of all parties.

There was undoubtedly a Confederate reverse after a Confederate victory. General Early—not Longstreet, who was not present—attacked Sheridan's camp near Cedar Creek, and surprised and routed three Unicn corps, capturing eighteen pieces of artillery and 1,300 prisoners, which were carried off. The Federals were driven back several miles, when they made a stand behind breastworks at Middleton, and, having a great superiority in cavalry, repulsed the Confederates, who were compelled to retreat. In the retreat they were pursued by the Federal cavalry, and lost in the streets of Strasburg not only the guns they had captured, but a number of their own guns, which had become wedged in with the others, and were left behind. Their net loss of guns abandoned in Strasburg is put by themselves at twenty-three. The army bulletins of the Northern troops reckon their trophies at nearly fifty, which includes the recovery of what they had previously lost. The Confederates maintain that the loss of guns is their only material loss, the loss of men being much less than that of the Federals, and they flatly contradict the reports of demoralisation or despondency in Early's army. Nothing which Sheridan has been able to do in the valley of Virginia has yet advanced him towards the objective point, for which Grant has waited to aid his assault on Richmond. Lynchburg is not reached, and Early's forces still keep employed several corps of the army which Grant wants for operations in the front, and the season is advancing rapidly when it will be too late to carry out these plans, if it were ever practicable.

There is nothing new from the front. The journals are full of alternate rumours that another grand attempt is to be made from some quarter to reach Richmond, and that the quiet which prevails is preparatory to the closing of the campaign, and the deferring of the capture of Richmond to another year.

The state of things with Sherman is a mystery. If you believe the Union telegraphs, Hood has been counter-checked in his flank movements, and been compelled to retreat southward with General Sherman's army in 'hot pursuit.' Whenever I see that phrase in a telegraphic despatch, I get suspicious. It is one of the conventional phrases of sensationalism, and it generally turns out that the army said to be in 'hot' pursuit is engaged in trying to take care of itself, and sometimes is trying to get away from the enemy. The tone of the Confederate press is very confident of the success of Hood's movements, which are said to be bold and dangerous, but with a bright promise of so cutting off Sherman's communications as to force him to evacuate Atlanta and retreat upon Chattanooga, with a good prospect of losing his army. Between these conflicting statements, who can judge of the real condition of affairs? The plea in favour of the better credibility of the Confederate accounts is that they have no Presidential election on hand, in which both sides think it their interest to magnify the achievements of the army in order to set forth, each for its candidate, the superiority of capacity to improve victory for the bringing back of peace; and, besides, the Confederates have a blunt way of speaking out concerning their own disasters, and, instead of disguising the straits of a position, tell it plainly, in order to impress upon their countrymen the need for efforts. The impression here among those who study the incidents of the campaign in Georgia is that General Sherman is in a very critical position.

The other field of battle about which a great interest is felt is in Missouri, in which General Price has a Confederate force of indefinite numbers, but constantly increased by accessions from Missourians friendly to the Southern cause originally, or eager to escape from the cruelties and oppressions of Unionism. Two-thirds of the State are under Confederate sway, and nearly all the rest is given up to the ravages of guerilla bands, composed mostly of desperadoes, deserters from both armies, or vindictive men stung into savage outlawry by bloody persecutions and outrages on themselves and families—the horrid offspring of the ungovernable passions this war has let loose. A Federal letter-writer from Missouri says:—'All accounts from the interior concur in the fact that General Price is securing a very large number of recruits. Almost every able-bodied young man in some of the central counties has been "conscripted." The truth is, that there is no other place of safety for the man who is not a follower of Honest Abe. Every squad of Federal soldiers in the State has been performing the office of judge, jury, and executioner for the last six months. Every township and neighbourhood has its own tale of blood, to say nothing of wholesale robbery, arson, and thieving. These enormities have been committed, if not at the instigation and with the connivance of those in authority, at least without the punishment of the offenders, until no man feels the least security for his person or his property. It would be a miracle, therefore, if Price's army is not doubled, if he remain in the State for six weeks, not by unwilling conscripts, but by men goaded to madness and burning for revenge.' We get no reliable intelligence of the movements of the United States military sent to oppose this force; and certainly no military success can be expected to give quiet to a State in this condition. The last telegraphic reports say, in very indefinite terms, that Price has been encountered in the extreme west of the State, and defeated, and that the Federals are in 'hot' pursuit. But contemporaneous despatches speak of Federal reverses and [retreats, so that the western victories are looked upon as mere electioneering shams. These reports have not affected the gold market. On the contrary, since the announcement of Sheridan's Napoleonic victories and Sherman's defeats of Hood, the quotations for gold have risen from 207 to 217, and, after the report of the repulse of Price, stood at 216½. It is evident that the stories do not get credit.

The proposition in the Richmond Enquirer to arm the negroes of the South, under a new conscription law to be passed at the ensuing session of the Confederate Congress, is very favourably received in the South. It has been asked for by planters in the South-west; and among some captured despatches, published in New Orleans, a letter appears from H. W. Allen, the Confederate Governor of that State, addressed to the Secretary of War, urging the measure, and sending forward tenders by slaveowners of a part of their force. The project was matured, to be presented to the Alabama Legislature last year, but withheld, from considerations of policy, in the then condition of affairs. It was said that the Legislature was ready to adopt it. It is now brought forward by the Richmond journals, in apparent concert with the Confederate Government. It is supported on the ground that slavery is but a secondary question compared to national independence, and that the negroes constitute a fighting force which is but property after all, and property which may be voluntarily given up for the securing of the greater good. They do not shrink from saying that emancipation of slaves, with permission to remain in the State with the donation of lands, would be, under wise legal provisions, a less evil than subjugation by the North, or consent to be at the mercy of Northern majorities.

The subject is under discussion in the press, but can hardly be said to have been so thoroughly examined as to be a measure of received public policy. But the favour with which the suggestion has been received, and the high official auspices under which it is brought forward, show how deeply the passion for total independence from the North has penetrated into the Southern soul, and how utterly exploded now the old suspicion must be, that this was purely a 'slaveholders' rebellion,' simply for the maintenance of slavery and the establishment of a 'slaveholding Confederacy.'

The inhabitants of the devastated portions of Virginia—the blackened waste which Sheridan has made of the flourishing valley of the Shenandoah—are eager to repay these atrocities in kind, and ready to lead their own slaves for vengeance into the valleys of Pennsylvania. The exasperation is natural; but the higher motive will prevail with the Government should they arm their own blacks as an addition to their physical means for repelling invasion and building up independence.

It is now currently stated and believed that a new conscription is to be ordered by the President immediately after the election, with the required notice of fifty days. The drafting will take place some time in January. Previous to the actual drafting, it is stated that Government has it in contemplation to propose several amendments to the law, the most material of which is that no substitutes will be accepted, but every man drafted and physically able must give his personal service. These statements are given in the Democratic journals with great positiveness, but it is by no means certain that they are not exaggerated, with a view of influencing votes. The terror of the next draft is excessive. The last attempt showed the floating material for substitutes to be nearly exhausted, and the burden of paying immense extra bounties was enormous. The cost of the unfinished draft for the last 500,000 men is computed to have been not less than $100,000,000 on individuals and local bounties, &c., in addition to the Government allowances. Yet with all the cost and exertion the drafting was a failure. After allowances for credits on other calls, the whole number realised is certainly not over 100,000 men, and those of very inferior material. Several Administration journals have expressed their belief that a draft of 300.000 men, rigorously enforced, is indispensable to keep the army full, after the discharges of those whose terms of service expire early next year. The severity of the proposed amendments is a matter of inference from the necessities of the case and of the military position, and the Democrats are well disposed to exaggerate them in order to rouse the popular feeling against the Administration. There is no doubt, however, that a draft must be had. The figure is fixed at 300,000. The aggregate of all the calls made since the war commenced will then reach 3,225,000 men.

The Adjutant-General of this State lately published a corrected table of these various calls, and made the aggregate of men (after deduction for all credits, for duplicates, and consolidated calls) actually summoned to the field 2,325,000 men, to which the new call will add 300,000, making the effective numbers for Mr. Seward's little war 2,625,000 men; and General Sherman, who is pretty good authority, says, 'The war is just begun.'

The Presidential struggle is going on with increasing audacity on the part of the Administration party, and increasing exasperation among the Democrats. The October elections gave a victory to the Administration in the three States of Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana. But in Pennsylvania the home vote was decidedly Democratic; the majority is cast the other way by the votes of soldiers in the hospitals and in the field. The opposition papers teem with accusations of unfair practices on the part of officers and agents of Government, in intimidating Democratic soldiers, and obstructing their voting, and cheating or forcing them into voting for the Lincoln tickets. The Republican votes returned are to the Democratic vote as more than three to one. The opponents of Mr. Lincoln are provided with the material for accusing the Administration party of carrying Pennsylvania, if it shall be carried against M'Clellan, by its tyrannical or fraudulent use of the soldiers' vote.

From Indiana the same cry comes, with columns of certificates and specifications of gross frauds and daring military interference for suppressing the votes of Democrats, driving them away from the polls, and filling the ballot-boxes with illegal votes cast by soldiers from other States. There is another case of Democratic grievance. They will say, and it will probably be true, that if the vote of Indiana is cast for Mr. Lincoln, it will be so cast by the arbitrary interference of the military supporters of Mr. Lincoln sent in from other States to subjugate Indiana.
